Diabetes is becoming more common across the world, and that is also true in England. About 1.4 million people in England are currently diagnosed with diabetes and as many as 1 million may have type 2 diabetes without even knowing it. The number of people with diabetes in the UK is expected to rise to 3 million by 2010. It will have a significant impact on those people's lives and that of their families. When researching for this speech, the statistic that horrified me was that diabetes is estimated to account for 5 per cent. of total NHS spending—a huge amount of money spent on a single condition.

The challenges are mounting. Our population is made up of a complex cultural mix that is becoming more overweight, obese and inactive, so our population is also becoming more prone to diabetes. That is why we developed the national service framework for diabetes and published it in December 2001. It was developed with the help of users of the service, clinicians and managers. The NSF sets out to make best practice the norm, setting out a 10-year programme of change through 12 new national standards. The document is supported by the diabetes delivery strategy, which was published in January 2003 and which offers a framework that the NHS can use to build capacity and deliver the national targets.

Taken together, the NSF standards and the delivery strategy will lead to fewer people developing diabetes and better care for those who have it. They will also ensure that diabetes services are centred around the needs of people with diabetes and offer care that is structured and proactive, providing people with the support and skills they need to manage their own condition, which is particularly important. Those are the first ever set of national standards for diabetes services in the NHS. They will raise the quality of services everywhere and reduce unacceptable variations. In order to stay healthy and well, every person with diabetes needs good and regular health care. We can reduce the risk of serious complications and lengthen life. This means prompt diagnosis, regular checks to identify serious complications at an early stage and treatment to control blood glucose and blood pressure levels.

Support and education are crucial so that people can manage this complex disease effectively by themselves. Structured education and care planning are crucial tools that will enable people with diabetes to improve their knowledge and skills, supporting them to take control of their own condition and to integrate self-management into their daily lives.

In line with that, explicit objectives of the NSF include the provision of services that enable people to manage their own diabetes through education and support that recognises the importance of lifestyle, culture and religion. There is much work being accomplished in this area. For example, Action Diabetes is a Department of Health pilot project in Slough primary care trust. It is designed to improve the lives of patients who are known to have diabetes, and to identify sooner those patients who have yet to be diagnosed. The particular focus is to reduce late diagnosis of the disease and to improve the health of the most at risk, generally Asian communities. That initiative was launched by the Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), on 18 October 2004 and has already successfully identified a number of previously undiagnosed cases of diabetes.

In Barnet, community-based education has been developed to meet the needs of the PCT's ethnic and multicultural population. Specific projects include a diabetes awareness day for the Chinese community, a bi-monthly education programme for an ethnically mixed group of patients at the multicultural centre, and a patient day organised by the PCT to promote greater awareness of diabetes, PCT services and the importance of personal responsibility for health.

While I am talking about local initiatives, the hon. Member for Southend, West mentioned his concerns about some services in Southend. He rightly said that money is now channelled through the PCT, so it is for it to make decisions about how that money is spent. Southend PCT is doing a considerable amount of work locally to try to improve services for people who suffer from diabetes. A strategic vision for chronic disease management, including diabetes, was presented to the joint board and executive committee on 27 May 2004. There has already been a number of valuable outcomes from the work, which I am confident will improve services for people in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. Initiatives such as those provide services that are patient centred, equitable and appropriate to individual's needs, and they will make a real difference to the lives of people from all backgrounds, including those from ethnic minorities with diabetes.

Good progress is already being made across a number of areas covered by the Diabetes NSF. The recent Dr. Foster report, "Your Local Care", published by Diabetes UK, found that systems for service delivery are well on their way to implement the NSF on a national basis. For example, 86 per cent. of PCTs are part of a whole system diabetes network, 79 per cent. have accountability arrangements to ensure that decisions are implemented and 93 per cent. have identified a clinical lead. The diabetes delivery strategy emphasises the importance of specialist care in certain circumstances—for example, for women during pregnancy and for those who are admitted to hospital.

The report found that in 97 per cent. of PCTs, people with diabetes who are admitted to hospital have access to the support of a diabetes specialist team. In 98 per cent. of PCTs, women with pre-existing diabetes, and those who develop diabetes during pregnancy, have access to joint diabetes and obstetrics management. That is an increase from 91 per cent. in the past year. We recognise, however, that there is a need to continue to continue to make further progress in other areas of diabetes care if we are to succeed in the implementation of the 12 standards. The Department of Health is committed to do just that. The very first of the NSF standards also makes it clear that prevention is better than cure.

In many cases, but not all, type 2 diabetes can be prevented or the onset delayed, especially if individuals at increased risk of developing type 2 reduce their risk by changing lifestyle, eating a balanced diet, losing weight and increasing their physical activity levels. In May this year, the Health Committee, on which the hon. Member for Southend, West serves—I congratulate it on its work and on its interest in the matter—reported the results of its thorough and comprehensive investigation of the issues surrounding the growing problem of obesity, which is a major risk factor in the development of type 2 diabetes. The timing of its report was fortunate, as it directly contributed to the "Choosing Health?" consultation, and made an important contribution to the development of the comprehensive range of proposals that we set out in today's White Paper. In July 2004, we announced a new joint public service agreement target for the Department of Health, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education and Skills, aiming to halt

"the year on year rise in obesity among children under 11 by 2010, in the context of a broader strategy to tackle obesity in the population as a whole".

The public health White Paper published today pulls together a comprehensive strategy to deliver that target. One of the six priorities for action identified in the White Paper relates to reducing obesity. The White Paper recognises that obesity, both in children and adults, is increasing and poses a serious threat to our health, storing up trouble through an increase in diabetes, heart disease and cancer. It sets out practical measures to support people who want to live healthier lives. We have set out a comprehensive plan of action covering physical activity, diet, personalised support, information and curbs on marketing, thus providing a strong foundation for tackling obesity. For example, the Department of Health has commissioned the National Institute for Clinical Excellence to prepare definitive guidance on prevention, identification, management and treatment of obesity, which is due to be available in 2007. We will also commission the production of a weight loss guide, to set out what is known about regimes for losing weight and to help people select healthy approaches that are most likely to help them to lose weight and maintain a more healthy weight. For the first time in England and Wales, evidence-based guidance will be available for children and adults on both prevention and management, ensuring a consistent evidence-based approach.

The NHS will provide more effective services on obesity, whether in prevention, management or treatment, so that the public and patients have much better support, tailored to their individual needs, to help them achieve and maintain a healthy weight. These are concrete and practical measures that signal our commitment—

Oral Answers to Questions

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

The Deputy Prime Minister was asked—

Thames Gateway

1. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): What steps he is taking to ensure that existing communities share the benefits of the Thames gateway development programme. [198432]

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): The Government are determined that existing communities will share fully in the benefits of the big new investment to support housing growth in the Thames gateway. I am pleased to say that only last week the Government announced £100 million of funding to new Thames gateway projects, aimed at improving educational, health, environmental and transport provision in the gateway. Since last year, the Government's investment in community improvements in the gateway has risen to £475 million.

Jonathan Shaw: I am grateful for that reply from my right hon. Friend. May I extol the virtues of the All Saints neighbourhood project? It is essential, if the gateway is to develop successfully, that the existing communities not only feel the benefits but are part of the development. That will include not just shiny new buildings away from some of the poorer areas in the Medway towns, but improvements in street lighting, the environment and safety—all the things that impact on people's daily lives when they open their front doors. When my right hon. Friend is giving out the money, will he ensure that councils and other delivery units engage with the communities, especially those in Chatham?

Keith Hill: My hon. Friend may extol to his heart's content, because he is right in everything that he says. He is right about the Chatham social regeneration project, which was one of the successful projects and will, following our announcement last week, receive £550,000 from my Department. That project covers streetscape and public realm improvements in the area around Luton Arches in his constituency and environmental enhancements to Fort Amherst. The project also builds on the £10 million ODPM allocation for the regeneration of Chatham town centre.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): Unlike the rest of the Government's community plans, the Thames gateway project has merit, but serious concerns about the infrastructure, the environment and community buy-in were raised in the recent debate by the hon. Members for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw), for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) and for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas). What specific steps will the Minister take, beyond the usual consultation procedures and representative process, to ensure that the existing population's interests are taken fully into account? The people of the Medway towns, Bexleyheath and Ilford want action, not just more talk from this lacklustre ministerial team in a careless Government.

Keith Hill: The hon. Gentleman does his best, but it is a dismal effort. We did have a debate on the Thames gateway on Monday evening and the immense benefits that the scheme will confer on local communities were universally acknowledged by all the hon. Members who contributed. The fact is that absolutely every aspect of the investment programme in the Thames gateway is based on the involvement of local communities. Indeed, the entire mechanism for the delivery of the Thames gateway project is based on local delivery vehicles.

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): In my constituency, we have had a £100 million bridge and a £25 million new ring road. We are grateful for those and we are looking forward to the development of the Thames gateway. In conjunction with the housing projection for Sittingbourne and Sheppey, will my right hon. Friend produce an infrastructure audit, so that we will get the schools, the GPs' surgeries and so on at the same time as the housing?

Keith Hill: My hon. Friend is right, and to his list of transport investments in his constituency we can add the Sittingbourne learning hub, the Elmley Sheppey building crafts centre to train apprentices, and the Sheerness children and family centre. All of those are benefits conferred as a result of the Thames gateway projects. He is also right that we need to bring in the necessary health and education provision simultaneously with the housing developments. My Department is working closely with other Departments to ensure that such simultaneous delivery is secured.

Regional Chambers

2. Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): What the cost was of regional chambers in England, in 2003–04; and how many staff they employed. [198433]

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): The total Government grant allocated to the eight regional chambers in 2003–04 was £14 million. They employed some 302 staff at the end of the 2003–04 financial year.

Mr. Francois: I thank the Minister for that reply and I note that the Deputy Prime Minister has ducked the opportunity to respond to the question. Given that in the north-east the people voted overwhelmingly—by 78 per cent. to 22 per cent.—not to have a regional assembly, those bodies now lack any political or moral authority. Should not we now abolish those white elephants and hand planning powers back to locally elected authorities where they rightfully belong?

Mr. Raynsford: No, and let me quote someone on this subject:

> "Despite the north-east vote, there will still be a requirement for effective regional planning functions, provision of democratic mandate for the regions and effective scrutiny of other regional bodies—a role in which the assembly and other voluntary chambers have shown themselves to be extremely competent."

That was written two weeks ago, by Sue Sida-Lockett, the Conservative chair of the East of England regional assembly.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the North West regional assembly does a very good job, as does the Northwest Development Agency, in considering strategic issues in the north-west? Does he further agree that the result of the vote in the north-east the other week in no way diminishes the fact that, at the end of the day, there is still a very strong case for democratic accountability in the regions?

Mr. Raynsford: I agree very much with my hon. Friend. The Government expect the North West regional assembly, like other assemblies, to perform functions in relation to regional planning and the oversight of the regional development agency, but it also does a number of other jobs in the north-west and contributes to the wider debate on economic development and regeneration, which is absolutely critical to that region. Clearly, as I said in the response to the previous question, there is an ongoing and important role for regional assemblies, which include a majority of members from elected local authorities.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): Today is the day for quotes. Sir Jeremy Beecham, in a letter to The Daily Telegraph, says:

> "We have regional government conducted in piecemeal fashion by civil servants, quangos and next steps agencies, with minimal accountability to the regions they serve."

If the leader of the Labour group of the Local Government Association can see the problem, why cannot the Deputy Prime Minister?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Lady will know only too well that there is a strong case for the preparation of regional planning guidance and that that was put in place by the Conservative party when in government. The structures that the Conservative Government proposed called for consultation with elected representatives from local councils, plus others involved in regional development. The difference between the outcomes then and now is that, in those days, the Secretary of State decided what the outcome was—it was entirely a decision by central Government—but we have modernised the system and devolved power so that decisions are taken by bodies such as the one chaired by the Conservative whom I quoted a moment ago, who believes that regional chambers are the means to engage local authorities in the formulation of regional planning guidance.

Decent Home Standard

3. Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): What his strategy is for meeting the decent home standard. [198434]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): In 1997, we inherited 2 million non-decent homes. Since then, more than £18 billion of public and private money has been invested to reduce that number by more than 1 million. That means 650,000 homes with new central heating, 240,000 new kitchens, 180,000 new bathrooms, making a real difference to people's lives—people who suffered from the massive disinvestment of the previous Administration. We remain on track to deliver our commitment to make every home in the public sector decent by 2010.

Mr. Love: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on attaining 1 million improved homes earlier this year, but there is considerable concern about the lack of affordable accommodation for key workers in Greater London. What steps is he taking to ensure that they can have decent, affordable accommodation, so that we do not continue to lose key workers from the capital?

The Deputy Prime Minister: That is indeed a very important problem. The first tranche of the starter home initiative delivered about 10,000 affordable homes under the key worker programme. We have also established a new programme—the key worker living programme, which began in March 2004—and 16,000 people will benefit from it. In the borough of Enfield and my hon. Friend's constituency, about 120 people have already been helped by that programme and 264 further applications are being dealt with at the moment.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): The Deputy Prime Minister will be aware that Macclesfield borough council achieves a housing standard far in excess of the decent housing standard. It is known in his Department as the Macclesfield standard. Will he ensure that Macclesfield borough council continues to get sufficient resources to enable it to continue to manage its own housing stock and not force it into a large-scale voluntary transfer, against the wishes of tenants, who have my support?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am glad to hear of the new Macclesfield standard. It is a pity that it did not apply throughout the previous Administration, which is why we inherited 2 million houses of a non-decent standard for which the programme has been developed. It is true that we gave a choice to tenants as to whether they would like to opt for the transfer programmes that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. Those transfers have brought in something like £18 billion-worth of money from the public and private sectors and allowed us to implement the programme more quickly. We leave it to the tenants to make a decision and three quarters of those asked have voted overwhelmingly to adopt these programmes.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of a ward in my constituency called Jaywick Sands because I have made the Department aware of the fact that some people in that area are living in 1930s holiday homes. The area has deteriorated for several years under the control of Tory Essex county council and Tory Tendring district council. My constituents are looking to the Government to make a difference. Will he assure them that he will look at the area specifically so that the local people have a right to a decent home to live in?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I do not know the full details of the point made by my hon. Friend, but I will certainly look into the matter and write to him. One of the difficulties that we inherited is the fact that, in the last five years of the Tory Administration, they slashed housing investment by half. We doubled it in the same period after. That is the real difference, and that is why people look to this Government to make a real difference on housing.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): To pick up the point made by the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love), does the Deputy Prime Minister agree that the programme for decent homes for key workers should not be restricted just to those who work in the public sector? It should cover those who work in catering, cleaning, retail and other low-paid jobs in the private sector.

The Deputy Prime Minister: To be honest, matters of state aid are involved, but the hon. Gentleman makes a decent point about a broader definition of key workers. We have established a certain key worker definition at the moment, and we are following that. We hope to make a statement about housing matters shortly.

County Councils (Planning)

4. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): What plans he has to strengthen the planning powers of county councils. [198435]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): The Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act, 2004 and supporting regulations provide for county councils to have an extensive role in the new planning system, which came into force on 28 September 2004. It would be premature now to be considering further changes to county councils' planning powers.

Mr. Bellingham: Is the Minister aware that Norfolk is having forced on it nearly 100,000 extra homes? Is he aware that this will put intolerable new pressure on already overstretched services and infrastructure? Is he aware that my constituents want more affordable housing, but they do not want thousands of more executive-style homes that are occupied by second home owners? Surely it would be far better if such key decisions were taken by a county council that is directly elected by local people.

Phil Hope: The importance of regional planning has been recognised by successive Governments—his Government in the past as well as by this Government. That is why we have to address major regional transport and housing issues across a region as well as within individual local areas. The fact is that one of the key benefits of this Government's regional planning policy has been the investment of £3.9 million for housing in King's Lynn and west Norfolk. That is providing homes for key workers and affordable housing for people in the hon. Gentleman's area.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): Can my hon. Friend comment on the fact that there has been a democratic deficit for my constituents and others in the metropolitan counties since Mrs. Thatcher removed those councils? We do not have planning or any other sort of powers, because we do not have a county council. Will he comment on that?

Phil Hope: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns. We are trying to ensure that local authorities have the ability to undertake the responsibilities that they are given. A key part of having the ability to deliver those functions is having the resources to do so. She will know that, since 1997, local authorities across the board have received an increase of 30 per cent. in funding from the Government. Local authorities suffered desperately to deliver services under the previous Administration who cut funding by 7 per cent. in the previous four years.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): The Minister will be aware that the South East England regional assembly draft housing numbers plan is out—it is a pretty shoddy affair. It is lightly done and ignores a few basic factors, of which I shall cite two. First, the extrapolation of growth from the past ignores the fact that after land has been built on, it has gone, so the continuation of that process threatens the green belt. Secondly, economic growth in the south-east is based on productivity to a greater extent than actual given numbers. Will the Minister reflect on his first answer and recognise that county councils need a strengthened role, even if they must save the dignity of the Deputy Prime Minister and put things through the regional assemblies?

Phil Hope: The fact is that the South East England regional assembly has a Conservative majority and is chaired by a Conservative councillor, so the hon. Gentleman is criticising his own party. Perhaps he should hold a debate inside his party and decide how it should deliver the affordable homes in the south-east that are desperately needed by people with sons and daughters who cannot afford to find a place to live in their areas.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): In Nottinghamshire, some planning matters go to the county council for decision and some go to district councils. Will the Minister make the situation much easier for my constituents by giving us a ballot on a unitary authority so that we can enjoy the benefits that most of the country does?

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend will know that we recently published our "Local Vision" documents, which describe the outline of our proposals for the future strengthening of local government and the role that local government can play in leading and empowering communities and working in partnership with other agencies. Included in the 10-year vision is a debate on the future structure of local government, and I look forward to the contribution of my hon. Friend and other hon. Members to that debate.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): The Minister will recall that Liberal Democrats fought against taking planning powers away from county councils to the last when other parties had thrown in the towel. There is now no early prospect of any regional planning boards becoming properly accountable. Will he revisit that matter, recognise the strength of our arguments on democracy and local government, and give planning powers back to English county councils?

Phil Hope: Once again, we see the Liberal Democrats moving from one position to another. There is no mistaking the fact that their national position is different from their local and regional positions. The previous system was hopelessly bureaucratic, but the new system gives county councils clear powers on sub-regional policies and responsibilities for surveying in their areas. It allows them to produce new waste and mineral plans and to form joint committees with other authorities on key aspects in their areas. To go back to the older system would be to go back to delay and conflict, and that would fail to deliver the housing and infrastructure that the Government are delivering.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): The Minister talks as though the vote in the north-east was a hiccup on the road to regionalism rather than its death knell. Does he not understand that denial is no substitute for a policy? He and his hon. Friends made it clear on countless occasions that the transfer of planning powers from counties and other authorities to regional bodies was done in preparation for an elected regional assembly. Those unelected bodies have no legitimacy in doing the Government's bidding by bulldozing over our countryside. Their powers must be returned to the people. Does the Minister understand that while he and his colleagues might run from the decision of the people of the north-east, they cannot hide from the verdict of the people?

Phil Hope: That was an interesting contribution from a member of the Conservative Front Bench because the Conservative chair of the East of England regional assembly said that such Tory criticisms > "demonstrates a crass misunderstanding of the role of voluntary regional chambers".

Such crass misunderstanding has been repeated today. The Conservative party published planning guidance in 1992 that said:

> "up to date regional planning guidance is necessary in every region".

Conservative Members now want to sweep that aside, but the consequences of that would be that housing, transport and infrastructure would be taken away from every single one of their constituencies. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to come to order. I know how difficult it is.

Housing (Eastern England)

5. Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): If he will make a statement on housing provision along the Cambridge-Stansted-London corridor. [198436]

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): London, Stansted, Cambridge and Peterborough form one of the four growth areas that will play a key role in delivering the sustainable communities plan. The East of England regional assembly recently made its proposals to the Government for housing provision in the east of England, including this growth area. Those will now be subject to public consultation and examination.

Mr. Prisk: I thank the Minister for that statement, although I have to say that EERA's proposals are, as many of my constituents think, both undemocratic and, frankly, unsustainable. Given that Hertfordshire is the most densely populated county in England, will the Government invest in and improve our infrastructure before approving more houses?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman makes a perfectly fair point about the importance of combining infrastructure investment with new housing provision. It is precisely because of the Government's recognition of that that we have defined the growth area strategies and are ensuring a more integrated approach rather than the one that his party pursued when in government, which led to the sprawl of uncontrolled low-density development that produces the problem about which he complains. If Hertfordshire has a problem of development, it is because when his party was in government it allowed large-scale urban sprawl in that area.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Will the Minister accept that there is considerable anger as a result of the decision by the East of England regional assembly to impose 14,000 extra houses on the Chelmsford local authority area? Why is it right that an illegitimate, unelected organisation has the right to take those decisions rather than elected borough councillors on planning departments in Chelmsford?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman clearly has either not been listening to the debate or chosen deliberately to ignore it. The chair of the East of England regional assembly is of the same party as the hon. Gentleman. He decisively dismissed his carping comments as ill-informed and rightly made the point that it is doing a good job. The hon. Gentleman has to remember that the proposals will be subject to consultation and examination in public. The important thing that his party fails to recognise is the issue of how we provide the housing that people need and do so in a sustainable way. Unlike his party, the Government are addressing those issues seriously.

Local Government Reform

6. Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): If he will make a statement on his plans for reforms in local government. [198437]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): In July I published a discussion document "The future of local government: Developing a 10 year vision". This vision puts local government at the heart of our communities in the years ahead. It also makes clear that both local and central government will need to change to meet the challenges of building sustainable communities in which people want to live.

Mr. Mudie: I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for that answer. In his post-referendum review, will he assure the House that councils will be key deliverers of services and not just enablers, handing out contracts to the private sector? Will he also assure us that such ideas as taking all primary schools or high schools out of direct local government control will not be part of his future plans?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I can assure my hon. Friend that local authorities are key in developing local and national services. I can also tell him that the extra powers and resources that we have provided will enable them to do that.

Regarding whether the community assets of schools, whether secondary or primary, are directly controlled by the local authority, I assure him that in Leeds and other parts of the country, as he knows, there is an increasing amount of community involvement in the new deals, the new neighbourhood areas, Sure Start and the local strategic partnerships. More than 1 million people are now participating in decisions and sharing community assets. In that sense, the community is enriched by using those assets for the benefit of the community, working with local authorities in creating new services for the citizens in their area.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): When the Deputy Prime Minister publishes his White Paper on local government reform, will it include details of his planned revaluation of properties and their council tax bands? When will he come clean on that?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is aware that we have said that we will keep to the timetable for the revaluation of properties that is set out in legislation. The White Paper will deal with future changes to local government.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the work that he is doing to help local government to sustain services to its communities. Has he any plans to bring into being more town or parish councils with a view to bringing local government closer to the electorate?

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point; he has tremendous experience of working in local government. As he will know, our new document on local vision makes it clear that we want more active citizen engagement and participation, which will be brought about by greater local leadership and will certainly be to the improvement of the community.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [198447] Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 17 November.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before I list my engagements, I know that the whole House will wish to express our grief at what has happened to Margaret Hassan and to join in paying tribute to her for 30 years dedicated to working for the good of the people of Iraq.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I will have further such meetings later today.

Mr. Heath: The whole House will join in condemnation and dismay at the brutal murder of another innocent victim in Iraq.

The Home Secretary said that he does not want to create a climate of fear, and I am sure that he is right, but we also recognise the real and present threat of terrorism. Why, then, does he intend to spend billions of pounds on an identity card system which did not work in New York or Madrid, instead of spending that money on more police, better security services, the protection of our travelling public—as in America—and our emergency response? Why does he believe that we can fight terrorism with plastic?

The Prime Minister: A large part of the cost is to do with the introduction of biometric passports, which will be done in any event. I believe that identity cards do have a role to play, and I think that most people would recognise now that, if we want to secure our borders properly and ensure that people are not coming into or operating in this country illegally, it is not unreasonable to ask people to have some system of identity.

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway) (Lab): The Prime Minister will be aware that in July 2003 the intelligence services withdrew reports on Iraq's weapons as wholly discredited. Will he undertake to let the House know the information that he has consistently refused to give in writing, namely the exact date—not the period, but the date—on which he was aware of that withdrawal?

The Prime Minister: I think I am right in saying that we made it clear that the doubts about the information to which my hon. and learned Friend is referring were drawn to our attention during the Butler review. I can certainly look into the precise date on which that happened. It has to be said, however, and I hope that he understands this, that the information and intelligence that we received, we received in good faith and acted on in good faith.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I join the Prime Minister in the remarks that he made about the murder of Margaret Hassan. This murder of an innocent woman, a Muslim woman, who dedicated her entire life to the welfare of the people of Iraq, shows yet again that we are up against barbaric terrorists who want to destroy Iraq's future, and we must stand steadfast in the face of their terror.

The chief executive of the Child Support Agency has just resigned. The agency is in crisis. What is the Prime Minister going to do to get a grip on the problem and help some of the poorest families in our country who are not getting the money that they are entitled to?

The Prime Minister: The first thing to do, obviously, is to ensure that the information technology system that has caused so many problems is sorted out. The second, and perhaps most important, problem is that there are still a million cases being dealt with under the old system—the system that we inherited. Over time, there will be a migration to the new system that we introduced, which is far simpler. It is important that we manage to migrate as many cases as possible from the old system to the new.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister has been in office for seven and a half years. His Government are responsible for the new computer; his Government are responsible for the new assessment system; and it is his Government's chief executive who has just resigned. The Child Support Agency has failed to collect £750 million owed to some of the poorest families in Britain. Those people desperately needed that money to help bring up their children. They have been denied it by the failures of this Government. Do they not deserve better?

The Prime Minister: Of course what has happened is not acceptable. That is precisely why it is important to change. However, I have to point out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that a million cases are being dealt with under the old scheme because those claims were made under the previous Administration and the scheme that we inherited. I am very happy to take lessons from people who have found that they have not got the service that they need under the new system, but I will not take lessons from a Conservative party that introduced a child support system that was a byword for chaos and unfairness.

Linda Perham (Ilford, North) (Lab): Following the Prime Minister's visit to President Bush last week, what hope can he offer my thousands of Jewish constituents on the prospects of peace in the middle east, security for Israel, freedom from terror and a viable two-state solution?

The Prime Minister: I hope that it will be possible to use the opportunity of an election for a new Palestinian leader, the disengagement from Gaza and parts of the west bank, which is the programme announced by the Israeli Government, and our determination to ensure that we work with the Palestinians and others in the international community to put together the political, economic and security institutions of a viable state. I hope that it will be possible by a combination of those means to reinvigorate the middle east peace process. As I have said on many occasions in the past few weeks, and I repeat again, I do not think that there is a more pressing political challenge facing the world today.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): I associate my right hon. and hon. Friends completely with the expressions of outrage at the wicked murder of Margaret Hassan.

To return to the Child Support Agency resignation this morning, as well as the computerisation problems to which the Prime Minister rightly referred, there is of course the fact that the Government have been changing the specifications, which has added to the problems. As the CSA is as we speak leaderless, the staff are bound to be demoralised and the agency is failing in its functions, will the Prime Minister as a matter of urgency scrap the Child Support Agency and transfer its purpose directly to the Inland Revenue, so that it can get payments to those most in need?

The Prime Minister: I am not sure that transferring to the Inland Revenue is the answer to the problem. The reason for the difficulty is that people have to pay child support when they have an obligation to support children on divorce or the separation of partners. The CSA was established by the previous Government in order to try to ensure that the system worked in an effective and fair way without the need for long drawn-out court hearings. Unfortunately, that system did not work. I do not in any way minimise the difficulties under the new system that we are introducing. It is not acceptable, as I said a moment or two ago. However, there will be new leadership of the Child Support Agency, we will have to sort out the computer programme that has been the cause of the present problems, and we will then have to ensure that as many people as possible get on to the new scheme, which is a lot simpler and more effective.

Mr. Kennedy: I still hope that the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and the Prime Minister might look at the idea that I have mentioned.

Talking of new leadership, there will have to be a new leader of the National Assessment Agency, too, as its chief executive has resigned this morning. He has resigned because of a three-month delay in publishing key stage 3 English results. Is not that also indicative of the central problem of this Government? They set unrealistic targets, the quangos and agencies cannot deliver, and the recipients on the front line, after seven years of Labour in power, are left languishing.

The Prime Minister: It is extraordinary of the right hon. Gentleman to say that we should not have testing and exams for pupils. An independent authority is needed to carry that out, and it has done so. I simply point out to him that it found that there was not any problem, either with the quality of marking or with the results. There has been a problem in the system, which is the reason for the resignation. We cannot have it both ways—either arm's-length agencies carry out these functions, or they are carried out direct from Government. I will certainly look at his suggestion that we transfer child support to the Inland Revenue, but it is highly unlikely that doing so would cause anything other than consternation among recipients and the Inland Revenue alike.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Yesterday, the directors of Wrexham football club, the home of football in Wales, announced that they were putting the club into administration. This Saturday, thousands of football supporters across Britain are setting aside their tribal loyalties to wear red for Wrexham. What can the Prime Minister offer community football clubs that are again under huge pressure from predatory company developers, and what can he do to improve the situation?

The Prime Minister: As ever, I am helpfully briefed that it is not for the Government to determine how a football club is owned and that there are many different models of ownership. I do not suppose that that is a great help to my hon. Friend or to Wrexham football club, but I obviously wish them well. Many supporters want to ensure that their club is owned and based in the local community, but he will accept that this is not a matter for me to intervene in personally.

Q2. [198448] Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): With an average household income in Ceredigion of less than £19,000 a year and an average house price of £160,000, my constituency is now the least affordable place to buy and live in Wales, and is the fifth least affordable in the United Kingdom. As interest rates are not delivering affordability for young people, what other steps can the Prime Minister take to help young people access decent and affordable homes?

The Prime Minister: Housing in Wales is the responsibility of the Assembly, but we have put a substantial amount of additional money into housing, and affordable rural housing in particular. Of course, the situation is difficult, because there is a strong economy and the fact that more people are in work—unemployment figures are again down today, and are at their lowest level for 30 years—puts pressure on housing. However, interest rates—again, under this Government, they are at their lowest for several decades—are important in enabling people to afford their homes. How the money that we put into affordable housing is distributed is a matter for the Assembly.

Q3. [198449] Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): Is the Prime Minister aware that unemployment in my constituency fell by 13 per cent. last year; that the Clyde shipyards are well on the way to having the biggest order book in living memory; and that I am still not happy? Will he try to make me happier by ensuring that the naval orders come in a steady flow to avoid boom and bust in the yards? In particular, will he ensure that the MARS—Military Afloat Reach and Sustainability—ships order is placed in such a way that periods of decline are avoided, and will he place those ships in Britain?

The Prime Minister: I hope that my hon. Friend realises that Govan has good prospects for future work on aircraft carriers, and is involved in the building of the first T-54 destroyers, offering stability for the work force well into the next decade. I also hope that his constituency will benefit from other projects currently in the concept phase. He is right that unemployment is down in his constituency—it is down in every single constituency in the country and 2 million more people are in work. The new deal has helped more than 1 million people into work, which is why we should continue with the policies of stability and maintain the new deal, not scrap it as the Opposition want to do.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): From today, the Metropolitan police will have to fill in a form every time that they stop someone in the street—not stop and search, just stop. Can the Prime Minister tell the House how much of a police officer's time will be wasted on this latest piece of political correctness?

The Prime Minister: The provision, as I understand it, was introduced after the Lawrence inquiry to ensure that police powers, which we have increased, are exercised in a way that keeps the confidence of the local community.

Mr. Howard: The Police Federation estimates that it will take seven minutes on average to fill in the new form. The police will be assessed on it under the police performance assessment framework, affectionately known by the police as PFAF. From today, if a police officer in London wants to stop a gang of half a dozen yobs in the street, it will take the best part of an hour to fill in the forms. Does the Prime Minister think that that will encourage the police to stop gangs in the street?

The Prime Minister: First, as a result of the Government introducing dispersal orders and other measures to deal with antisocial behaviour, we are able to take action against gangs of yobs in the street for the first time. Secondly, I point out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that crime in London is down and police numbers up. We remember that when he was Home Secretary he cut the numbers of police, and crime under the last Conservative Government doubled.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister knows perfectly well that when I was Home Secretary, crime fell by 18 per cent., and either of his Home Secretaries would give their eye teeth for that record. The Prime Minister told the country in his manifesto that he would "relieve the police of unnecessary bureaucratic burdens".

Is this what he meant? Should the police not be doing their job, not filling in forms? We have said that we will scrap this latest piece of politically correct nonsense. Why will he not?

The Prime Minister: For the reason that I have just given. The measure was introduced after the inquiry into the death of Stephen Lawrence. It was considered necessary in order to ensure that there was proper support in local communities for policing. I do not think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman's record on policing in London can be that good, since he was telling us a few weeks ago that he went out in Brixton for the night and could not see a single police officer. Let me say to him:

> "Burglary is down, robbery is down, graffiti wiped away, abandoned cars towed away. Central Brixton is a safer, happier place than it was a couple of years ago . . . Call it what you like, but it works."

Not my words—the words of the shadow Chancellor.

Mr. Howard: And how does the Prime Minister think that the police in Brixton will be able to continue to make the progress they have made, if they have to spend the best part of an hour filling in forms every time they stop a gang of half a dozen people in the street? I have now asked him four times the question about the forms that the police have to fill in. On each of those occasions he has failed to answer it. Why, for once, does he not face up to the nonsense of the requirements that his Government are imposing on the police?

The Prime Minister: I have not failed to answer the question. I have answered it. I have explained why we think it is necessary to do that, following the Lawrence inquiry. An important part of policing in London is to police with the support of the local community. In relation to policing in general, in London and elsewhere, there are record numbers of police, and they are now supported by community support officers who, incidentally, were opposed by the Opposition. We are reintroducing neighbourhood policing throughout London. Crime in London is down, not up, and as the commander in Brixton said:

> "I think Mr. Howard is out of touch . . . Maybe 10 or 20 years ago his comments would have been more accurate but there are now more police in Brixton. There are no more no-go areas and things have improved tremendously."

I prefer his words to those of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, or indeed my own.

Hon. Members: More.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Q4. [198450] Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): I thought that the Leader of the Opposition would be a hard act to follow, but plainly not.

My right hon. Friend was contacted this morning by a constituent of mine, Sandra Stalker, who wanted to thank me and the Government for her winter fuel allowance. Will he reassure her and millions of others that he has no plans to abolish or reduce that necessary measure to tackle fuel poverty?

The Prime Minister: I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue with the winter fuel payment and with the free television licence for the over-75s, which were dismissed at the time by the Conservatives as patronising gimmicks. For many of our constituents, the £200 winter fuel allowance is of help. It goes alongside the measures that have been taken to boost energy conservation, particularly in pensioners' homes, leading to a situation where far fewer pensioners fear the choice between heating and eating.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): The prisons ombudsman's report into the fire at Yarl's Wood removals centre in my constituency was published yesterday. It blames ill-thought-out policies and the setting of unachievable targets for leading to the design and construction of a building that was unfit for purpose and in which the many hundreds of detainees whom it housed might have lost their lives. Who does the Prime Minister think is accountable and responsible for the policy failures that led to the incident, which the ombudsman himself described as a hair's breadth from tragedy?

The Prime Minister: Of course we take responsibility for Yarl's Wood. It is necessary to ensure that we have more detention space. We are increasing detention space for the obvious reason that there is concern about asylum claims in particular—we have processed 80 per cent. of asylum claims in two months. Despite yesterday's rise, the number of asylum applications is now down to near the level that we inherited in 1997. We have taken on board the criticisms about Yarl's Wood and are ensuring that both the refurbished Yarl's Wood and other detention space complies with the recommendations in the report.

Q5. [198451] Mr. Piara S. Khabra (Ealing, Southall) (Lab): I welcome the Prime Minister on his return from the United States. He brought back some encouraging signals from his meeting with Mr. Bush on the middle east peace process. However, may I draw his attention to the dangers of global warming? In light of both a recent study showing a record rate of warming in the Arctic and Russia's decision to sign the Kyoto protocol, will he confirm that he was able to prompt Mr. Bush to take greater action on global warming to save the world from environmental disaster?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of climate change and global warming. That is why we have made climate change one of the two priorities for our G8 chairmanship next year, along with Africa. I spoke at length to President Bush about that matter and hope that we can work with America and other G8 partners to draw up proposals for the G8 summit next year to allow us to make progress on that issue again. The Kyoto protocol will come into effect as a result of Russia's ratification, but my hon. Friend and others rightly point out that even if Kyoto were implemented fully, it would effectively stabilise emissions, whereas we need to reduce them considerably.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): What action will the Prime Minister take on the unsurprising but shocking news that, for the tenth year running, the European Court of Auditors has failed to sign off the accounts of the European Union? Are the Government happy to acquiesce in that sorry state of affairs? Is it not about time that the United Kingdom stopped throwing good taxpayers' money after bad and did something about the issue, rather than seeing whistleblowers being fired?

The Prime Minister: We will, of course, continue to insist that the European Commission and the European Union come into compliance with the auditors' requirements. It is worth pointing out that although shortcomings were identified, they do not affect all the funds that are paid into the European Union or that come back to us. On the other hand, we have been pressing the new Commission to take far tougher action.

Q6. [198452] Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): I know that the Prime Minister is very pleased with the unemployment figures announced this morning, and so he should be, because they are at a record low—nothing shows more clearly that Labour is working for Britain. Does he realise that if we are to achieve long-term economic success in this country, we must build an enterprise culture, especially among our young people? Will he indicate his plans to build on the success of this week's enterprise week?

The Prime Minister: It is important to recognise the extra investment in education that is going into our schools. We have boosted investment in each pupil by a significant amount beyond what we inherited. We are also setting up business and enterprise specialist schools, which will help too. The child trust fund, which is just starting, will make a big difference by giving children a nest egg for the future. In addition, the proposals on child care will enable parents to balance work and family life to a far better extent.

Crown Post Office (Newton Abbot)

Q7. [198453] Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): What plans he has to visit the Crown post office in Newton Abbot.

The Prime Minister: I have no current plans to do so.

Richard Younger-Ross: That is a shame, because the Post Office proposes to close the Newton Abbot Crown office and the sub-post offices in Queen street and at Keyberry and to replace them with one franchise given to Costcutter. Will the Prime Minister condemn the Post Office for refusing to allow any other local business to bid for that franchise, and will he support the commercial workers union in asking for the sell-off and franchising—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Richard Younger-Ross: Will he support the commercial workers union in asking for the suspension of the sell-off and franchising until the Trade and Industry Committee has completed its report—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the hon. Gentleman speak.

Richard Younger-Ross: —and the Post Office has completed its negotiations with the union?

The Prime Minister: It is not correct to equate closures with franchises. More than 280 of the 550 directly managed post offices have been successfully franchised, and I understand that there are high customer satisfaction levels with that. The problem that we face is quite simple. The combined losses of those 550 directly managed post offices are more than £70 million a year, and we simply cannot afford to sustain those losses. We are putting hundreds of millions of pounds into supporting post offices, but there is a limit to that.

I understand, incidentally, that discussions are continuing between the Post Office and the Communication Workers Union to try to resolve this issue.

Engagements

Q8. [198454] Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): President Chirac has insisted that Europe should become a superpower to counter the United States. The Prime Minister himself has said that he wants Europe to be a superpower. When will he accept that this complete contradiction of his commitment to an undemocratic European constitution, with its defence and foreign policy, runs counter to our proven alliance with the United States? When will he discover that he cannot ride both horses at the same time?

The Prime Minister: It is extraordinary, given that the hon. Gentleman was down to ask a question, that I have briefings on education, crime, health and jobs, although it was perfectly obvious that there was only one subject he would ever ask about: Europe. I really must complain about those briefings.

Mr. Cash: Answer the question, then.

The Prime Minister: I will answer the question. I think that this country is lucky to have two major strong alliances—one with the United States of America and the other as a leading member of the European Union. It is important that we keep both alliances intact, because they are both important for the future of this country. I can think of many other countries around the world that would be delighted to have two such strong alliances. It is time, frankly, and with the greatest respect to the hon. Gentleman, that we started to celebrate, not denigrate, that fact.

Q9. [198455] Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend take time out of his busy schedule to visit the £15.5 million OpTIC optoelectronic incubation and research centre at the St. Asaph business park in my constituency? That technology centre will result in 24 new high-quality, high-tech companies being created every two years. What help can be given to spread that technology around the rest of Wales and the rest of the UK?

May I also ask my right hon. Friend whether he will be hanging around for the next few minutes for my ten-minute Bill at half past 12?

The Prime Minister: I cannot give an absolutely firm commitment on that, but I am sure that it is a great Bill, whatever its subject.

My hon. Friend is right. Investment in science and technology is a major part of the Government's programme to make this country the No. 1 capital in the world for the development of science and technology and businesses associated with it. We are in a strong position and we could be stronger still. The facility in my hon. Friend's constituency is not the only one in the country. They are important, and we need to grow and to build them because they have a direct impact on our future prosperity.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): I welcome today's meetings on Northern Ireland but does the Prime Minister appreciate the puzzlement of people there, given that 12 months after the election and more than two months since he declared at Leeds castle that he had virtually got the issue sorted out, nothing has happened? Will he get a grip and end the drift that someone somewhere clearly wants to prolong?

The Prime Minister: I hope that people in Northern Ireland are not too puzzled. Frankly, by now, they should be used to the stops and starts of a difficult and arduous process. Again, I pay tribute to the right hon. Gentleman for his work in the peace process, which should always be stated. I hope that the talks today will be productive. Although it is taking slightly longer than I anticipated, we are trying to resolve the outstanding issues. I think he would acknowledge that, provided that it is absolutely clear—it must be—from anyone who wants to sit in the Government of Northern Ireland that paramilitary violence is ended once and for all in all its forms, there is no reason why the Unionist community should not sit in an Executive with other parties, including the republican party, to govern Northern Ireland in a devolved way. I greatly hope that, in the next few days—it may be a little longer—we will make progress to ensure that, on the republican side, there is a complete end to violence, and on the Unionist side an acceptance that if that is so there should be power sharing.

Points of Order

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I draw your attention to motion 18 on today's Order Paper, which is entitled, "Application of the Parliament Act to the Hunting Bill"? It has been signed by 20 hon. Members from all parties representing both sides of the argument. Would you prefer to give time for that to be debated today?

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can answer Sir Patrick and then there will be no need for further points of order. Those matters are for the Government, not the Speaker. [Interruption.] Perhaps I can clarify matters. Debating time in the House is for the Government, not the Speaker, to determine.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Last night, the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary, the Home Secretary and 18 of their colleagues who were able to get into the Lobby with them voted against an outright ban on hunting. Is there any precedent in the long history of the Parliament Act for it to be used to force through a Bill, against which the holders of the great offices of state and the leader of the Government have voted?

Mr. Speaker: Hon. Members' voting records are a matter for them, not the Speaker.

Mr. Gray: What about precedent?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman should not worry about the Parliament Act. That is for me to worry about and look after—[HON. MEMBERS: "And us."] Of course, and I look after the interests of all hon. Members, especially those of Back Benchers.

Claire Ward (Watford) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the hon. Lady last because she has a different point of order.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You may know that the board of inquiry into the deaths of the six brave policemen who were killed at Majar al-kabir last year reports today. The Secretary of State for Defence will conduct a press conference to discuss the report at four o'clock in the Ministry of Defence. With great respect, I have shown a deep interest in the matter, given that one of my constituents was murdered in the incident. Other hon. Members have also done so. At the very least, the Secretary of State should have the guts to come here, make a statement and be questioned properly in Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: I think that we should have temperate language in the Chamber. The hon. Gentleman can always ask me for an urgent question. He can also raise the matter in other ways, perhaps through an Adjournment debate. I will consider the matter, but it is not for me to decide whether the Secretary of State goes to a press conference; that is a judgment for the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I listened to what you rightly said about the Parliament Act but would you also accept that, when it is time for you to make the decision about its application, you will clearly take into consideration the position of the Prime Minister and leading members of his Cabinet in voting against that which the Act would impose on Parliament?

Mr. Speaker: The House makes these decisions, the House passed the Act and the Act, in a sense, gives me certain instructions. It would be wrong of me to listen to the Prime Minister or anyone else in this matter.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Has the Prime Minister notified you that he wishes to come to the House to correct what he said during Prime Minister's Question Time, when he engaged in a highly selective quotation of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) about policing in Brixton? If he had correctly quoted him, he would have pointed out that both my right hon. Friend and I noted in Brixton that the action in Brixton town centre had pushed crime into the housing estates and into the immediate periphery, which were suffering as a result.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has done well to put the record straight through a point of order.

Claire Ward: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to raise with you and the House an abuse of parliamentary privilege by the Liberal Democrat party in Watford, which has deceitfully used the portcullis of the House for cheap party political purposes. The matter has been raised with the Serjeant at Arms, who has reported it to the Liberal Democrats in the House and ordered that the abuse cease immediately. Will you condemn the Liberal Democrats for this abuse of the Crown privilege, bestowed on Members of the House and Officers of the House in fulfilling their duties, and will you remind them of the rules?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can remind all hon. Members of the rules, but I will not go as far as condemning any political party. The Crown portcullis—and other emblems of the House—should be used only in direct connection with communications and publications originating from the House. It should not be shown on any publicity material associated with any individual political parties, and that includes the content of party websites. I am aware that the Crown portcullis emblem has been withdrawn from the website in question. The use of stationery has been dealt with by the Serjeant at Arms.

Vehicle Servicing Industry (Regulation)

12.37 pm

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision about the regulation of the vehicle servicing industry.

There are approximately 25 million cars on the road in the UK. The garage servicing industry is worth an estimated £9.8 billion a year—around £350 per car. The cost of shoddy repairs is estimated to cost UK car drivers £170 million per annum. The questions I pose today are, are we getting value for money, are our cars being serviced to the highest standards, and is safety being compromised?

In dealing with this issue I have worked very closely with Which? and the Consumers Association. Last week, Which? published the results of an undercover investigation. It took 48 cars to 48 garages across the country and asked them to fix relatively minor faults such as worn brake discs, and then it asked independent, trained experts to check the quality of the work. Seventy-three per cent. of the work undertaken was unsatisfactory and 67 per cent. of the garages that Which? took the cars to, failed to pick up the faults. Which? has conducted other research in the past into MOT servicing, and only eight of 36 garages performed the tests correctly.

The report's findings are nothing new and, although the figures are high, erratic quality in the servicing of vehicles is not a recent phenomenon. The public, consumer organisations and Government agencies have complained about it for decades. The latest investigations by the Office of Fair Trading and by trading standards authorities reveal some gross abuses of consumer confidence. Interestingly, the problem appears as endemic in the franchise dealer workshops as in the small independent garages. Despite the efforts of vehicle manufacturers to get their franchisees to observe quality standards, they have failed to do so.

Most car users think that, if they take their car to a recognised franchisee—they often pay over the odds to do so—they will get a good deal. That is not always the case. On the other hand, I do not want to condemn all garages or tar them all with the same brush. Personally, I have received excellent service in my constituency from a one-man operator, Jack Frodsham, who serviced my car for many years, and from a franchise operator, KA Ford, which gave me some expert and timely advice last week that saved me more than £600. I congratulate those garages.

The latest attempt to tackle poor standards was the good garage scheme, which is also known as the CarWise scheme and has been promoted by the Department of Trade and Industry. The proposal, which is based on codes of conduct, self-regulation and asking the consumer to distinguish between good and bad, was welcomed by consumer groups and hailed as a way of sorting out the mess of garage servicing without legislation. Unfortunately, the scheme received a mixed reception in industry circles, and the industry finally withdrew, refusing to fund it.

The scheme would have cost about £10 million to set up—only 35p for every car on the road in the UK. The industry claimed that the consumer would be up in arms about having to pay that 35p per year and per car for the service. Which? could not believe it, so it conducted further research with 1,100 people to find out what they were getting for their money and what they wanted from a mechanic. Some 93 per cent. of the people surveyed said that they would be concerned if they thought that their car was being serviced by a mechanic without suitable qualifications. People said that they wanted to be able to trust their mechanic. In order to get that trust, the industry has to listen to what people want: some kind of decent standard that is nationally recognised. Some 87 per cent. of those surveyed told Which? that they would pay extra for an approved technician to work on their car, and 67 per cent. said that they would travel further to get their car serviced by someone who was suitably qualified. With the consumer prepared to pay more and travel further for good customer service and a professional repair, it is unclear why the industry has not responded more positively.

Following the decision to scrap the good garage scheme, the Government did the only thing they could, and encouraged the industry to develop a code of practice and work with the OFT and its consumer code approval scheme. While some societies and organisations, such as the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders, have joined the scheme, Which? informs me that the Retail Motor Industry Federation, whose members are mainly independent repairers, withdrew its code, claiming that the OFT kept changing its criteria and the goalposts. The criteria are relatively low anyway, but, by signing up, a trade body can demonstrate its commitment to standards and good consumer service. I hope that the RMIF will reconsider its position following this debate.

There are many in the industry who support regulation and licensing. Philip Branley of the insurers Allianz Cornhill said:

> "In principle we would be in favour of a national licensing scheme. Anything that improves the standards and enhances consumer confidence has to be a good thing."

The automotive trade magazine representing body repairers and small independent garages conducted e-polling and found that 82 per cent. of its trade readership supported licensing under a mandatory scheme. Obviously, there is concern about who will pay to set up and monitor a scheme. As I have asserted, however, the public have stated that they are prepared to pay more, as long as they are guaranteed quality.

The Government are also helping out in other ways, such as improving competencies with the modern apprenticeship scheme. I believe that 7,000 apprentices are currently being trained to be mechanics. I point to the centre of automotive technology in my constituency—a £1.5 million project in Rhyl college aimed at giving young people, both male and female, the chance to gain these 21st century skills in the car servicing industry. Many in the industry welcome that help and realise that competency is the core of improving consumer confidence. Some, such as the Institute of the Motor Industry, Automotive Advantage and several dealer groups and manufacturers, already operate a code of practice and a raft of qualifications to help train mechanics. Their positive input should be recognised and encouraged by the Government.

Regulation has been introduced successfully in other industries and sectors. The gas installation industry, for instance, is now covered by CORGI registration, and in the aerospace industry mechanics are trained to the highest standards. Today's automated, computerised cars are a different beast from those of 30 years ago. The knowledge and skills required to service such cars are of a far higher standard, and deserve recognition and respect.

Failure to regulate could have tragic consequences. In the words of Alan Hodgkinson, chief executive of body repair network ABS, who supports regulation and licensing,

> "The failure of just one incorrectly fitted ball joint could lead to a multiple pile up on a motorway causing many deaths."

He added that

> "Government would have to step in overnight with compulsory licensing and the debate would be over."

I do not believe that we should have to wait for that accident to happen. I believe that the Bill should be adopted, and that the motor vehicle servicing industry should be regulated and licensed.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Chris Ruane, Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, Mr. Roy Beggs, Mark Tami, Linda Perham, Mrs. Betty Williams, Mr. Martyn Jones, Albert Owen, Ian Lucas, Gareth Thomas, Mr. Gordon Prentice and Jim Sheridan.

VEHICLE SERVICING INDUSTRY (REGULATION)

Chris Ruane accordingly presented a Bill to make provision about the regulation of the vehicle servicing industry: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 19 November, and to be printed [Bill 183].

Civil Contingencies Bill (Programme) (No. 2)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Orders [28 June 2001 and 6 November 2003],

That the following proceedings shall apply to the Civil Contingencies Bill for the purpose of supplementing the Order of 19th January 2004.

Consideration of Lords Amendments

1. Proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion three hours after their commencement at this day's sitting.

2. Those proceedings shall be taken in the order shown in the first column of the following table, and each part of those proceedings shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the time shown in the second column.

Lords amendments	Time for conclusion of proceedings
Amendments 49 to 51	One hour after the commencement of proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments.
Amendments 41, 42 and 46	One hour and 45 minutes after the commencement of those proceedings.
Amendments 7 and 56	Two and a half hours after the commencement of those proceedings.
Remaining amendments	Three hours after the commencement of those proceedings.

Subsequent stages

3. Any further Message from the Lords may be considered forthwith without any further Question being put.

4. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement—[Paul Clark.]

Orders of the Day

Civil Contingencies Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 34

COMMENCEMENT

Lords amendment: No. 49.

1.1 pm

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Ruth Kelly): I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 50 and 51 and the Government motions to disagree thereto.

Ruth Kelly: These amendments provide the vehicle for bringing part 2 of the Bill, on emergency powers, to an end three years after it has been brought into force. The Government are unable to agree with that approach. The idea of sunsetting part 2 of the Bill was originally raised by the Joint Committee that conducted pre-legislative scrutiny of the then draft Bill. The Government in their response made it clear that a sunset clause is relatively unusual and requires careful consideration. The issue was discussed at some length on Report and Third Reading in the other place.

The arguments against sunsetting are compelling. Sunsetting legislation is appropriate when the powers it contains are expected no longer to be needed after a certain period, or if their use should be reviewed by Parliament. This Bill does not meet either criterion. Time-limiting the Bill is clearly not appropriate. No one believes that emergencies will stop happening in three years' time. If part 2 of the Bill were to be repealed, something else would simply have to be put in its place. The purpose of review by Parliament on a triennial basis, it is suggested, is that—given the nature of the powers—Parliament should assess whether it is appropriate for them to continue to exist, in the light of the way in which they have been exercised. I understand that that was the main intent behind the amendment.

Provision for regular review by Parliament may be appropriate where the exercise of powers is of legitimate parliamentary interest but their exercise is not subject to parliamentary scrutiny, the intent being that some powers—given their nature—should not simply be handed over to a Government to exercise indefinitely in the manner of their choosing. That argument, however, does not apply to part 2 of the Bill. Any exercise of the powers it confers will undergo detailed parliamentary scrutiny.

I would also question the utility of review every three years, given that part 2 is a last resort option for dealing with only the most serious of emergencies, for which existing legislation proves insufficient. It is not intended for regular use. It is worth noting for example that there was a 29-year gap between the uses of the powers under the present legislation. It simply would not have been necessary or sensible to review the Emergency Powers Act 1920 every three years during that period.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The Minister says—and she is right, because clause 27 applies—that there will be parliamentary scrutiny of the regulations. Will Parliament be able to amend the regulations through the process of scrutiny?

Ruth Kelly: Yes. In a totally exceptional provision, it will be possible for Parliament to amend the regulations—for example, to impose additional limitations and constraints on their use by providing that the use of the powers should come to an end after a certain date.

Emergency regulations would be laid before Parliament as soon as was reasonably practical, once they had been made, and would require the assent of Parliament to continue in force. Any further set of regulations made after the lapse of the regulations would also have to go through the same process of parliamentary scrutiny.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): The Minister talks of detailed scrutiny, but the regulations would be in the form of an Order in Council and subject to the statutory instrument process. The detailed scrutiny would have to take place in 90 minutes. Or does the Minister know something that the House and the Standing Orders do not?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman raises an important and interesting point. I said that I would expect detailed scrutiny by Parliament to take place, and I accept that 90 minutes is indeed unlikely to be sufficient to debate regulations of such importance. It is likely that in the time of such an emergency there would be a call for a major debate on the subject of the crisis and the Government would respond to that and provide the appropriate time. The hon. Gentleman may question why we have not chosen to amend the Standing Orders to reflect that expectation. I would argue that it would not be appropriate to complicate the Standing Orders with varying procedures for different kinds of regulations. However, I place it clearly on the record that we would expect detailed scrutiny of the regulations to take place.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): As the Minister will know, it has been thought right to have sunsetting for a small class of provisions, including the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001—an obvious example—and the Terrorism Act 2000, which repeated the provisions that used to be in the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1973. Given that the Bill proposes to give, rightly, the most draconian powers to Ministers in an emergency, it surely also falls into that category and should be treated seriously.

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman is not alone in trying to draw parallels between the Bill and the Acts that he mentioned. Indeed, several of their Lordships also attempted to draw such parallels. They argued that because a review mechanism was appropriate in those contexts, it would be appropriate in this case. I beg to disagree. The powers in this Bill are not intended to be used on a regular basis. The powers in the Acts to which the hon. Gentleman referred are not subject to parliamentary scrutiny when exercised. We are dealing with a different type of Bill: it is an enabling Bill and the exercise of the powers it contains would be subject to detailed parliamentary scrutiny. The other Acts that have been mentioned grant ongoing powers that can be evaluated after a certain period of time has elapsed.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): Following the point made by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) about the nature of the scrutiny of the regulations once they are invoked by a Minister, we are concerned that those debates will be focused on the regulations before the House, rather than on the wider principle of whether the powers should have been used at all. We seek a review or a sunset provision because we want a review of the legislation as a whole, rather than the specific regulations that may have been invoked at a particular moment.

Ruth Kelly: It is worth bearing in mind the fact that we envisage the powers being used only for the most serious situations. It is unthinkable that any emergency that such powers would be connected with would not be debated in full while that emergency was taking place, including the Government's handling of the situation and the use of emergency powers.

Mr. Heald: Of course the particular circumstances that arise would probably be debated, and the particular measures taken would also be debated, albeit ex post facto and at not very great length. The point that is being made—I hope that the Minister will address it—is that the powers and their appropriateness to the situation would not be the subject of such a debate. That is what we would like to see scrutinised every three years. What is wrong with that?

Ruth Kelly: The true parallel to draw here is between the exercise of the regulations and the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 and the Terrorism Act 2000, not between the Bill and those Acts. They do not all fall into the same category. The regulations would be subject to detailed parliamentary scrutiny and, as I was in the process of telling the House, I cannot conceive of their being used in practice without a full parliamentary debate or without scrutiny after the event of how they had been exercised in practice and of whether greater limitation should have been imposed on their use. There is no real parallel between the Bill and the Terrorism Act 2000 or the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act, as this is a purely enabling Bill.

Mr. Shepherd: But of course, the underlying anxiety is the very definition of what constitutes an emergency, which lies in the Government's hands and in the hands of the parliamentary majority that the Government normally have. With such a very loose definition of what constitutes an emergency, with the powers being so enormous and with the rights of scrutiny dependent on the Government—not necessarily this Government, because of course the Minister is arguing for a permanent Act—we want the greatest possible clarity about why all that is appropriate.

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman should reflect on the fact that not only does Parliament have the power to amend the regulations, which is an exceptional provision and additional safeguard that strengthens the robustness of the scrutiny process, but the emergency regulations contain their own sunset clause: they lapse 30 days after they are made and fresh parliamentary approval must be required if further regulations are to be made. One could speculate about the composition of a Parliament that would somehow override the rule of law and the detailed safeguards in the Bill, but I would argue that that would be a function of the will of Parliament and the extremism of Members of Parliament, rather than anything to do with the functions of the Bill.

The Bill contains far more safeguards than its predecessors. It contains provision for detailed parliamentary scrutiny and amendment by Parliament of its provisions. It also contains in-built sunset clauses on the use of the regulations. In summary, the Government simply cannot agree to these Lords amendments. We are replacing a long-standing, generic framework that is entirely unsuitable for sunsetting, and effective arrangements for parliamentary scrutiny are already set out in the Bill in relation to the regulations made under it.

Mr. Heald: The Government have improved the Bill in the other place, and I pay tribute to the work of my noble Friend Baroness Buscombe, who led for the Opposition in the other place and was able to persuade the Government to do some things that I had found it very difficult to persuade them to do in the House. She has obviously got some silky skills that I have not yet acquired. It was good that the Government were prepared to tighten the definition of an emergency. Although I accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), the definition is now better.

The Government now recognise the role of the voluntary sector—something that we have pressed for throughout our debates in Committee. The test for urgent directions under clauses 7 and 8 is more objective. That is good. Clause 7 directions will be made in writing—something that we pressed for in Committee. Again, that was a good change. The removal of clause 19(5)(a), which would have allowed a Minister to treat certain situations as coming under the definition of an emergency irrespective of whether they came within the categories set out in the Bill, and the recognition of the role of parliamentary and judicial scrutiny of emergency regulations under clause 22 were all to the good.

On these Lords amendments, however, we wish the Government to go further. In the other place, my noble Friend argued that clause 34 should contain the three new subsections in Lords amendment No. 50, to provide sunset provisions for part 2. After three years, part 2 would fall unless both Houses agreed to renew it, but if they agreed to a renewal, it would last for another three years. We are used to that approach in the context of emergency powers.

1.15 pm

Despite the Minister's comments, it was agreed from the outset that the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 should be subject to sunset provisions, as it contains some draconian powers in part 4 to allow the indefinite detention without charge of foreign nationals suspected of involvement with various terrorist bodies. Part 4 of that Act requires annual renewal by Parliament, and the provisions will expire altogether on 10 November 2006. Similarly, with the Northern Ireland situation, the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1973 provided for annual approval by Parliament, and those provisions have been carried into the Terrorism Act 2000, so there are precedents.

Mr. Hogg: The Army Act 1992.

Mr. Heald: My right hon. and learned Friend mentions the Army Act 1992, and there are others. In fact, the Government are committed to such procedures. In a document that deals with the agenda for the future of regulation in this country, the then Minister for the Cabinet Office said:

> "as part of their better regulation agenda, the Government are committed to using sunset clauses where appropriate."

Not only are there precedents, but the Government claim to have a policy to promote such provisions. We first made the proposal for a sunset provision in Committee. We have suggested various lengths of time that might be appropriate. The Government have refused to agree.

The powers in part 2 are draconian and warrant a sunset provision. We are not saying, as the Minister suggested, that civil contingencies legislation may no longer be necessary in three years' time, but the Minister acknowledges that, over time, the powers needed to tackle such situations change. That is why the Bill has been introduced. Given the effects of such a Bill on liberty, it is only right that the latest circumstances should be considered. After all, the reason why the Government introduced the Bill is: events and new circumstances.

Given that the Government accept that events and new circumstances can prompt and require a new response, it seems wrong that they are not prepared to follow that principle by accepting a sunset provision of the kind that we suggest. We will continue to press for such a provision to be included in the Bill, and I hope that Ministers, even in the short time available, will reflect on that and consider the seriousness of the powers that they are taking and how necessary it is to review them in due course.

Mr. Allan: I would echo the comments made by the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) about some of the improvements that have been made to the Bill, but we continue to have some concerns. The Liberal Democrats were open-minded in the debate that took place in the House of Lords. My colleague, Lord Avebury, made it clear that we were looking for some kind of review procedure, although not necessarily as proposed in the Lords amendment with which the Government now seek to disagree, but that we would not be happy if the provisions did not contain an ability independently to review the way in which the powers may be used. Unfortunately, the Minister in the House of Lords gave us nothing, so we made it clear that in lieu of there being no alternative, we would vote with the Conservatives to ensure that we kept the issue alive.

[Mr. Allan]

We suggested as an alternative the kind of procedure that is followed under the Terrorism Act 2000, whereby my noble Friend Lord Carlile has a statutory responsibility to review some of the provisions used under that Act. That is very useful. It has kept issues alive and on the political agenda that we fear would not otherwise have been kept alive so forcefully if the procedure had simply involved a Home Office Minister reporting on the powers under that Act. So we seek to support the principle of independent review in resisting the Government's attempts to remove the Lords amendments.

The Minister refers to the fact that part 2 should be used only in extremis, and we agree. We believe that it should be used in very few circumstances. Having gone to all the trouble to get the legislation on to the statute book, I for one would be delighted if it were 29 years before it is used. I would love to see the provisions not used at all, and to return on a triennial basis with a report simply making a nil return to say that the powers had not been used and that the legislation could therefore be allowed to continue.

Our fear, however, is that the powers in the Bill will not be used only in extremis. Ministers might be tempted to use them rather than go through the normal legislative procedures. Even in a case as serious as the attacks that took place in the United States on 11 September, we were able through the normal parliamentary procedures to introduce the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001. It was contentious, but it got through the House in reasonable time. Similarly, we responded to the foot and mouth crisis with legislation that is specifically about how we deal with animals in such a situation and that, I hope, will pre-empt the need for emergency regulations. Parliament has enacted legislation ahead of any potential crisis.

We want that approach to continue. The normal approach to an emergency should be either to foresee the emergency and have the legislation on the statute book so that the part 2 powers are not needed, or to come to the House to introduce legislation in the normal way, again so that the part 2 powers are not needed.

We believe that there might be a temptation—perhaps out of laziness or because Ministers do not want to use up their valuable slots for pre-emptive legislation—to fall back on the powers in the Bill. If such a mindset takes hold, the powers may be used inappropriately as an earlier port of call than they should be. We see them very much as a last resort that should be used in extremis. The triennial review proposed in the amendment would be a good way to address those genuine concerns.

If, as the Minister suggested, the powers were not used at all, the process involved in the amendment would be very speedy. The Government would say that they had not used the powers and the House would simply renew the legislation and provide the powers for the next three years. Off we would go. If the Government had used the powers, the amendments would allow us to hold an independent session in which all we would debate is whether the powers had been used appropriately. We would not be confronted by an emergency at the time of the debate.

Mr. Heald: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that a great deal of thought has been given recently to how legislation should be dealt with? The report of the Constitution Committee in another place proposes much more post-legislative scrutiny. If we are dealing with draconian powers such as those in the Bill, they are the obvious candidates for such an approach. A sunset clause is the obvious way of forcing post-legislative scrutiny.

Mr. Allan: The hon. Gentleman has expressed my sentiments effectively. We are at one on this. We are seeking to find a way of monitoring the Bill, because it is potentially so powerful. Because we fear that it will be used more frequently than is strictly necessary, we want to be able to return to it. The Minister suggests that we can do that when we are confronted with an emergency or discussing the detail of regulations that are there to deal with that emergency. However, to suggest that we will be calmly stepping back and reviewing all the possible legislative options that the Government could have used instead of the emergency legislation is fantastical. We will not do that. When the House is confronted with an emergency and a Minister says that we need emergency regulations, the reality is that the regulations will go through using the Government's majority. There simply will not be the scope to take the constitutional or long view that we would need to challenge Ministers as to whether they strictly need to use the part 2 powers in the Bill.

We need the opportunity to return to the powers every three years. As the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire said, the advantage of the sunset clause is that it would force such a review in a way that no other provision could. That is a sensible way forward in that it establishes the point of principle that such powers must be scrutinised separately from the debates around specific regulations.

Mr. Hogg: I support my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan).

The Minister conceded—indeed, she had to concede—that sunset clauses are unusual. They are unusual, but so are the powers in the Bill. It would be difficult to imagine a Bill that was more dramatic in the powers that it confers on the Executive. They powers are contained in clause 22(3) which, apart from anything else, states:

> "Emergency may make provision of any kind that could be made by Act of Parliament or by the exercise of the Royal Prerogative".

The powers extend to

> "the confiscation of property (with or without compensation)",

the prohibition of movements, the prohibition of assemblies, the deployment of the armed forces, the prohibition of travel, the prohibition of specified activities, disapplying or modifying any enactment, requiring a person or body to act in performance of a function, and so on and so on. In other words, the Bill gives to the Executive of the day powers of a wholly draconian—and I would say authoritarian—character.

The question is whether we should so conduct ourselves as to leave the Bill in perpetuity on the statute book or give ourselves the opportunity from time to time to review whether such a Bill should be on the statute book. I have no doubt that we should review it from time to time.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam made the point—he is entirely right—that Governments may well be moved to use the powers in circumstances that it is difficult to justify as falling strictly within the definition of clause 19. All of us know that Governments like to use powers that exist, and I ask myself whether the Government might not have been willing to use the powers for the confiscation of property without compensation if they had been able to do so when the foot and mouth crisis was at its height.

One has to ask oneself some uncomfortable questions. The first is, "Do you trust any Government?" or, if one wants to be more particular, "Do you trust this Government?" I remind myself of the circumstances in which we were taken to war in Iraq. We were told facts that turned out not to be accurate. I happen to believe that Ministers knew or ought to have known that they were not accurate, but that is a matter for historians or perhaps an impeachment motion in the House. My point is that to the question, "Do you trust the Government?", the only sensible answer has to be, "No, under no circumstances." If that is true, the House had better equip itself with a mechanism for reviewing the powers.

We have also asked why we should not have such a mechanism, but I did not hear the answer to that question. I heard lots of evidence of unwillingness, but that is a very different matter. That is not a justification; it is sheer unwillingness.

Are there any procedural difficulties? No, because Lords amendment No. 50 requires only a positive resolution in both Houses. That would take only an hour or two, but it would enable the political debate to focus on the Bill so that we can ask whether we need a different definition of an emergency, whether particular powers should remain on the statute book, and whether additional safeguards should be incorporated in statutory language. We are being denied that ability.

The Minister tells us that the regulations have their own inherent sunset clauses. That is true in part, but it will have not escaped her, no doubt sharp, eye that the regulations can be relaid time and time again. The sunset clause of which she spoke is not perhaps as robust a safeguard as she might have hoped that we would believe.

As you may have noticed, Mr. Speaker, I am becoming increasingly cantankerous with age. I find my distrust of Government is becoming more and more intense, especially since Iraq. I would not give any Government—least of all, this Government—the powers that are in this Bill and, in particular, in clause 22. I very much hope that we will have a sunset clause.

Mr. Shepherd: The Damascene conversion that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) has undertaken during his travels through the House illuminates the sky and gives us hope.

My difficulty with the Minister's words was her response that the measure would be inappropriate in the context of such a Bill. I am especially mindful that the Government have already derogated from the Human Rights Act 1998, which they enacted, and that that derogation may occur if our country faces an emergency that threatens the life of the nation. We are already in a position in which the Government may say that life is threatened, but they have managed their business in the years since that Act came into existence without recourse to the new permanent structure without end that they now want.

1.30 pm

I accept the points made by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) because the Bill is detailed, comprehensive and iron-clad to such an extent that it is inappropriate for a democratic country and a democratic House. The route that he outlined matched my judgment on how emergencies should be dealt with. Legislation on such matters should be introduced on a case-by-case basis and considered in a day, as has often been the case during my time in the House. However, that process requires the danger or peril facing the life of the nation to be self-evident to such an extent that the House will accede to that legislation.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend will remember the old Northern Ireland emergency legislation that had to be renewed annually. Will he remind himself and the House of the fact that the Labour party welcomed the opportunity to oppose that legislation year after year?

Mr. Shepherd: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend because the propositions of the Government could be tested annually on such occasions and, indeed, the then Opposition made full use of that opportunity.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): May I amplify my hon. Friend's point because he is anticipating something that I was going to say? Does he agree that the Terrorism Act 2000 supersedes and subsumes the Northern Ireland legislation to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) referred? A feature of this Government is their tendency towards permanence.

Mr. Shepherd: My hon. Friend is right and his point forms a substantial part of my case. As the Minister well knows, the House unfortunately did not have the opportunity to discuss part 2 of the Bill, so all the powers that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham cited are, in a sense, strange to a debate in which every hon. Member may speak. We are running at a gallop on the back of Lords amendments, which I shall support, although I think that they are inadequate. That explains why there is great reluctance to accept the Bill in such a permanent form.

Mr. Heald: My hon. Friend will recall that a great raft of amendments was not considered on Report because of the guillotine. The proposal before us was among the amendments that were not considered at the time. Does he agree that it is a sad reflection of the present situation that the other place must do our job?

Mr. Shepherd: All that is true. In fact, the situation is worse than my hon. Friend described it, because the whole of part 2 was not considered.

Mr. Hogg: May I suggest to my hon. Friend that the inclusion of a sunset clause would allow the House to consider part 2 in detail for the first time? We were denied that opportunity under the guillotine to which my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) referred.

Mr. Shepherd: That is true. We would be able to consider the provisions after three years, although we have not yet been able to consider them for five minutes. We are considering a piece of primary legislation that will create a framework that will affect the rights for which the House has fought for centuries. We had annual Army Acts so that we could control the supply of money to the Crown to ensure that the Crown could not do that which we did not want. The same important point is relevant to the Bill. The Government should not shrug off our anxieties and complaints. They could bring forward individual pieces of legislation. They could have addressed our point. Although I think that there should be an annual review, I shall gladly support their lordships' amendments.

Mr. Cash: I agree with many of the points that hon. Members have made. The Bill, with its power to deal with enactments with such a broad brush, is Orwellian in its range and depth. The permanence of the arrangements takes us way beyond "1984" into the indefinite future. There are profound reasons why we should object to such infringement of the liberty of the people of this country and Parliament.

I said that the Terrorism Act 2000 subsumed and superseded the temporary provisions imposed on Northern Ireland under the Acts passed between 1989 and 1996. However, when my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) talked about a standing army, he might not have known—although knowing him, I am sure that he did—that his point went straight to the heart of the Bill of Rights. The Bill of Rights is regarded as a permanent safeguard, but this Bill will not cover it. No doubt we shall later consider the interaction between the Bill and the Human Rights Act 1998, which is a temporary palliative because it may be amended or repealed, and the Bill of Rights, which any person in this country would regard as the bulwark of our liberty.

Article 6 of the Bill of Rights says:

> "the raising or keeping of a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of Parliament, is against law".

That was why we required the Army Acts to which my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills referred. The provision in article 9 is fundamental to the proceedings of the House. It says:

> "the freedom of speech and debates or proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament".

The Bill will override the most fundamental aspects of liberty and freedom in this country. As there is not at least a sunset clause to guarantee that the powers be reviewed regularly, I condemn the Bill's provisions for their lack of liberty and permanence and I condemn the intolerant, totalitarian thinking behind them. The Labour party is supposed to be the descendant of Tom Paine and "The Rights of Man". The Bill is a disgrace.

Ruth Kelly: We have had a passionate and interesting debate, although I think that most of the arguments expressed by Conservative Members reflected their fundamental disagreement with the Bill itself, rather than their view that a sunset clause would be the most appropriate way to deal with the situation before us.

The Bill has been drafted to enable future emergencies to be covered flexibly under it. The provisions are sufficiently flexible to ensure that specific supply systems or facilities may be covered under the definition of an emergency when serious damage to human welfare is threatened. It also allows examples about which we are not yet aware to be addressed. However, specific powers will be contained in regulations issued under the Bill, so any debate on the Bill itself would be only a rerun of our debates throughout its consideration in the House and the other place.

Mr. Allan: Does the hon. Lady appreciate that a debate on the Bill some three, six or nine years after it has come into force—after which we might know about circumstances in which it was used—would be different from today's debate, because we are currently discussing our fears due to the fact that we do not know the way in which the Bill will be used? We are asking for the opportunity to debate the Bill after we know how it has been used in practice.

Ruth Kelly: The Bill itself does not restrict individual liberty. It is the provisions made by the regulations that may infringe or restrict civil liberties. I have outlined the safeguards, which are in the Bill and include detailed parliamentary scrutiny under the regulations.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Lady is right when she says that individual prohibitions are contained in regulations, but she is bound to concede that the powers are created in clause 22(3). Whether Ministers should be able, through regulations, to do this and that does lie on the face of the Bill. It is that which we need to review.

Ruth Kelly: The Bill, which we have debated for a while, has far more safeguards built into it than the Emergency Powers Act 1920, which it replaces. The triple lock is the cornerstone of the safeguards set out in the Bill. Three stringent tests must be met if emergency powers are to be used. First, the emergency must be serious and require immediate action. Secondly, it must be necessary to take emergency powers, such as when it is not possible to introduce a Bill in the usual way; that deals with one of the points raised by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan). Thirdly, emergency regulations must be proportionate to the aspect or effect of the emergency at which they are directed.

A range of additional safeguards is on top of that triple lock—we shall debate that in other groups of amendments—as well as the automatic safeguards of the public test of reasonableness and the provisions of the European convention on human rights, which apply to all legislation.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Lady refers to the test of reasonableness. Hopefully she will be aware of the case of Liversidge v. Anderson in the late 1940s, in which the question of reasonableness, which had been imported into regulation 18B of the defence regulations, came into question. Where is the test of reasonableness expressly stated in respect to the application of the powers? Furthermore, does she agree that Lord Diplock and a series of other judges said that the case of Liversidge v. Anderson was bad law? I asked in Committee for that to be examined, but I do not think that it was.

Ruth Kelly: I have had no indication from business managers that there was insufficient time to discuss that in Committee. The public law test of reasonableness applied to the 1920 Act and will continue to apply. We would agree that the case the hon. Gentleman cites is bad law, but it is not necessary to provide for a test of reasonableness on the face of the Bill.

I outlined the additional safeguards on top of those that applied to the 1920 Act. We will go on to debate the need for emergency regulations to be compatible with the Human Rights Act and whether that is a sufficient safeguard. I would argue that it is, but that will be discussed in the next group of amendments.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The Bill envisages a vast and unwarranted arrogation of powers from Parliament to the Executive. Why does clause 20(3)(c) include Government Whips as the persons entitled to make regulations?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman will find that senior Ministers are able to carry that out in some circumstances.

Mr. Bercow: I do not want to encroach on private grief, and, equally, far be it from me to settle the hon. Lady's disputes with Government Whips, but I hope she realises that reference to Government Whips includes senior Ministers and the other way around. The Government Whips would have that power under the terms of the Bill. They are rejoicing in it. It is up to her either to apologise for it or to explain it satisfactorily.

1.45 pm

Ruth Kelly: I remind the hon. Gentleman that a reference to senior Ministers includes Lords Commissioners.

Mr. Bercow: I told the Minister that.

Ruth Kelly: So the hon. Gentleman accepts that, and Lords Commissioners are indeed senior Ministers.

Mr. Hogg: They are not.

Ruth Kelly: They certainly are. We are not talking about junior Ministers. There needs to be a fall-back position in case Her Majesty the Queen cannot act in a timely fashion. The process set out in the Bill has been followed in other cases.

Mr. Shepherd: This is an important point, although relatively small. We understood that the inclusion of Treasury Ministers or Lords Commissioners was to allow for a direct reference to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. No one would have difficulty with that. However, the Bill as drafted includes the first three Whips from the Whips Office. There is something ludicrous about Whips who never speak in the House being able to amend primary legislation.

Ruth Kelly: The Government are following conventional procedure when Her Majesty is unable to act in a timely fashion for whatever reason. I think the hon. Gentleman would agree that the inclusion of Lords Commissioners is not the core of the debate.

Mr. Heald: Will the Minister give way?

Ruth Kelly: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to address the point.

The question is whether the Bill should be subject to a sunset clause after a period of time or whether it falls into the same category as the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001. Let me explain the difference. Under the Act, things are being done—perhaps as we speak—such as the detention of foreign nationals who are suspected of being terrorists and the sharing of relevant confidential information between Customs and Excise or the Inland Revenue and the intelligence services. In other words, there is something to review—the action that has taken place under that Act—after two years of its operation. We hope that part 2 of the Bill remains unused for many years to come. The legislation that it replaces remained unused for 29 years.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con) rose—

Ruth Kelly: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will let me finish my point. What would the review team review unless and until emergency regulations were made? The debate and the review would merely be a rerun of the debates in the course of the Bill's passage. If regulations are made, they will be scrutinised in depth by Parliament at that time.

The hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) suggested that the Cabinet Office and the Government are promoting the use of sunset clauses. I do not differ from him in that. In fact, I am the Minister with responsibility for better regulation and know about promoting the use of sunset clauses in government. Cabinet Office guidelines—I have taken the trouble to look them up—say that sunset clauses should be used where appropriate. They also set out a long list of when that might be appropriate. I shall read out just two items that might interest the hon. Gentleman were he making this point. Examples include—I say this to argue that they should not be used in future—measures extending the powers of the state or reducing civil liberties, reserve powers that may never be used or bodies that are set up but not immediately given any powers to do anything. One might argue that those are relevant to this debate; it could be argued that part 2 of the Bill extends the powers of the state or reduces civil liberties.

I would argue, however, that the need for any regulations made under the Bill to be approved by Parliament offsets any argument that the Bill itself should contain a sunset clause. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that sunset clauses are appropriate for the regulations, which is why I pointed out to the House that there is an in-built sunset clause; the regulations will lapse 30 days after they are made. The House can shorten that time if it wants to.

Another hon. Gentleman—I am afraid that I forget exactly who it was—argued that the existence of an in-built sunset clause does not prevent the Government from laying another set of emergency regulations. But if that were done, the whole process of parliamentary scrutiny would have to be gone through again; and the triple lock would apply; and the debate would have to take place; and in that debate there would undoubtedly be an evaluation of how the powers in the Act and the regulations had been used.

Mr. Heald: Does not the Minister understand the distinction, which I have been making throughout the debate, that if a Whip were, on a regular basis, stationing an armed person at the end of one's road to stop one's movement, one might want, after three years, to review the operation of the Act, as it may be that on one occasion that action was justified?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to have much faith in the concept of Parliament, which is here to scrutinise the exercise of the regulations and decide whether the triple lock applies and whether the powers exercised are appropriate and reasonable. That is why the triple lock is set out, and Parliament has the power not only to debate but to amend the regulations to ensure that they are being used in an appropriate fashion.

I believe that Parliament can be quite effective in scrutinising the Government from time to time. I believe that Parliament would not be shy of criticising or constraining the Government were it, for example, to consider that a situation was not an emergency, that the range of powers should be narrowed or that the powers were being exercised in an unreasonable way that was not consistent with the nature of the emergency. I would not expect Parliament to be any less effective in scrutinising emergency regulations than it is in other cases; in fact, I would hope and expect it to be more effective and assiduous in scrutinising those regulations.

Mr. Cash: I fear that in her response to my previous intervention the Minister completely failed to understand the point that I was making about the test of reasonableness, and she really must take it on board. Under article 18B of the defence regulations there was a test of reasonableness, but it was overridden in the view of Lords Diplock, Scarman and Reid as being bad law. That is the point; if we do not have an express test of reasonableness, the liberty of the subject is severely at risk. The Minister made the point that she wanted proper, effective scrutiny, but she walks away from it when it is offered.

Ruth Kelly: I beg to disagree. There is a public law test of reasonableness in the Bill. It does not have to be shown in the Bill; it will still apply to the Bill. The safeguards set out in the Bill are far, far stronger than those that applied under the 1920 Act, legislation that was not used by any Government for 29 years. It lay on the statute book untouched.

The safeguards that we have built into the Bill are far stronger. They include a triple lock on the use of the powers, making sure that the legislation could not simply be taken through Parliament and that the use of the powers must be reasonable and proportionate. Those are strong safeguards, and there are additional ones built into the Bill; for example, one that will protect compatibility with the Human Rights Act 1998, which we are about to debate in the next group of amendments.

The Bill will not somehow become unnecessary after a period. Sunset clauses are appropriate if a situation is to come to an end after a short period. That is why we have included express provision for sunsetting in the use of the regulations. It is why we have also provided, exceptionally, for enhanced parliamentary scrutiny in the exercise of the regulations. It is why I argue, too, on behalf of the Government, that sunsetting for the Bill itself is not appropriate.

Question put, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Clause 22

SCOPE OF EMERGENCY REGULATIONS

Lords amendment: No. 41

Ruth Kelly: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this we may discuss Lords amendment No. 42 and Lords amendment No. 46, with amendment (a) thereto.

Ruth Kelly: The Government amended the Bill in the other place to reinforce three key areas of protection against the possible misuse of emergency powers: first, protection of fundamental rights; secondly, protection of the limitations and safeguards on the use of the powers; and thirdly, protection of parliamentary scrutiny and judicial review where those are affected by the emergency or by response efforts. I remind the House that that presents us with a particular challenge, balancing on one hand the rights of the individual and proper protections for our democratic institutions, and on the other the ability of Government to take action for the collective good in the most serious of emergencies. We now accept that the Bill has been improved by the other place, but because we believe that we have struck the right balance, we will not accept the Opposition's attempt to reintroduce proposals that were long debated in the other place and ultimately rejected.

It is important to be clear from the outset about the function of emergency powers and the safeguards in the Bill to prevent their misuse. Emergency powers exist to make temporary changes to the law, as we have just debated, where effective response is prohibited by insufficient powers or hindered by statutory requirements. Any regulations made will be temporary and can be made only for the purposes of preventing, controlling or mitigating an aspect or effect of the emergency in question. They must be necessary and proportionate, compatible with the Human Rights Act and will be scrutinised by Parliament.

The possibility of temporarily amending legislation of constitutional importance was examined in detail both by the Joint Committee that undertook pre-legislative scrutiny of the Bill and during debates in both Houses. Discussions have also taken place with civil liberties groups. The Government, too, are concerned that emergency powers should not be used to make substantive amendments that undermine the constitution of the United Kingdom. We are satisfied that the Bill cannot be used for that purpose, given the absence of any express power to do so. In the light of concerns expressed by civil liberties groups and by Members of both Houses, the Government looked again at the position of the Human Rights Act 1988. We remain convinced that nothing in the Bill would allow the Government to disapply or amend it. However, an express provision to the effect that emergency regulations cannot disapply or modify any provision in the Human Rights Act would offer the certainty and reassurance that is sought.

It has always been the Government's intention that emergency regulations should be entirely compatible with the Human Rights Act and should not be used to modify or suspend it. We believe that, unlike other pieces of constitutionally significant legislation, the Human Rights Act sets out the relationship between the individual and the state that is at the heart of the operation of emergency powers and fundamental to concerns about their possible use. Our acceptance of express protection in the case of the Human Rights Act must not be seen as casting doubt on the fact that emergency powers cannot be used to make substantive amendments to constitutionally important enactments, an issue discussed at length in Committee and in another place. We are convinced that the absence of specific protection for that Act would not allow its disapplication or modification.

Mr. Heald: The hon. Lady will know that, throughout our previous proceedings, we said that the provision that she has now made for the Human Rights Act was needed. It is hard to see why the same principle should not apply to habeas corpus or the Bill of Rights. Can she make a distinction between the Human Rights Act on the one hand and the Bill of Rights and habeas corpus on the other?

Ruth Kelly: The Bill of Rights was passed to declare the rights and liberties of the people and to ensure the succession to the throne. With the passing of the Human Rights Act and the Regency Acts, those intentions are effectively protected. Many of the protections set out in the Bill of Rights have been overtaken by the Human Rights Act, and others, such as the protection given to Protestants to prevent them from being disarmed when "papists" are both armed and employed, contrary to the law, are no longer relevant. Other protections in the Bill of Rights, such as the prohibition on raising tax or keeping a standing army in peacetime without the consent of Parliament are simply not things a Government could claim are reasonable, necessary and proportionate under the terms of the Civil Contingencies Bill, given that the purpose of emergency powers is to provide temporary new powers to prevent, control or mitigate emergencies because existing powers are insufficient.

Mr. Hogg: I welcome the fact that the Minister has told the House that the Human Rights Act will be protected, and cannot be amended under the Bill. That is good news. However, can powers and articles in the Human Rights Act be relied upon as a means of attacking the regulations made under the Bill? In other words, can the rights enshrined in the articles of the Human Rights Act be asserted against the regulations?

Ruth Kelly: I certainly can provide the right hon. and learned Gentleman with that assurance. While we did not think it necessary to accept express protection for the Human Rights Act, we thought that so doing would provide additional certainty and reassurance to people who were concerned about how the Bill might be used. That is the spirit in which we acted, and our acceptance of that protection does not in any way undermine or cast doubt on the fact that emergency powers cannot be used to make substantive amendments to other constitutionally important enactments.

Mr. Cash: I hope that the Minister does not disagree with the proposition that the Human Rights Act is not an entrenched constitutional provision. In fact, in the case of Simms and O'Brien, Lord Hoffmann, a great advocate of human rights, the former Lord Chancellor, Lord Irvine of Lairg, and the Home Secretary all said that the Human Rights Act could be amended or repealed. It is therefore not the entrenched provision that the Minister has sought to claim is a bulwark for liberty.

2.15 pm

Ruth Kelly: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's analysis. The reasons why the Government believe that express protection for constitutional enactments is unnecessary are set out in detail in our response to the report by the Joint Committee, and were outlined by the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) in Committee. They have also been set out in the other place.

In summary, legislation does not operate in isolation, and must be seen in the context of our wider constitutional law. There are two key presumptions—first, it is important to remember that a power to make secondary legislation would be interpreted in light of the purpose of the power. Secondly, in considering the scope of the power to modify enactments, it is important to acknowledge the status accorded to enactments of constitutional importance in recent judicial announcements. In that regard, Thoburn v. Sunderland city council, known as the metric martyrs case, is the clearest precedent. In the light of recent cases such as that one, the Government believe that the courts will expect Parliament to use clear language before delegating the power to make substantive amendments to the Human Rights Act or a provision of constitutional importance to the Executive. Applying those presumptions to the Bill, it does not expressly permit emergency regulations to modify enactments such as the Human Rights Act, and it makes it clear that the purpose of the power is to prevent, control or mitigate the emergency.

Mr. Bercow: I understand very clearly that the Human Rights Act will stay on the statute book, but I seek the same assurance as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg). After the passage of the emergency powers, will it remain a robust vehicle for protecting citizens' rights? Will the Minister confirm that, following the passage of such powers, citizens' rights to pursue cases under the Human Rights Act in respect of the application of those powers will remain unaltered and undiminished?

Ruth Kelly: I can certainly confirm that that will be the case.

Mr. Shepherd: The hon. Lady is making the case that the Human Rights Act is entrenched, so it is appropriate to name it in the Bill. However, it is not entrenched, because primary legislation passed by the House could do away with it. That route would be open to the Government if they were dissatisfied with the Habeas Corpus Act 1816, the Bill of Rights, the Act of Settlement 1700 or any of the measures listed in the amendment. We are seeking protection for what are considered fundamental steps in our march to liberty. There is nothing distinctive about the Human Rights Act apart from the fact, the hon. Lady suggests, that primary legislation is required to amend, change or repeal it. However, her case is not a good one, because the same argument applies to the other measures.

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman, to give him his due, makes an extremely good point that the Human Rights Act is not entrenched, as it could be overturned by primary legislation. He also puts his finger on the fact that that could not be done with emergency powers. The House would have to debate the matter and use primary legislation to change the Act.

Mr. Hogg: I should know the answer, but will the hon. Lady confirm that the Government can derogate from the Human Rights Act without coming to the House? In other words, if an article in the Act is thought embarrassing in the context of the regulations, a Minister could derogate from it.

Ruth Kelly: Let me reiterate the point about the safeguards in the Bill. The Human Rights Act could not be altered, as I understand it, through emergency regulation. If it becomes appropriate to change it and the way in which it operates, that would be done through primary legislation. At that point, I would expect protection for the Act to be reconsidered. If there were to be a derogation from the Act, there would have to be an order approved by both Houses, so that, too, is an essential safeguard in the Bill.

Mr. Bercow: The Minister has made effective use of additional information timeously provided. She said that, in the circumstances envisaged, another Order in Council would be required, and she invoked that point as evidence that there would be parliamentary scrutiny. Can she confirm that that new Order in Council would be capable of debate?

Ruth Kelly: I can confirm that the order would be subject to the safeguard to which the hon. Gentleman refers. It would be debated by both Houses and would have to be approved by both Houses. If not, it would fall. That is a critical safeguard.

We have accepted the arguments that were made in the other place that protection in the case of the Human Rights Act should be made explicit. We do not think that that is a necessary protection, but it is desirable to create some degree of certainty on the matter.

Mr. Shepherd: I am grateful to the Minister, but we need greater clarity in respect of the point made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg). We are in a state of derogation, as a result of a ministerial decision—not a decision of the House, though the consequences were—that the life of the nation is currently threatened. On that basis, the Government set aside a contention in the Human Rights Act. All of this is outwith the cognisance of the Bill. That is what puzzles some of us and needs reconciliation. Primary legislation is indeed needed to change the Human Rights Act, but derogation from it is a ministerial, Executive or Crown function predicated on existing anti-terrorism laws and habeas corpus.

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman is really making a point about the interaction between Parliament and the Executive in this and other cases and the application of the Human Rights Act, rather than about something that applies solely to the exercise of emergency powers. I have made it clear that, under the emergency powers, the Human Rights Act would have to be respected.

I said that derogation would have to be approved by both Houses. There would be a debate and Parliament would have to be content that it was appropriate. I set out earlier, and in the previous debate, the additional safeguards that are in the Bill, compared with the predecessor legislation. I would argue that the safeguards go much further than the previous legislation and are appropriate.

Lords amendments Nos. 41 and 46 provide protection for part 2. It is important that part 2 should similarly be incapable of being amended by emergency powers in order to ensure that the tests and protection that it contains cannot be amended. The Bill expressly provides that emergency regulations cannot be used to modify part 2. The Government have amended the Bill to move this prohibition from the clause on scope to the clause on limitations on emergency regulations, where it sits more naturally.

On amendment (a), the Government are convinced that no further pieces of legislation require express protection. Adding a list of constitutional enactments—we have already debated this point—to be protected from the amendment would only weaken the safeguards in the Bill. As a consequence of the way in which legislation is made, there is room for legitimate disagreement on which enactments contain provisions of constitutional importance, and we do not believe that it would be possible to prepare an accurate list of enactments that ought to be protected.

Take, for example, the devolution Acts. Some would argue that they are of great constitutional importance. Those less sympathetic to devolution may not agree. There are arguments both ways. The Acts alter the distribution of powers and the way that parts of the country are run. On the other hand, they do not affect the sovereignty of Parliament or the fundamental rights of individuals. There would be a danger that, if the list were not entirely comprehensive, a partial list in the Bill would undermine the protection of Acts that were not cited in it. Therefore we cannot accept the amendment on that point.

Mr. Heald: We welcome Lords amendment No. 42, which requires a person making emergency regulations to have regard to the importance of ensuring that Parliament, the High Court and the Scottish equivalent can conduct proceedings in connection with the regulations or actions taken under the regulations. The matter was raised in the other place by my noble Friend Baroness Buscombe and by other Conservative peers. It is good that the Government responded and Lords amendment No. 42 emerged. A little credit is due for that.

On Lords amendment No. 46, we have argued throughout the course of the Bill for the protection of a group of statutes to ensure that civil liberties are respected. On Report in this place, the debate was guillotined. In the other place, peers were able to find the time and minds were changed. The Government agreed to protect the Human Rights Act, saying that it was right to do that in the interests of certainty.

If it is right to do that for the Human Rights Act, we cannot understand the Government's approach when they say that it is not also right to do so in respect of the other important Acts of Parliament identified by the Joint Committee on Human Rights that we have suggested on previous occasions. The list has been narrowed by my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), who is proposing amendment (a). The Acts set out there are the bedrock of our constitution.

Ministers say that the provision is not required. They argue that, if there is no provision allowing amendment of constitutionally important legislation, it cannot take place. They said that about the Human Rights Act, and they changed their mind. If it is right to have that certainty and that declaratory effect for one important part of the bedrock of our constitution, why can we not do it for the others?

Mr. Shepherd: In the Government's responses to the Joint Committee on Human Rights, they cited a Law Lords judgment about constitutionally important Acts, such as the Human Rights Act. In other words, they identified one of those constitutionally important Acts. The other Acts listed in amendment (a) are undoubtedly constitutionally important and of equal standing to the Human Rights Act within the framework of law. There cannot in logic be an argument against the inclusion of the specified Acts.

Mr. Heald: My hon. Friend is right. How can the Government say that it is necessary in the interests of certainty to list a particular Act, and then say, "Oh, but we'd like to retain the uncertainty in respect of others."? I agree that that is an illogical position.

Mr. Allan: Amendment No. 46 seeks to make an important change to the Bill. My Liberal Democrat colleagues in another place would modestly lay some claim to having persuaded the Government to accept it. Throughout the course of the Bill we have argued for the importance of the Human Rights Act to be respected by it. During the Bill's passage through the House, we were able to secure another concession, so that in clause 20(5)(b)(iv) we now have a requirement for any regulations brought under part 2 to be certified as compliant with the Human Rights Act.

In a sense, amendment No. 46 is the other part of that—the braces to the belt. It states that any regulations introduced under part 2 must be compliant with the Human Rights Act, and that those regulations in turn cannot modify the Human Rights Act. That provides a certain amount of protection, such that any regulations under part 2 will have to be compliant with the Human Rights Act.

We believe that there is a particular status to the Human Rights Act. We as a party are constitutionalists: we argue in favour of a written constitution. We do not have one and we do not expect the country to develop one between now and the end of this parliamentary Session, so we seek to develop some notion of a constitution in the legislation that comes before us. Although I am not a lawyer, I paid close attention to the words in the other place of my noble Friend Lord Lester of Herne Hill, who is an eminent lawyer in that area. He advanced a cogent case for the particular position of the Human Rights Act 1998 in English legislation.

Mr. Cash rose—

Mr. Allan: I shall give way to someone who is a lawyer.

2.30 pm

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that some people do not believe that Lord Lester was right to assert that the 1998 Act is adequate to deal with all those contingencies? I hope that he will not fall into the same trap as Lord Lester, who asserted that that was why the Liberal Democrat Opposition would not support the official Opposition in the House of Lords yesterday.

Mr. Allan: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point that disagreements remain. However, I must disappoint him by saying that the divergence on that particular issue between the Whigs in the Conservative party and the modern Liberal Democrats remains. We will not support amendment (a) because the nearest that we can get to a constitutional position is to continue to support and assert the supremacy of the 1998 Act, which acts as a kind of modern constitutional framework guaranteeing the rights of citizens in relation to the actions of the Executive.

We recognise that all legislation must be certified as compliant with the 1998 Act, which is a difference between the 1998 Act and other legislation referred to in amendment (a). The clearest way in which the part 2 provisions can proceed is to collect different Acts of Parliament, such as those in the amendment, and insert them into the Bill, but that will not give the ordinary citizen the safeguards that they are looking for on freedom from oppressive or inappropriate regulations. I accept the divergence of opinion and am sure that the hon. Gentleman will ably advance the argument for the inclusion of other legislation.

It is important that all those who are concerned about relations between the citizen and the state should seek to bolster and reinforce the 1998 Act rather than undermine it. Sadly, some of those who seek to challenge this Bill also sought to challenge the 1998 Act as an alien or foreign import. The provisions of the 1998 Act are important and all regulations should comply with them. Now that the 1998 Act cannot be altered by regulations, we have the best possible framework to guarantee the citizen's constitutional rights in respect of regulations. It would be better still if the Government were to introduce proposals on a written constitution meaning that the provisions of the 1998 Act cannot be overturned, even by a simple majority in Parliament. We would prefer such a constitutional system, but we have not got it. Amendment No. 46 takes us as near as we can get to clarity. Sadly, amendment (a) would not enhance that clarity, but it would dilute the 1998 Act's particular and special position.

Mr. Cash: Let there be no doubt that what Lord Lester said in the other place yesterday and what the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) has just said demonstrate the differences between us. Although the Government were pulled kicking and screaming to include the 1998 Act, the words that they sent to the Joint Committee on Human Rights when the Committee sought to include the 1998 Act in the first place were fairly derogatory.

The 1998 Act is inadequate in itself to deal with the questions. That brings us to an interesting issue, which is also exemplified by the Government's agreement to the charter of fundamental rights in the European constitution—dialogue is currently occurring between Strasbourg and Luxembourg on how to resolve that matter. The plain fact is that the charter of fundamental rights might have appeared in the Bill instead of the 1998 Act, or both of them might have been included. In both instances, it is assumed that the arrangements set out in those international treaties should effectively take supremacy over laws made in this Parliament according to constitutional arrangements that have developed over many centuries.

For example, we have just heard mention of habeas corpus. I have referred to the great authorities on that subject, in particular the chapter in Bradley and Ewing's "Constitutional and Administrative Law", which points out that, with respect to the question of habeas corpus, in the context of article 5(4) of the European convention on human rights, a divergence of view has developed. That divergence of opinion could be dealt with by amending section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 to add the forms of relief that may be granted in an application for judicial review.

We should have grave reservations about displacing the Habeas Corpus Act 1816 in favour of provisions emanating from the European convention on human rights. The Government hope that the European constitution will go through, in which case the charter of fundamental rights would be incorporated and exclusively adjudicated upon by the European Court. That would move us into completely different territory, because it would override the provisions contained in these enactments.

We are getting into deep waters, and, thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), I am glad that we have an opportunity to debate the matter at the last minute, because such debate has been excluded during the Bill's passage. I could enlarge on that matter, but we are running out of time, and I am extremely concerned that amendment (a) should make as much progress as possible.

Mr. Shepherd: The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) is right about Lord Lester, who was one of the progenitors of the 1998 Act and who, along with the Government, was instrumental in creating its form. My problem is not with the inclusion of the 1998 Act: Conservative Front-Bench Members and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam know that I submitted to the Committee, of which I was not a member, a list of Acts, of which the 1998 Act was one, and the Committee debated it. The purpose of amendment (a) is to provide the key instances in which the Government would require primary legislation to undermine some of the contentions of those Acts.

Mr. Hogg: The fact that the Bill entrenches and protects human rights legislation is important, because it will enable judges to interpret regulations against the background of the articles in the human rights legislation, which provides a degree of protection. I shall not go on, because the Minister must reply.

Ruth Kelly: I recognise the sincerity with which the points have been made in debate, but I argue that amendment (a) would weaken the protections inherent in the Bill, and, on behalf of the Government, I strongly feel that we should resist it.

The Government always intended the Bill to be compatible with the 1998 Act, and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) understands that point, but we welcome the additional certainty that has been created by its inclusion in the Bill. However hard one tries to agree a list of constitutionally important Acts that should be protected and put in the Bill, the list would quickly be superseded by other Acts and become redundant. Indeed, I believe that in some sense it could even subject the House to ridicule.

Perhaps more importantly, there is a real danger that any list of constitutional enactments, even were it agreed, will at some point be incomplete and partial. Such a list, which could not be amended, could lead a court to conclude that it was exhaustive and that Parliament envisaged that constitutional enactments not specified in the Bill could be amended by way of emergency regulation.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): I was on the Committee, but have held back from saying anything until now. I would say this to the Minister: first, the list could be expressed as not being exclusive; and secondly, she has just given the best justification for a sunset clause.

Ruth Kelly: Not at all. At any point in time—during an annual, a three-year or a five-year process—the list would, by its nature, be partial and incomplete, thereby weakening the safeguards inherent in the Bill. Once Parliament begins to list enactments that cannot be amended there is a real risk that a court could conclude that, notwithstanding the other provisions of the Bill, any enactment that is not on the list could be amended.

The Government remain convinced that the absence of an express power to amend constitutionally important legislation, coupled with the clear expression of the purposes for which regulations can be made and the safeguards in the Bill that I outlined, ensure that substantive amendments to such legislation are not possible by way of emergency regulation. I accept that that approach lacks the transparency of an express provision for each constitutional enactment in the Bill, and if we thought that we could protect them from inappropriate amendments by including them in the Bill, we would do so. Given that it is not possible to craft an amendment to the Bill that protects the constitutional fabric of the UK, it is better to rely on the implied effect of the Bill as drafted, which achieves the effect that we all wish for by ensuring that substantive amendments cannot be made to constitutional enactments.

I hope that I have made it clear to the House that any attempt to do otherwise would not offer the protection that we all seek, but could merely undermine the protection that is already there. Because this is such a serious matter, I would argue that it is very important that we do not accept the amendment on constitutional enactments and that the House accept the Government's position, which will ensure that the safeguards are maximised and that the constitution is as fully protected as possible.

Question accordingly negatived.

Lords amendment No. 46 agreed to.

Clause 2

DUTY TO ASSESS, PLAN AND ADVISE

Lords amendment: No. 7.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendment No. 56. I inform the House that privilege is involved in Lords amendment No. 7. If the House agrees the amendment, I shall arrange for the necessary entry to be made in the Journal.

Mr. Jamieson: The United Kingdom's resilience to disruptive challenges is already high. We have not been complacent. Since 11 September 2001, the Government have substantially increased the country's counter-terrorism efforts and improved contingency planning for and resilience to a range of emergencies. The amendments relate to the Government's powers to take effective action to protect the public and United Kingdom interests against acts of terror.

Amendment No. 56 comprises a group of changes in one amendment. Its purpose is to provide a clearer legal basis for regulating traffic to prevent or reduce the impact of vehicle-borne terrorist attacks, especially no-warning vehicle suicide bombings, with which, around the world, we have sadly become all too familiar. We need to be able to protect critical national infrastructure sites, iconic buildings, places hosting events such as intergovernmental conferences and diplomatic premises from the threat of vehicle-borne terrorist attacks. For some sites, traffic restrictions may have an important role to play as part of a counter-terrorist strategy.

We need traffic controls that put a distance between the detonation of a bomb and the target, to reduce the impacts of such an attack. Likewise, reducing speeds at which vehicles loaded with explosives can approach a target enhances defensive measures and can significantly lessen the impacts of an attack. Over the past three years a great deal of technical development has been undertaken to counter the threat of vehicle-borne suicide bombs.

The purpose of the Government's motion is to ensure that a clear legal framework is in place to control traffic and deploy the necessary measures. It amends the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 to enable anti-terrorist traffic regulation orders to be made by traffic authorities on the recommendation of the police; by providing for a Secretary of State override in order to direct a traffic authority to make such an order if it proves necessary; by enhancing existing police powers to control traffic in an emergency to cover terrorism or the prospect of terrorism; and by providing that traffic calming measures normally used to control vehicle speeds for road safety purposes, such as chicanes and pinch points, may also be used as anti-terrorist measures.

Our anti-terrorism efforts must not be hamstrung by doubts or hesitation about legal powers, the consequences of which could be devastating. It is therefore crucial that the measures be agreed today.

Lords amendment No. 7 relates to the Government's powers to require ports, airports and local authorities to purchase equipment designed to identify the presence of chemical, biological, radioactive or nuclear material—CBRN material—and to deploy it at ports and airports. As we demonstrated with the amendments relating to anti-terrorism traffic regulation orders, the Government are resolved to take the powers they need to combat terrorism.

I fully understand the points that were made in the other place. However, the Government already have the powers that their noble lordships have sought to confer on us with their amendment No. 7. Under the Airports Act 1986, the Secretary of State may give directions to the operators of airports in the interests of national security. The Aviation and Maritime Security Act 1990 gives the Government wide-ranging power to require port authorities to undertake screening and monitoring. Detailed requirements relating to maritime security have been adopted at an international level, particularly in the international ship and port facility security code, and at Community level, particularly in regulation 725/2004 on enhancing ship and port facility security. The requirements include provisions relating to security assessments for port facilities, provision of information and port facility plans. The provisions are enforced under the Ship and Port Facility (Security) Regulations 2004, under which ships and port facilities can be inspected to ensure that they comply with the Government's security requirements. Under clause 5 of the Bill an order could be made requiring local authorities—or any other category 1 responder—to perform their functions in a particular way. This could include the purchase and deployment of equipment that Lord Jopling suggested in the other place.

The powers that the amendment confers on the Government are therefore unnecessary and otiose. In addition, the new provisions could undermine the robust procedural safeguards set out in the existing powers. Existing legislation sets out in much greater detail the scope of the powers and the procedures to be followed when they are used. If left on the statute book, the provisions of their lordships' amendment would cause significant confusion.

I am sure that hon. Members will understand that, from the Government's point of view, the amendment simply would not make sense, and confusion over issues of implementing security arrangements are the last thing we would want.

Patrick Mercer: I am grateful for the opportunity to reply to the Minister, who has made a very clear case in terms of Lords amendments Nos. 56 and 7. If I deal with them in that order, I hope that that will be convenient.

I begin with Lords amendment No. 56. The Government continue to talk about a lack of complacency and a need for awareness of the new types of threat that we face today. It is reassuring, therefore, to hear that the threat of, in the colloquial phrase, suicide bombers is being looked at in more detail. It would be interesting to know exactly how far planning has gone within Government to counter the threat to, for example, the approach roads to critical national infrastructure sites, routes that are frequently used for chemical and radiological material, and other high profile targets and iconic targets around the country. Exactly what is being done to counter that threat?

[Patrick Mercer]

The Minister will be well aware of the pressure, particularly from the private sector, for security industries to help the wider police family in resisting such a threat and of the difficulty that the private security industry has encountered in training operatives to spot terrorist reconnaissance and the build-up to a suicide-type attack. I should be extremely interested to hear from the Minister not just the theory of this but the practice.

I entirely take the Minister's points about Lords amendment No. 7. I pay tribute to Lord Jopling and the points that he raised in another place, because they do, so to speak, hold the Government's feet to the fire on a series of different measures on which it would be quite incorrect to suggest that nothing has been done yet, but which have yet properly to be implemented in all our ports and all the different points of entry to this country.

Lord Jopling suggests that special equipment needs to be installed to monitor the contents of lorries, and that we need further special equipment designed to monitor persons, ships, other conveyances or other objects for radiological—I think that should be "radioactive"—material. The amendments also require local authorities and other public bodies to obtain specific static or mobile equipment that is designed to identify the presence of chemical material, biological organisms or radioactive substances that might be used in a terrorist attack.

Undoubtedly, the Government have done something about this. I do not want to go into the details of Project Cyclamen, because if I were to do so it might provide aid and succour to the enemies of this country. It is fair to say, however, that many of Lord Jopling's points have been at least partially addressed by Project Cyclamen and the installation of various bits of specialist equipment.

How thorough has the deployment of that equipment been? Can the Minister say for certain that all airports are covered? I take the point about the Airports Act 1986 and the Aviation and Maritime Security Act 1990. The fact remains, however, that with the exception of some areas we are wide open to equipment being brought into this country. I have no doubt that trials in the near future will provide a focus for the subject under discussion today.

I should be interested to hear from the Minister how far Project Cyclamen has got, how successful its implementation has been, exactly how far the Minister intends to extend it and whether, indeed, our airports are as thoroughly covered as Lord Bassam suggests in his reply to Lord Jopling.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Those of us who represent major ports have concerns about my hon. Friend's point about not going into the details of Project Cyclamen. Does he agree that it is important that those who live in the vicinity of airports and seaports know enough about these matters to be secure in their minds that the work is being done properly? At the moment, they do not have such knowledge, which is a serious worry.

Patrick Mercer: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his intervention, which underlines exactly the point that I am trying to make. I do not want to expose what I regard as loopholes in our defences under the project, but the fact remains that there is much that would be reassuring and deterring if the Government were to deploy more knowledge.

In many ways, what Lord Jopling proposes would require the Government to bring that information to the surface. A provision > "requiring local authorities and other public bodies to obtain specific static or mobile equipment which is designed to identify the presence of chemical material or biological organisms or radiological substances which might be used in a terrorist attack" would be particularly telling. For example, how much of that mobile equipment is currently in the hands of non-uniformed organisations? How much of it is in the hands of uniformed organisations whose personnel are not yet trained properly in how to use it? On top of that, how much have the Government thought about using the expertise of the 60,000-odd soldiers, sailors and airmen who are all trained to a greater or lesser extent in this field? I suggest that the answer is not very much at all.

The comments that Lord Bassam made in reply to my noble Friend Lord Jopling therefore leave me slightly baffled. Lord Bassam said:

> "The resilience to disruptive challenges is already high. There is a strong tradition of effective planning and response at the local level and 30 years of Northern Ireland terrorism has established a capability within Government and an awareness among businesses and the public which puts the UK in a comparatively strong position. But we are not complacent. Since 11 September 2001, the Government have substantially increased the country's counter-terrorism efforts and have improved contingency planning and resilience to a range of emergencies.—[Official Report, House of Lords, 9 November 2004; Vol. 666, c. 782.]

I do not think so. Will the Minister tell us how many practical exercises the Government have carried out in resilience terms? I am not referring to table-top or command post exercises. How many practical exercises have there been of the sort that do not take place on a Sunday morning or in a barracks or another controlled area and in which there is a realistic level of civilian traffic, both pedestrian and vehicle, trains are running and there is a realistic amount of congestion to deal with? The answer is not one.

Will the Minister look closely at the amendments? I believe that they have great merit, and it appals me that Lord Bassam's reply concentrates on 30 years of terrorism in Northern Ireland and effective planning and response at a local level. All that is completely behind the curve.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Following up the question of my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), is my hon. Friend not of the view that, if the Government were a bit more forthcoming with information and about the availability of technology and equipment that could trace and identify the sort of matter or products involved, including nuclear chemicals and other such materials, it would be not only a huge reassurance to those of us who represents constituencies with a major airport nearby—in my case, it is Manchester international airport—but a deterrent to those who might think of smuggling into this country the material that our noble Friend Lord Jopling sought to deal with in his amendments?

Patrick Mercer: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention, which again underlines the point that I am trying to make. In Committee, we suggested to the Government that there should be an effective method of informing the public not only of the threat, but of what they should do in the event of the threat of an attack or an actual attack. The Government told us that that proposal was completely unnecessary, that it was scaremongering and that it would be doing the terrorist's job for him. Within weeks of making those comments, however, they issued a booklet—it did not go to every household in the country, although they tried to ensure that it did—trying to address precisely those points. As he says, they could go much further in terms of reassurance and in terms of the next leg of the argument—training the public in how to deal with the threat that is in front of them.

In conclusion, I would be extremely pleased to hear the Minister accept the points that my noble Friend Lord Jopling has made for the simple reason that the amendments would underline the inadequacy of the Government's response at the moment and require them to produce a wholly better and more cohesive policy in future.

3.15 pm

Mr. Allan: The Minister has set out a sensible case in respect of Lords amendment No. 56. We should spell out in legislation the way in which highways alterations will take place for the purposes of civil contingencies, and it is sensible to include such provision in the Bill.

Lords amendment No. 56 adds up to more than three pages of additional text in a 30-odd page Bill, so 10 per cent. of the Bill could be taken up in dealing with quite a minor issue. Having been in local government, I cannot help but reflect that, just as we love to spell out everything in traffic regulations in intimate and minute detail, down to the width of double yellow lines, when we come to try to define in law how we can make alterations for the purposes of anti-terrorism, we seem similarly to be required to spell everything out in minute detail to give appropriate legal authority. None the less, the provisions are unremarkable in what they are seeking to achieve.

On Lords amendment No. 7, the Liberal Democrats are running counter to the thrust of the debate so far today, in which we have been seeking to limit the Government's powers and tie their hands to a degree. Lords amendment No. 7 offers the Government an additional permissive power to make regulations. The Minister said they could already introduce such regulations, but the amendment, which was moved by Lord Jopling but had the support of my Liberal Democrats as well as the official Opposition, seeks to spell out the way in which the Government can make regulations in respect of the protective measures that need to be taken to prevent harmful materials from coming through ports and so on.

I thought that the Minister helped to strengthen the case for the amendment in his speech. He referred to all the existing measures that require ports and various other people to take the sort of measures that we are talking about. There is, however, quite a complex web of regulatory powers, and it might be helpful for a comprehensive Civil Contingencies Bill to spell out that the regulations affecting the ports authorities and everybody else should fall within the overall framework. They may have to meet other legal requirements anyway, but having one port of call would be helpful, and part 1 could effectively say to responders, "These are your duties and responsibilities." Including in those responsibilities protection, scanning and the purchase and provision of equipment for detecting the noxious substances might be helpful. It would not mean that those involved did not have other legal responsibilities; it would simply mean that the civil contingencies regulations were pulled together in one place.

The Minister may say that the Government will take such action anyway, but the purpose of the amendment is sensible; it seeks to highlight those issues and include them in the Bill. If we send back reasons why we disagree with the Lords—the Government will command the majority to ensure that that happens—I hope that the Government can give additional reassurances in discussions in another place that the issue is covered. The fact that it is covered in other disparate measures is not sufficient reason for it not to be mentioned in the big, comprehensive measure before us today, which seeks to cover all eventualities. Not including such reference will leave a gap that Lords amendment No. 7 tries sensibly to plug.

Mr. Gummer: When the Minister replies to my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer), I hope that he will also bear it in mind that, on the other side of the issue, there is considerable disquiet about actions that are unnecessary, otiose or intrusive. I say again that it is outrageous that, for example, it would be impossible to drive around Grosvenor square. It is unacceptable that such a restriction should be imposed. I think that it is illegal, although I have found it impossible to get an answer from the Government as to whether a proper case has been made under present legislation. The situation is similar with regard to the road behind the embassy. If an embassy cannot operate in a way that enables the rest of the world to go about its business, we should ask ourselves whether it is in the right place. I wish we would apply the same criterion abroad, to avoid an unacceptable impact on the public.

I hope the Minister will reassure us that the measures will be used for their intended purpose, and not for purposes of aggrandisement or interference. Will he also have a look at measures that have already been implemented, which I consider both unnecessary and intrusive? As I have said, I should like him to look into the measures that we take abroad as well as those taken in this country, especially in regard to embassies.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I want to follow up the points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer). I fear that the powers in the Bill could well be misused. Let me put a specific question to the Minister, for whom I have had a high regard not just in his current role but in previous incarnations. As an Opposition Back Bencher, I should like an assurance from him.

Like my right hon. Friend, I am concerned about the proposals relating to roads. I am thinking of chicanes, concrete blocks and the blocking of roads. My right hon. Friend gave the example of Grosvenor square and the American embassy. I want to be certain that the proposed mammoth, massive, overwhelming powers will not be abused by Government or police, and will be used and maintained only in the event of ongoing need. Roads often remain blocked almost ad infinitum.

Mr. Allan: Does the hon. Gentleman share my hope that the impact of the amendments will be such that a Secretary of State will have to make an order for works such as those in Grosvenor square, which will be challengeable in a court of law if people disagree with it? Surely that would be better than introducing these measures on an ad hoc basis.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that on this matter, at least, he and I are as one. I believe that such proposals should be made only in the context of an order. I seek a categorical assurance from the Minister that these mammoth powers will not be abused, and that the House will have an opportunity to comment on the Government's proposals. I do not suggest that the Government's powers to act in a proven emergency should be reduced, but the Minister should appreciate the view of Back Benchers in both Opposition parties that such huge powers should be used extremely sensitively and carefully.

Mr. Jamieson: I thank those who have contributed to this short debate for their generally consensual approach to these important matters.

The hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) spoke of the new suicide threat. Over many years we have, sadly, become used to bomb threats that have generally involved a warning and in which the bombers, because they did not wish to lose their lives, did not take quite as many chances as suicide bombers do. We are now living in a new world, and we should all accept that.

I do not think that the hon. Gentleman or anyone else would expect me to respond to his points in detail. I cannot, for instance, tell him exactly what is being done in the privacy of the House. However, I can reply to his question about the use of wider security forces. In many cases the police co-operate with security guards and forces in ports who are not part of the national police force. Many people join in a concerted effort to create a secure environment around a particular establishment.

There seems to be some confusion about the proposed powers. The debate seemed to centre on how they would be used, which I suppose is inevitable in a debate like this, but our proposals relate not to what we will do with the powers but to where they should lie. The hon. Member for Newark asked about specialised equipment. As I said in my opening remarks, powers allowing the use of such equipment, and allowing the Secretary of State to insist on its use in ports, airports or other places of entry, are already contained in existing legislation. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) suggested that we should have just one port of call. I suppose we could have brought all the provisions together in this Bill, but the Bill as it stands is not comprehensive and would not supplant what is in other legislation. That is our difficulty.

As was implied by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) and the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), the protocols for implementation are terribly important. They are laid out much more clearly in other legislation. I think that, if used as the primary legislation to drive future action, Lords amendment No. 7 would prove inadequate. There are 1,000 ports in this country, and a single piece of legislation applying to them. That is understandable to those operating in ports, but airports are a different matter.

Powers already exist through my Department and through the Transport Security Directorate—TRANSEC—for the inspection of airports. We carry out such inspections with great thoroughness and rigour to ensure that the correct measures are taken, especially where there is the greatest danger. We take proportionate action: obviously larger ports involving sensitive goods or a considerable number of passengers will need much more attention than smaller, less significant ports.

The hon. Member for Newark asked about Programme Cyclamen. I am sure he will understand why I cannot give him a full answer. I cannot put operational deployment on the public record, but I should be happy to have a private discussion with the hon. Gentleman. He also asked about the role of the military. We use the military quite widely. As the existing military aid arrangements are well established and work extremely well, there is no need to place legal duties on the armed forces. The armed forces are closely linked with the civil regional resilience arrangements, and provisions in the new chapter in the strategic defence review, including the creation of civil contingencies reaction forces, will enhance their ability to respond to emergencies.

The hon. Gentleman asked what practical measures we have taken. Unfortunately, there is not enough time left in the debate for me to go through the three-page list of things that we have done; suffice it to say that many sensible, practical measures have been taken at both national and local level to ensure that we tackle the issue of terrorism. It is not a fixed feast; such matters are constantly renewed in the light of our knowledge and understanding of how the threat to us is changing.

The hon. Gentleman asked about exercises. We have in place a co-ordinated, cross-governmental programme for exercises, which covers a comprehensive range of domestic, disruptive challenges, including accidents, natural disasters and acts of terrorism. I can confirm that one such exercise is happening in my constituency over the weekend and during next week—[Interruption.] It is happening over several days, not just on a Sunday. Sometimes those are table-top exercises, but at other times they are full and live.

The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal made a very good point—the hon. Member for Macclesfield made a similar one—about what is in existing law. In existing law, but not, I am afraid, in the amendment, there are some checks and balances; for example, a permanent fixture on a road would require a local inquiry. The local authority would be required to post a direction to say what was happening and, if necessary, a public inquiry would be held in some cases.

I shall conclude my remarks. The Opposition may want to push the motion to a vote and if I continue talking they will be unable to do so, but if there are any further points I shall be happy to respond to them in writing.

Question put, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Lords amendment disagreed to.

It being more than two and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the remaining Question required to be put at that hour, pursuant to Order [this day].

Lords amendment No. 56 agreed to.

Clause 1

MEANING OF "EMERGENCY"

Lords amendment: No. 1.

Ruth Kelly: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to deal with Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 6, 29 to 36, 39, 40 and 48.

Ruth Kelly: All these Lords amendments streamline the definition of emergency, sharpening the drafting, rather than making substantive changes. They were warmly welcomed in the other place, and I hope that hon. Members will agree that the definition is clearer and more concise as a result.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 6 agreed to.

Clause 2

DUTY TO ASSESS, PLAN AND ADVISE

Lords amendment: No. 8.

Ruth Kelly: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendment No. 9.

3.45 pm

Ruth Kelly: The amendments relate to the role of the voluntary sector in contingency planning. The Government now accept that there is merit in capturing in statute the role of voluntary organisations. This, we believe, will create a climate of expectation that their skills, resources and expertise should be used to the full. The Government have worked closely with the voluntary sector to get the text of the amendments and the package of supporting regulations and guidance right. I therefore recommend the amendments to the House.

Patrick Mercer: I am grateful to the Minister for bringing forward the amendments. They represent a breakthrough. The voluntary sector was disgracefully neglected earlier and, in Committee, we could make no progress whatever with the Government on this point.

The work done by my noble Friend Lady Buscombe should be acknowledged. Her team has worked tirelessly and, at last, we have recognition for bodies such as the British Red Cross and others which have seen the example set by the Spanish Red Cross after the incident on 11 March. I am delighted that the Government have seen sense on this point.

Mr. Allan: I simply wish to reinforce the point made by the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) that it is very welcome that the Government have recognised the position of the voluntary sector. I know that it was a contentious and difficult issue, with different views being expressed within the voluntary sector. Bodies such as the Red Cross have been effective in keeping the issue alive, and the amendments reach a sensible compromise in making sure that the Bill formally recognises issues with which the voluntary sector will be intimately involved.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): I am delighted that the Minister has reflected on what was said in Committee and on Report, but it is not good enough to accept that the voluntary sector is now part of the Bill unless the Government are also convinced that resources should be forthcoming to help the voluntary sector deliver on its side of any arrangements that it may come to. It is not good enough simply to write the sector into the Bill and then deny or refuse applications for the resources that will be needed by many organisations in the voluntary sector. I hope that the Government and the Minister will take that point on board.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 9 agreed to.

Clause 7

URGENCY

Lords amendment: No. 10.

Ruth Kelly: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this we will take Lords amendment No. 18, Lords amendments Nos. 37, 38, 43 to 45 and the Government motions to disagree thereto, Government amendments (a) to (e) in lieu thereof, Lords amendment No. 47 and the Government motion to disagree thereto, and Government amendments (a) and (b) in lieu thereof.

Ruth Kelly: The Bill originally required decision makers to think that provisions of emergency regulations were in due proportion to an emergency or that an urgent direction was needed. Concerns were raised about that approach in both this House and the other place, and their lordships have replaced those provisions with an objective test. In other words, their amendments provide that an urgent direction must be needed, and that urgent directions or emergency regulations must be in due proportion to the situations that they address.

We have re-examined the matter in the light of their noble lordships' concerns and worked hard to find a compromise position to which I hope that both sides of the House can sign up. Under parts 1 and 2 of the Bill, when determining whether there is an urgent need to dispense with the requirement to consult the Council on Tribunals, the maker of urgent directions will make judgments of fact or near fact, so he will be deciding whether there is an urgent need to issue a direction or whether there is insufficient time to consult the Council on Tribunals. We believe that that approach is appropriate, so we will accept the relevant Lords amendments.

We do not accept that it would be appropriate to apply such an approach to decisions made about the kinds of provision that should be included in emergency regulations made under part 2. Any decision made about the necessary scope of emergency powers, for example, will be more subjective. There will inevitably be a question of judgment. We think that it is appropriate for the Bill to recognise that fact and to indicate clearly who will be responsible for making such a judgment call. However, we think that we should raise the threshold of the test in such cases. We have thus tabled an alternative amendment that will raise the threshold from "thinks" to "is satisfied". That will require the maker of regulations not only to think that the provisions of regulations are appropriate, but to be satisfied, or pretty sure, of that fact. I urge the House to accept the compromise package.

Mr. Heald: Ministers in this House and the other place have gone a considerable way towards improving the nature of the test in part 1, which we welcome. References to Ministers thinking appear throughout the Bill, so I am glad that the inclusion of an objective test in part 1 is acceptable.

Part 2 of the Bill provides for draconian actions, so although the nature of the test in that part is more important, the Minister has not been able to go as far as we had hoped. We have argued that the proper way to deal with the matter would be to require belief on reasonable grounds. That would have included an objective element, but it would have also required the relevant Minister to justify his actions. The Government's proposal that a Minister would to have to be satisfied that something were appropriate rather than only thinking that represents a slightly stronger requirement, but it is not strong enough. We shall continue to support Lords amendment No. 37 because we are dissatisfied with the Minister's approach on the matter, although some improvements to the Bill have been made.

Mr. Allan: Liberal Democrats in this House and the other place shared concerns similar to those expressed by the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), and we made such arguments in Committee and on Report. However, on balance, we are inclined to accept the Government's proposal. The Minister has made the case that a Minister's judgment will ultimately apply, because we cannot avoid the fact that Ministers will make judgments for which they will be held to account about whether conditions prevail to such an extent that emergency regulations should be brought into play.

If we come to challenge a Minister through the legal process or in the House, it is important that the test is genuine so that he or she cannot say, "I thought the measures were appropriate, so you can't do anything to me. If I thought wrongly then tough luck." The threshold of the test is important, but we think that the new wording is satisfactory. The inclusion of the word "appropriate" in the Bill will mean that we will have something to get our teeth into when we come to testing a Minister. Although there are several ways in which the provisions could be phrased to give us more certainty, we must strike a balance somewhere. We think that the Government have conceded enough at this stage of the Bill's passage to satisfy us that the test will be sufficiently robust.

Mr. Hogg: It would be churlish not to acknowledge that the Minister and the Government in general have made a useful concession. In a sense, one could accept it. However, my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) desires to go with Lords amendment No. 37 and I am content to follow him.

There is no doubt that clause 22 provides for substantive powers. I reminded the House of the extent of those in our debate on the first group of amendments. The question is: what should trigger the exercise of those powers? The test of "thinks" was too low a threshold. The Minister was right about that. The question is whether there is a significant difference between the concept of being satisfied and that contained in amendment No. 37. I think that there is relatively little difference between the two tests. The test formulated in the other place sets a slightly higher threshold. In ordinary circumstances, I would not fall out about that, but if my hon. Friend thinks that it is a matter of principle, I shall support him.

Ruth Kelly: Amendment No. 37 proposes an objective test, to be satisfied on reasonable grounds. I shall respond to the point about an objective test, unless the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) has something to add.

Mr. Heald: If one requires a belief to be genuine, and also to have reasonable grounds to support it, the objectivity comes in the provision of the reasonable grounds. I accept that that is not what the amendment says, as I mentioned in my contribution, but it provides an objective test, something that we welcome.

Ruth Kelly: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman makes that clear. In that case, an objective test would achieve the wrong results in certain situations and should be rejected.

Let me give an example. Consider the outbreak of a strain of flu that is fatal. Faced with a cluster of flu-related fatalities in an area, the Minister may quite reasonably take the view that there is a threat of serious damage to human welfare in that area, and that it is proportionate and necessary to use emergency powers to impose limits on public gatherings to limit the spread of the disease. If, after a week of laboratory tests and developments on the ground, it becomes clear that the new strain is not highly contagious and it was unnecessary to restrict public gatherings, amendment No. 37 would make the emergency regulations unlawful. Anyone affected by them could successfully challenge them and seek compensation, even though the Minister acted reasonably and appropriately.

Mr. Heald: The decision that would be considered would be the one made on a particular day. The hon. Lady refers to a week later on.

Ruth Kelly: That is right, but the longer-term effect of the amendment would be that Ministers would delay taking reasonable and appropriate action to deal with an emergency until they were 100 per cent. sure that they knew what the emergency entailed. That cannot be right. The idea of an objective test, with the threshold set that high, is not appropriate. In addition, I do not accept that stipulating "on reasonable grounds" would solve the problem. As I said on different groups of amendments, it is not necessary for that to be specified. I do not expect the hon. Gentleman to want to re-run that particular argument now.

The "satisfied" test is a higher threshold than the "thinks" test and goes a long way towards meeting hon. Members' concerns. Let me give an example of when "satisfied" is a higher test than "thinks". If a Minister is informed of a credible threat of extensive life-threatening flooding in East Anglia, but there is a suggestion that the wind may change and the rain will fall elsewhere, he would have to balance and evaluate the evidence available. A Minister might meet the "thinks" test if he or she reasonably considered that the flood was likely to happen. The Minister might have some doubts, but if the flood were more likely to happen than not, and he or she had reached that conclusion reasonably on the basis of the available evidence, the "thinks" test would be met. However, to be satisfied that an emergency was about to happen, the Minister would have to be more certain. He or she would have to pretty sure that the flood was likely to occur and have no substantial doubts about the point.

The difference between the two tests is one of degree, but there is a difference, so I recommend the "satisfied" test to the House as meeting reasonable concerns.

It being three hours after commencement of proceedings, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

Lords amendment agreed to.

MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put the remaining Questions required to be put at that hour.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendment disagreed to.

Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire) (Lab): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. During the Division, there was a good deal of confusion between Portcullis house and the Chamber. A large number of us, hearing that the Division was off, turned back; that may have been our fault. But when we returned, at least two of us—my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Helen Jackson) and I—tried to get in the door downstairs behind the Chamber. The door was locked and our passes would not open it, despite the fact that the light was flashing green, so we could not get up to vote. Will you have that looked into?

Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was one of the first Members here for the last vote, and the monitors clearly showed that the Division was off. I then moved to Portcullis house and misled hon. Members by saying that the Division was off, which seemed a sensible thing to tell them, as it had been announced. That should be taken into account, in addition to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall).

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Perhaps I can clarify the situation for hon. Members. The Division on Lords amendment No. 10 was called off. The Division on Lords amendment No. 37 followed in quick succession. That, perhaps, explains some of the difficulty. I remind hon. Members that in proceedings such as these, Divisions can be called at any time. On the matter of the door, I will draw that to the attention of the Serjeant at Arms.

Lords amendment No. 38 disagreed to.

Mr. Heald: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. For our part, if you wanted to put the Government motions to disagree together, we would be content with that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that suggestion, but I am required to put the motions separately. I shall go through them as quickly as I can.

Lords amendment Nos. 43 to 45 disagreed to.

Government amendments (a) to (e) in lieu of Lords amendments Nos. 37, 38, 43, 44 and 45 agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 47 disagreed to.

Government amendments (a) and (b) in lieu of Lords amendment No. 47 agreed to.

Remaining Lords amendments agreed to.

Committee appointed to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to certain of their amendments to the Bill: Mr. Richard Allan, Mr. Oliver Heald, Ruth Kelly, Ms Bridget Prentice and James Purnell; three to be the quorum of the Committee.—[Ms Prentice.]

To withdraw immediately.

Reasons for disagreeing to certain Lords amendments reported, and agreed to; to be communicated to the Lords.

Housing Bill

Lords message considered.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I inform the House that privilege is involved in Lords amendment No. 191B. If the House agrees to the amendment, I will arrange for the necessary entry to be made in the Journal.

After Clause 143

Lords amendment: No. 128C.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

I have already made it clear that this Government will not introduce the duty to have a home information pack unless we are sure that the industry and the public are ready. We are already committed to undertaking a national voluntary dry run of home information packs ahead of compulsory introduction.

Yesterday, in another place, my noble Friend Lord Rooker offered a commitment that our Department will pursue positively with stakeholders the possibility of a compulsory element to the dry run in a local or sub-regional area further to test our proposals ahead of the introduction of national compulsory packs. That would be achieved by commencing the statutory scheme in the chosen area earlier than in the rest of England and Wales. Clause 231(8) provides the necessary powers. We will involve all the key consumer and industry stakeholders in the arrangements and in the monitoring and evaluation of the voluntary and compulsory elements of the dry run.

We are confident that we have the flexibility within this Bill quickly to respond through regulations to any problems that arise before or during the dry run period or with the compulsory element. Depending on the nature of a potential problem, we could tailor the contents of the pack, exclude certain types of property from the duties or allow certain elements of the pack to be included later than the day of marketing, and so on.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): I wonder whether the dry run will be in a low-value area.

Keith Hill: We have not decided where the dry run will occur. That is a matter for close consultation with the industry.

We recognise that even with those commitments to undertake rigorous research and testing ahead of introduction, there are concerns among Conservative Members and in some sections of the industry that problems might arise that, despite the extent of the flexibility provided in the Bill, might be best addressed by suspending the operation of all or part of part 5 while they are resolved.

In response to those concerns, my noble Friend moved amendment No. 128C. That amendment adds a new clause, giving the Secretary of State the power to suspend the home information pack duties. I do not expect that we will face problems that we cannot solve quickly through regulations, so I do not expect that we will need to exercise that power. Should I be wrong, however, this power will enable us to suspend duties while we put things right.

I hope that I have allayed the concerns of Opposition Members and put to rest once and for all the suggestion that we are hell-bent on persisting with compulsory home information packs regardless of their impact.

Mr. Hayes: According to St. Luke, there is "more rejoicing in heaven over one sinner who repents than over ninety-nine righteous people who do not need to repent."

In this case, there is undoubtedly a degree of repentance on the part of the Minister, and we should be generous about that. He has listened to the concerns expressed by Opposition Members. In that respect, despite my intrinsic reservations about all Liberal Democrats, I have to say that they have been at one with us. He has listened to the concerns expressed in the House of Lords by peers of all parties, including Cross Benchers. He has listened to the concerns expressed by the Law Society. Incidentally, although he withdrew the remark, it was not terribly emollient of Lord Rooker to describe it as the "Lie Society" in the other place. That was not the right tone for the Government to use in making such a U-turn.

The Minister has listened to the concerns expressed by estate agents and by others who have pointed out that with the best will in the world—I think that the Minister does have good will over this—significant problems could arise during the trial period of these packs.

Let me lay my cards on the table. I make no secret of the fact that I believe that home information packs are unnecessary and will be unhelpful. They will slow down the market, might stimulate further surveys, are unlikely to satisfy mortgage lenders, and will be insufficient in many regards.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not right that the state should compulsorily interfere with two freely contracting individuals, and that that is the heart of the argument that Conservative Members have advanced?

Mr. Hayes: For once, there is a nuance of difference between my hon. Friend and I, who agree about so much, so often. As hon. Members know, I am not an advocate of the unbridled free market, and I believe that there is a civilising role for Government and local government. In this instance, however, my hon. Friend is spot on, because the case that the Government made—that this would assist the marketplace—was not made persuasively. It did not persuade Opposition Members and clearly it has not persuaded the Lords.

For that reason, the trial, as we can now reasonably call it, becomes highly significant. If my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) is right about this, as he probably is, and if our reservations are founded in common sense—as, in my judgment, they are—so that significant problems arise during the course of the trial, it is absolutely right that this House should have the power to suspend the implementation of the packs. That would mean that instead of a dry run leading to an inevitability, we would have a legitimate and genuine pilot scheme. Under a pilot scheme, one tests something, sees what has gone wrong, and alters it. The suspension suggested in the amendment will be essential following the failure that sellers packs will undoubtedly become; otherwise, we will experience the chaos predicted by many experts, colleagues in this place, and Members of the Lords.

I acknowledge that the Minister has recognised those arguments. He has had the courage to make a significant concession, for which we must be grateful. But I have to say, although I do not want to be churlish, that he could have done that a long time ago. We had this debate in Committee, on Second Reading and during several other debates in this place and in the other place. It is an 11th-hour conversion, but at least it is a conversion.

I make a prediction and a commitment. The prediction is that, in their trial, sellers packs will be a disaster. The commitment is that, when a Conservative Government are elected to office—as I confidently expect next year—we will use the provision to suspend sellers packs at the outset. We are not convinced about them for the reasons that have often been articulated. I shall not tire the House by repeating them.

4.30 pm

I am pleased that the Minister has made a concession, but a concession which would not have been granted without the consistent and energetic pressure that my colleagues in the Lords exerted. Baroness Hanham and Lord Hanningfield have been notable in that campaign, supported by Liberal Democrat Members. Without that pressure and the humble contribution of those in this place, who pale into insignificance beside the eloquence of our colleagues in the other place, we would not have wrung the concession from the Minister. He is a sinner that repenteth and I welcome his repentance. Sellers packs will not work. They will be suspended and the proposed new provision provides the chance to do that. We therefore welcome it.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) represents the amendments differently from my understanding of them. The principle of a compulsory scheme appears to have been accepted by both Houses. The system of buying and selling in this country through chains of transactions means that it is important for one comprehensive system to apply. That will happen and I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister on standing firm and ensuring that that forms part of the eventual legislation.

I thank the other place for adding a useful and pragmatic power, which may or may not be used in future. I assure the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings that it is not possible to suspend the scheme before it has started. I thank my right hon. Friend for all his work on the Bill and the subject.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): I welcome the Government amendment, which recognises that the Liberal Democrats were talking common sense about home information packs. We have our disagreements. We do not believe that the packs will be a success and the Government clearly believe that they will prove successful. We are glad that they have included a get-out-of-jail clause. We are pleased to have helped them to do that because we believe that the proposed new provision is necessary to ensure that the packs can be suspended if they do not work after a trial period or even at some later stage.

The major difference between Conservative Members and us is that we have always acknowledged the need to introduce energy efficiency into the home sale at some point. We do not believe that it should be at the point of marketing but at the point of sale. That would bring it into line with the European directive. If the problems envisaged with home information packs occur and the proposed new power is needed, we hope that the ability to meet the terms of the European directive can rapidly be established at the point of sale, not of marketing. The Government have not given themselves the power to do that but they would have to do it to fulfil the terms of the directive if they used the proposed new provision.

I welcome the Government's change of heart. We are pleased to have played our part in persuading them of the need for it. We are not convinced that the packs will work and we continue to have huge reservations about them. However, the Government have at least given themselves the ability to stop them when, as we believe is likely, they prove to be a millstone around home buyers' necks.

Keith Hill: I was sorry that the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) was a little taken aback by Lord Rooker's forcefulness. Perhaps my noble Friend feels that there is quite sufficient emollient on these ministerial Benches in normal circumstances.

I know that the energy performance certificate has been a matter of some concern to the hon. Member for Ludlow (Matthew Green). The EC directive requires the certificate to be made available when a property is sold. It also says that the certificate should be made available to prospective buyers to enable consumers to compare and assess the energy performance of the property being sold. The objectives of the directive would clearly not be met if the certificate were just handed over to the buyer on completion. It must be made available earlier in the process to provide the consumer with a genuine choice.

The hon. Member for Ludlow has raised the issue of what happens to the energy performance certificate in the event of a suspension or non-pursuit of the home information package. The power to suspend in amendment No. 128C is a power to suspend all or some of the duties in clauses 137 to 141. It is limited to those clauses and would not affect other powers or provisions in part 5, including the ones in clause 144. However, the power in clause 144(9)(a) to make regulations altering the time at which a pack document is provided will still exist. If a suspension order were to be made affecting the duties under clause 138, therefore, this would not prevent special arrangements from being made for the timing of the production of energy performance certificates, if that were deemed necessary.

Matthew Green: I thank the Minister. My understanding of what he has just said is that in fact the Government would have the power to ensure that the energy performance certificate could be in place at the end of the process rather than at the start, if they so chose and if they realised that what they were proposing was not working.

Keith Hill: I am delighted to say that the usual form of inspiration has winged its way to me and confirms my instinctive understanding that the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is yes.

Mr. Hayes rose—

Lords amendment agreed to.

Clause 154

INTERPRETATION OF PART 5

Lords amendment: No. 140E.

Keith Hill: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Hon. Members may recall that in our debate on Monday, my guru, my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), pointed out that there was a typographical error in the amendments on the register of home condition reports moved in this place last week. Lords amendment No. 140E replaces the reference in subsection (7) of the new clause to subsection (3), which relates to the paying of a fee to register a report, with the correct reference to subsection (4).

Lords amendment agreed to.

After Clause 187

Lords amendment: No. 191B.

Keith Hill: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 191C.

Keith Hill: I invite the House to note that the Lords do not insist on their amendment No. 191 and that they have accepted Government amendments Nos. 191B and 191C, which were offered in lieu.

The House will recall that on Commons consideration of Lords amendments it disagreed with amendment No. 191, which placed a duty on the Secretary of State to take reasonable steps to ensure an increase in residential energy efficiency by at least 20 per cent. by 2010, based on 2000 levels. The Government have given further consideration to amendment No. 191. We continue to take the view that its effect will be broadly in line with that of existing policies on residential energy efficiency, and that there has been no weakening of the Government's determination to make serious progress on energy efficiency. However, we recognise the strength of feeling on this issue. We still believe that duties based on specific numerical figures are inflexible and better avoided in primary legislation, but we have decided to accede to the principle of the amendment as providing some comfort that the Government stand by the energy efficiency aim that they have declared. I am pleased that the 20 per cent. energy efficiency target will be included in the Bill. I am grateful to noble Members of the other place, who agreed in their wisdom to the amendment that the Government tabled on this subject.

We listened carefully to the arguments made in this House and elsewhere and we accepted the strength of those arguments. What we emphatically did not take into account was the disgraceful full-page advertisement naming names that appeared in The Guardian newspaper after the vote here. It was paid for by Greenpeace and an organisation called ACT, of which I personally had never heard before and of which I wish to hear no more. The advertisement pandered to the vulgar tabloid theory convenient to at least some elements hostile to the Government that Members of Parliament will always in some knee-jerk fashion cave in to pressures from the Prime Minister. Frankly—I speak as a former deputy Chief Whip—anybody with the most primitive knowledge of recent events in this Parliament will recognise that that is a lie.

The advertisement went on to state that the consequences of the vote would be the deaths of 30,000 people. That statement is outrageous. It is in plain ignorance of the facts of the case. Not even the most passionate advocate of the energy and fuel poverty amendments that we were debating would make such a dishonest claim, and nobody did so. The advertisement also betrayed a total ignorance of the way in which Parliament works.

I shall remind the House and, more to the point, those outside, how Parliament does work. I acknowledge the position of those Members of Parliament who felt that they could not support the position of the Government during the debate, some of whom have a long history of advocacy of the energy efficiency target, but I have to say to the House in all candour—I hope that this message gets through to those outside elements—that the voices to which I listened were the private representations of the colleagues who rightly supported the Government in the Divisions. If a Government are to work, they must depend on the support of Government Members, who continued in this case to make the argument with me. It was precisely because I recognised their loyalty and concern that I worked in Government to accept their argument. They are the Members who succeeded and to whom credit should be paid. There will be no names and no pack drill this time, but they know who they are, and I hope that they will claim the credit.

After the votes in question, one of my Labour colleagues wrote to The Guardian to say that, if anything, the Greenpeace advertisement would be more likely to heighten the Government's resistance to the energy efficiency amendment. I cannot say that I was not tempted. There is something of an object lesson here about the perhaps too easy signing of early-day motions; something along the lines of chickens coming home to roost springs to mind. Personally, as a Back Bencher, I resolved after the 1997 general election never again to sign an early-day motion, and I cannot say that I have suffered much as a consequence.

Nevertheless, we have done the right thing in supporting the 20 per cent. energy efficiency target in residential accommodation. All the evidence suggests that the Government have been working towards the target effectively and that they will achieve if not exceed it. I repeat that agreeing to it was nothing to do with the pathetic stunt by Greenpeace et al. I know that such outfits have to justify their donations by various stunts, but this stunt could well have backfired, and I wonder whether those involved really care about that.

I hope that the House will recognise that amendment No. 191B is a significant concession to colleagues who feel strongly about the matter. We are satisfied that the amendment will not place an additional burden on the Government. We have tabled it to rectify some technical deficiencies in Lords amendment No. 191. The definition of residential accommodation in amendment No. 191B mirrors that in the Sustainable Energy Act 2003 to bring the provision into line with the designated aims, and proposed subsection (2) clarifies that that duty does not affect the duty to designate an aim under that Act. Finally, amendment No. 191C, which amends clause 231, the commencement clause, provides that the new clause introduced by amendment No. 191B will come into force two months from the date of Royal Assent.

I therefore invite the House to agree to amendments Nos. 191B and 191C.

4.45 pm

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): This is the second U-turn. Even the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), with all his powers of spin, will not be able to dress it up as anything other than a substantial concession. We have Lord Bassam's own words. This, he says,

> "is a significant concession and . . . evidence that the Government listen."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 16 November 2004; Vol. 666, c. 1397.]

Yes, listen to their own critics on the Labour Benches; yes, listen to the powerful case made by peers in all parties; yes, listen—I think the hon. Gentleman will have to acknowledge—to the Opposition, who have been both consistent and united in their concern to ensure that the Government honour the commitment on which they reneged earlier this year. Let us be frank: they switched the target from 20 per cent. to 16 per cent. It does not do the Minister much credit to get too high-handed about that and about those outside who drew attention to it. At least the Government have returned to where they began and set a target in line with what was suggested by their own advisers, most experts outside and most of those who campaign both for energy efficiency and against fuel poverty.

I make no specific comment about the newspaper article to which the Minister referred, but I do say this. A range of organisations representing some of the most vulnerable of our countrymen have highlighted the fact that the Government were not playing straight when they resisted the Lords amendments initially—organisations representing the poorest of our countrymen, the elderly, vulnerable children and people with a long-standing commitment to the battle against fuel poverty. I understand why the Minister's parliamentary private secretary is embarrassed—

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North) (Lab): I am not in the least embarrassed.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman is embarrassed, because he initially voted against the Lords. I understand that he has had to see the error of his ways. He is another convert—another sinner that repenteth.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Hayes: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has ever been a sinner in this regard. I rather doubt it, as he has a pretty proud history of standing up for those who fight fuel poverty.

Brian White: Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that most of the groups that he mentioned understood the workings of this place and worked within the system to secure the change that we see today?

Mr. Hayes: Yes, they did. I personally received many representations from them, and I am sure that the hon. Member for Ludlow (Matthew Green) did as well. I know that the Minister did. Of course they understood: they understood that they must put pressure on all of us who were involved in the debate on these matters, and hoped that they could bring about a resolution that was appropriate and deliverable.

Of course those bodies understood how the process worked, but it is a bit rich to pick out an advertisement without paying tribute to some of the organisations that were measured and consistent in their campaign and that did not go over the top in their representations. To counterbalance some of the criticism, let me pay tribute to all those, outside this place and in it, who fought for the cause of eliminating fuel poverty, including all-party groups and, indeed, to those who embarrassed the Government when it became clear that they had started to renege on a public commitment made more than 15 times.

When more than two dozen of a Government's own Members rebel on an amendment in support of the Lords, of course it is embarrassing. [Interruption.] Of course it is embarrassing to the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney), who is now chuntering. I understand his embarrassment, and I feel a bit sorry for him, but he has been got off the hook by his Minister. Because the Minister has conceded, there will be a return to the original position of recognising the efficacy of a 20 per cent. decrease in carbon dioxide emissions by 2010, on the basis of the 1990 levels. That is what the Minister's commitment means and, in practice, many of the arguments articulated in the other place and in the House will find a form in the Bill in a clear restatement of policy to do something real and deliverable about emissions, fuel poverty and other issues related to energy efficiency.

Once again, I recognise that the Government have moved, even though it was not of their own volition. However, their move is welcome because it improves the Bill. The measure is by no means perfect—it contains some good things and some very bad things—but the work of both Houses of Parliament, assisted by those outside who have made representations to us, has improved it by forcing the Minister to take note. That does him some credit, but much more to those who forced him to do so.

I am pleased to support the amendment, alongside Members on the Treasury Bench.

Brian White: I thank my right hon. Friend the Minister and the Minister in the Lords for introducing the amendment, which will be welcome in the industry and which is a sign of the Government's good work on these matters. They are the first Government to try to tackle fuel poverty. They have a long history of doing so and the amendment is another in a long line of initiatives. That context is important, given the comments of the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), which suggest that the Government have done nothing, whereas they have a long record of tackling fuel poverty.

I am pleased that the Government introduced the amendment. It seems that every time I rebel, the Government table amendments in the Lords, so I hope that they will adopt a quicker method in future. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for clarifying the relationship between the 20 per cent. target and the energy efficiency target in the Sustainable Energy Act 2003. That is useful.

I want to say something about the Greenpeace advert. Last Monday, many people asked me whether they should rebel and I replied, "No, don't. Go and speak to the Minister." Many of my colleagues who had signed the early-day motion chose to make their point to the Minister in the Aye Lobby and they deserve credit for doing so. It is important that the House recognise that a large number of people who could have rebelled did not do so, but none the less made their point to the Minister. I welcome the fact that the Minister listened to them. That was important, and it makes the Greenpeace advert all the more annoying.

I think that Stephen Tindale should resign as director of Greenpeace, because of the damage that he has done. He has attacked his friends—people who have campaigned on environmental issues in the House for a long time—and gave them no help. He did not attack those who have opposed such measures. I could have understood that if he had been a novice campaigner, although I would not have been very happy about it, but he has a long history of campaigning and understands it. As an insider, when he was a special adviser, he was part of the problem so he has a lot to answer for. If he does not resign, Greenpeace should sack him. He has done real damage to—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Gentleman's comments, but perhaps he could confine his remarks to the amendment.

Brian White: I apologise Madam Deputy Speaker.

Many Members have campaigned on this issue for a long time and they may not support future campaigns for fear of being stabbed in the back. The Minister has already told us that he chose not to sign early-day motions when he was a Back Bencher and several of my colleagues may make the same choice, which will be to the detriment of the House. It is important that we use early-day motions to put pressure on Ministers, so I am glad that 340 Members signed the early-day motion and that the Minister listened.

It is also important that we take forward the energy efficiency target. I welcome the fact that the Minister has taken that on board, and hope that his officials will talk with the industry about improving the situation.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): The Labour party doth protest too much. I had no idea that Labour Members would talk about the Greenpeace advertisement quite so much. They have just given Greenpeace huge publicity, so that may have been counterproductive, unless a real double game is being played.

We are pleased to have helped force the Government into recommitting to a target to which they have previously been committed and into putting it in the Bill. It is a small step forward. It is frustrating that the Government talk the language of energy efficiency but at times they need to be dragged, kicking and screaming, to do anything about it. They have a better record than the Conservatives ever did, but they have not always seemed enthusiastic about it. The Government talk the talk, but they do not always walk the walk. I am glad that, for once, the Liberal Democrats—in conjunction with others—have been able to encourage the Government into walking the walk.

This amendment, like others on the tenancy deposit scheme and empty property management orders, has helped to improve the Bill considerably. We still have problems with home information packs, but much of the Bill is very welcome. Substantial improvements have been made, such as this amendment, and the Minister will be able to look back and be pleased with the Bill. The Liberal Democrats are certainly pleased to have played our part in ensuring that some of the best parts of the Bill, including this amendment, were added to it.

Mr. Kidney: As one who suffered damage to his reputation by the Greenpeace advertisement that has been mentioned, I thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for making it clear that he listened to the representations of Labour Back Benchers who loyally supported him last Monday, as I did, but spoke to him privately about the matter. I am sure that even the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) would agree, without spin, that my right hon. Friend has a fine record, in proceedings on this Bill, of accepting good arguments from Labour Back Benchers on a series of issues, including empty homes, overcrowding, park homes and tenants' deposits. That is commendable.

Mr. Hayes: I just wished to put on the record that, as I have said previously, I think that the passage of the Bill has been a happy experience. It has shown Parliament working well. The pressure that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, and the Minister acknowledged, has come from both sides of the House. We have been helpful to the Government in making this a better Bill, because they will not reach their carbon dioxide emission targets unless they deal with energy efficiency. They will now deal with that and—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is rather lengthy for an intervention.

Mr. Kidney: On that happy note, I shall end.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): I note the Government's concession, but we should not get carried away and start thinking that it is a concession of much substance. All that the concession does is require the Secretary of State to take reasonable steps to ensure that by 2010 the general level of energy efficiency of residential accommodation is increased by at least 20 per cent. compared with the general level in 2000. No sanction will apply if that target is not met. There are no stepping stones, interim or otherwise, on the way to that target. We know that the Government have cynically abandoned a range of targets when it has become apparent that they will not be met. Why should we be party to allowing the general public to be duped into thinking that this is a concession of real substance?

The fact that the Minister made such a play of the Greenpeace advertisement shows that the Government are frightened of the Greenpeace lobby and that pressure group. The advertisement obviously got to the Minister in a big way.

Most hon. Members are concerned about the substance of trying to ensure that there are improvements in energy efficiency and reductions in fuel poverty, and we find that the Government talk a good talk, but that they do not deliver the substance. That is why I am slightly disappointed that my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) seems to go along with the idea that a great concession has been made. I am sure that we rightly argued that we want to try to hold the Government to account to a greater extent, and we may have made some progress on that, but I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that we have not got the whole cake.

5 pm

Mr. Hayes: Let us make no mistake: I do not say for a moment that I would not be a better Minister than the right hon. Gentleman or that we would not manage these matters altogether better than him and his colleagues. Of course, the House and the whole country know that, but when improvements are made, even if they are modest, we have a responsibility to welcome them. The Government have moved in our direction. The Lords amendment is not ideal, but it is better than nothing.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend says that the Lords amendment is better than nothing, and the Bill certainly includes words that were not there before. He is one of the most robust critics of the Government's good-talk-but-no-action policies, and I am sure that he is not really taken in by them. If he thinks that it is better than nothing, I suppose that I will go along with his judgment, but we should not send the message from the House that the Government have made a major climbdown or U-turn. To a large extent, this is an exercise in semantics. There is no point in having targets or commands without sanctions, and there is no sanction against the Government if they do not comply or meet the target.

Mr. Hayes: That is true, but my hon. Friend must recognise that the measure of how far the Minister has moved in our direction is that, having consistently argued against our case and the Lords case, he has now written an amendment that is virtually identical to the one that the Lords proposed, which he opposed. There are minor differences, but at last the Bill contains a commitment to energy efficiency that is essential if we are to meet the carbon emissions targets, which we all agree are vital. The concession is somewhat toothless, but not entirely without teeth—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Once again, the hon. Gentleman's intervention is quite lengthy.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. I hope that he can assure me that he feels confident that we know what the general level of energy efficiency was in 2000, so that we have a benchmark against which we can measure. One of the problems is that the Government promote targets, but we find that the baselines for those targets have not been properly defined. For example, the Government certainly kept on saying that they would produce a definition of congestion on the roads, but they never did and they eventually abandoned the target altogether. I shall give way to my hon. Friend again if he can assure me that there is a definition of the general level of energy efficiency in 2000 that would be a proper benchmark.

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for painting me as the moderate in such matters. The Government's advisers have been very clear about the benchmark, and we called in aid those advisers when they said that they could not understand why the Government had adjusted their target. So the Government's advice, based on a proper measurement of the current situation, is in line with our thinking, the Lords thinking and the Government's new thinking, and I am therefore confident that we have made progress.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that. If he thinks that that is enough for us, let us rest on our laurels, but I certainly predict that, when we reach 2010, the Government will have got nowhere near the target, unless we have a Conservative Government by then to deliver it for us.

CIVIL PARTNERSHIP BILL [LORDS] (PROGRAMME) (NO. 3)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Orders [28 June 2001 and 6 November 2003],

That the following provisions shall apply to the Civil Partnership Bill [Lords] for the purpose of supplementing the Order of 12th October 2004 (Civil Partnership Bill [Lords] (Programme)):

Consideration of Lords Message

1. Any Message from the Lords may be considered forthwith without any Question put and proceedings on that Message shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement.

Subsequent stages

2. Any further Messages from the Lords may be considered forthwith without any Question put.

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement.—[Vernon Coaker.]

Question agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Pursuant to the Order of the House of 8 November, the sitting is suspended. Shortly before the sitting resumes, I shall cause the Division bell to be sounded.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, proceedings on the Housing Bill and any Lords Messages and Amendments that may be received may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Ms Bridget Prentice.]

Question agreed to.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance. Is it not unfortunate that hon. Members—if I may say so, this evening's gathering is distinguished—cannot use this time to discuss important issues? I shall give one example: this morning, the independent inquiry into Gulf war illnesses was published. That issue is extremely important and many hon. Members have views on it. The House is sitting, so surely we can debate such important and urgent issues. Will the Chair make representations to either the Procedure Committee or the Leader of the House to see whether we can make good use of the time available to us on occasions such as this?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The hon. Gentleman is experienced in the ways and procedures of the House. He knows that the Order Paper is determined by the Government of the day and that the Chair can do nothing in these circumstances to alter that situation.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

[Mr. Eric Forth]

Can you help the House by confirming that a Minister can request to make a statement on a matter such as that described by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler)? Will you confirm that nothing prevents Ministers from using the time available to come to the House and inform hon. Members about such matters, and allow themselves to be questioned?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Many things are possible, but the Chair has received no request from any Minister to attend the House at the present time.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thought that you could have been a little fairer with the Liberal Democrat representative, the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler). That earnest fellow always wants to talk about something or other, and I have a suggestion: the Liberal Democrats are keen on proportional representation and can bore people to tears by talking about it. They could explain why, some time ago, 26 Liberals voted for fox hunting and 26 Liberals voted against fox hunting, which is proportional representation—fair voting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who has considerable experience of the ways and procedures of this House. However, he knows that hon. Members could discuss that matter only if the Government had put a motion on the Order Paper.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When gaps such as this occur in our proceedings, is it possible to arrange for the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to attend and answer questions? Since he started his onerous duties, he has spoken at the Dispatch Box for only six minutes. My suggestion would give him the opportunity to answer questions such as, "What does he do with his time, for the taxpayers' £137,000 a year?"

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must find another opportunity to discuss that matter—pursuing a point of procedure here will not do it.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is not the real issue that we shall shortly be waiting in this House not for the Members of the other place to deliberate, but for them to finish their dinner?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has cognisance of many things, but that does not extend to knowing what is happening in the other place.

Pensions Bill

Before Clause 229

Lords amendment in lieu of a Lords amendment disagreed to by this House, considered.

Lords amendment: No. 359B.

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): Mr. Speaker has brought to the attention of the House the fact that Lords amendment 359A—like its predecessor, which we debated yesterday evening—involves the question of Commons privilege; and, like its predecessor, it relates to financial matters in regard to which it is the role of the Lords to agree not to initiate or to amend.

Taxation arrangements made by this House would be altered if the amendment were to be brought into effect. The amendment allows annuities not to be paid where they might otherwise be paid; it extends tax relief by allowing more people in some circumstances to pass their tax-privileged pension funds on to their survivors tax-free; it allows, in some circumstances, for contributions to be made to pension schemes by people up to the age of 85; and it reduces the number of instances in which part of the tax relief given on contributions is recouped when the annuity is paid.

As I said yesterday—

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am sorry if I missed something in your earlier remarks, but I seek your guidance on Mr. Speaker's ruling on whether Lords amendment No. 359B involves privilege. Having consulted the document before us, I can see no judgment on the issue.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): The hon. Gentleman is correct. Lords amendment No. 359B does involve privilege.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Although I did not quite understand why, the Minister seemed to be speaking to Lords amendment No. 359A.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are discussing Lords amendment No. 359B.

Malcolm Wicks: Indeed. If I mis-spoke—as I think certain American Presidents occasionally do—I apologise.

As I said yesterday, the Government recognise the underlying and serious issues relating to greater longevity and demographic shifts in this country, and indeed throughout the developed world. They have profound implications for the way in which our pensions policies should be implemented. We set up the Pensions Commission under Adair Turner to review the regime for UK private pensions and long-term savings. Its first report, published last month, provides a mine of detailed and valuable information on the demographic challenges that we face.

The Pensions Commission is considering whether the level of compulsion in the UK pensions system is appropriate. For those investing in a pension, the requirement to purchase an annuity at 75 with tax-privileged savings is one compulsory element of the existing system. As I have already said, once the commission has reported on the wider issues relating to compulsory saving, the Government will want to consider with care and urgency key issues, including annuitisation at the age of 75, and decide whether they remain fit for purpose.

We have recognised the high level of interest and are prepared to respond constructively and promptly, including on the specific issue of annuitisation as a priority action, once the Pensions Commission has reported.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North) (Lab): Would my hon. Friend speculate on whether, this weekend, we can expect "Focus" leaflets to say how the Liberals conspired to try to scuttle the pension protection fund, the financial assistance scheme and all the other good things in the Bill?

Malcolm Wicks: My hon. Friend reminds us that the Bill is not about annuities and the privileges enjoyed by the better-off and the very rich in society; it is about pension security for large numbers of people in final salary schemes, many of whom have been urging the House to take action. As the Minister responsible for the Bill, I have to say that, given the so-called ping-pong that is taking place, I am worried about the measure. We want to see it become an Act of Parliament so that the pension protection fund will be in place to protect workers from April this year. I am sure that common sense will prevail, whatever honest disagreements there may be on this issue, and that the other place will want the legislation to come into force as soon as possible.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Does the Minister accept that the annuity regime was enacted in wholly different circumstances? Life expectancy has increased considerably since the legislation was enacted, and interest rates are far lower than the average that prevailed at that time. In the current circumstances, people have no incentive whatever to take out a private pension, so does not he accept that the whole matter must be looked into urgently?

Malcolm Wicks: That intervention went rather far in an unhelpful direction, but when the hon. Gentleman began I was reminded of what I have just said: that the Government will want to consider key issues, including annuitisation at 75, with particular urgency, and decide whether they remain fit for purpose. I should have thought that any reasonable party and reasonable people in this or the other House would take that as a serious pledge to look into the issue—as it is.

Mr. Webb: Will the Minister give way?

Malcolm Wicks: I am anxious to read out the last sentence of my speech, but I always give way to the professor.

Mr. Webb: I am grateful to the Minister. Will he explain whether his objection to the amendment raising the annuitisation age from 75 is an objection in principle?

Malcolm Wicks: The issue is complex and important, and has been debated many times in the House. There are powerful arguments on both sides, which is why we will look at the matter with particular care and urgency. I repeat that reasonable people will realise that we are making a key pledge, and if the many people campaigning on the issue want to regard that as a victory, they may do so. But I want to see a victory for the Pensions Bill, to bring security to British workers and existing pensioners. I should have thought that anyone considering what I said yesterday and am saying today would conclude that the nonsense has to end and that the other place should agree to what we are saying so that we can start the work of setting up the PPF and the regulator, getting on with the financial assistance scheme and bringing security and confidence back into the British pensions system. No sensible party would stand in the way of that; the people would judge it badly if it delayed the legislation.

I ask the House to disagree with the Lords amendment.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): The Opposition also hope that common sense will prevail. It is an exercise in machismo for the Government to talk about losing the entire Bill on the basis of this issue. Why are the Government so obsessed with what they perceive as unfairness towards other groups of pensioners, but are prepared to dismiss this substantial group as just rich people and only better-off pensioners? Is that old Labour rearing its ugly head again?

The more that the democratic process grinds on, the more tired and stale the Government's arguments become, in this House and in the other place, whereas our arguments are as fresh and relevant as when we first made them. Is not it instructive that yet again the Government seek to hide behind the doctrine of financial privilege to defeat this amendment? Is not it amazing how the Turner report has rapidly become a catch-all excuse for this Government not to do anything on pensions? It is not a case of "Waiting for Godot", but of waiting for Turner.

I think that the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) was the first to suggest that the Government should get the Turner commission to bring forward its final report to, say, February, so that we would all know of the Government's proposals for pensions by the time of the general election campaign. The Government dismissed that suggestion out of hand. Turner has given the Government a wonderful excuse to put the whole issue in the box marked "Too difficult". That includes dealing with the ancient and obvious unfairness of compulsory annuitisation.

The arguments have been well rehearsed, but I shall make a few simple points. There has been a long and consistent campaign by the Opposition to try to right that wrong. We have had private Members' Bills from my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), who memorably scored a significant victory on Second Reading so that it is the settled will of this House to address this issue, and my hon. Friends the Members for Taunton (Mr. Flook) and for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill).

The somewhat technical issues arising out of the earlier amendments in the Lords have been replaced by a much simpler, more straightforward amendment that would simply raise the age to 85. No one seems to know when the initial rule of compulsory annuitisation was first introduced, but it is clear that since then much has changed, including life expectancy. In fact, their lordships appear to have had a minor spat about exactly how long people will live, but that is separate from the central issue, which is that many more people now live beyond 75 than ever before. The whole rule is completely out of date.

The rule does not only affect rich, well-off people. I can testify from my knowledge of my constituents that many people have done the right thing—and what the Government claim to want them to do—and made provision during their working lives for their retirement so that they do not need to fall back on the benefit system. As my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) argued only yesterday, what business is that of the Treasury, provided those people do not fall back on the benefit system?

Other advanced countries, such as Australia, Canada, the USA and the Republic of Ireland do not have compulsory annuitisation. Why should we still have that outmoded concept in this country?

The rule is wholly at odds with the Government's professed policy of trying to incentivise savings. We all know that the marketplace for annuities is difficult, to put it mildly, and that the return on annuities has fallen sharply over a long period. We know that the savings ratio has halved since 1997. We clearly need incentives to save, and even the interim report from the Turner commission makes that clear.

We just want flexibility in the system, and we have campaigned long to deliver it. The Government have slowly begun to move in that direction. There was a minor concession in the last Budget, but, typically of the Chancellor, it was grudging and complicated, and it seems people have to be Plymouth Brethren, or something like that, to benefit from it. When Lord Fowler said in the other place yesterday that the Government were simply being stubborn, he got it absolutely right. It is time to give in on this issue.

9 pm

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Is my hon. Friend aware that, when the Government took office seven years ago, we had one of the best funded pensions regimes in Europe, but that we now have one of the poorest?

Mr. Waterson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I am sure that, like me, he can point to any number of his constituents who feel unfairly treated by the current system.

The Government must show us that they are serious about restoring the savings culture and encouraging defined benefit schemes—one of the central tenets of the Bill. This is a proposal whose time has definitely come. The logic of the Lords amendment is clear: to take the pressure off those who might be approaching the age of 75 and to allow a breathing space for the next Conservative Government to scrap the rule altogether.

Let me try to help the Minister in his negotiations with the Treasury. It might help if he at least pretended to listen to what I am saying—he might find that helpful over the next few hours. If we are unsuccessful this evening in supporting the Lords in their amendment, the Conservative party would expect to table an amendment tomorrow in the Lords along the same lines but substituting the age of 80, rather than 85, and it would be our intention to press that amendment to a Division in the Lords tomorrow.

So let us have none of this nonsense about the Bill not getting through. If the Bill were to fall, it would be entirely the Government's fault for two reasons: first, their stubbornness on this issue in the face of the evidence and the patent unfairness of compulsory annuitisation at the age of 75; and, secondly, their crass incompetence and ineptitude from start to finish on the Bill, which was poorly drafted, badly argued, changed, with whole chunks taken out and put back again, and hundreds and thousands of amendments in the House and the Lords.

The Government only have themselves to blame, but now is the time to cut out the machismo and bite the bullet, make a decision on annuities and free hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people from the obligation, without putting at risk the Bill, flawed though it is in many respects. I urge my hon. Friends to support the Lords in their amendment.

Mr. Webb: I spent a happy hour earlier this evening listening to their lordships as they debated this amendment. Given that the Government have rejected an outright abolition of the annuity rule, the Liberal Democrats also warmly welcome the Lords' attempt substantially to relax it by raising the compulsory age for annuitisation from 75 to 85. It was intriguing to compare and contrast the approaches adopted by the two Ministers: Baroness Hollis gave detailed, careful and thorough arguments, none of which stood up, but they were at least comprehensive; the Minister for Pensions simply said that privilege applied.

Even if privilege applies, we do not necessarily need to refuse to accept the Lords amendment. We can say that, although privilege applies, we will none the less accept it. In other words, if we think that it is good, we can say, "Fine. Privilege may or may not apply, but we will take it anyway." So I am afraid that the Minister has let down the House by not responding to the substance of the Lords amendment this evening. Indeed, he did not even refer to its content at all, as far as I could tell, other than by referring to privilege.

Surely the key point is that we are dealing with a different way of approaching the issue from the one we took yesterday. Yesterday, we said that annuitisation would be allowed in all circumstances except when means-tested benefits were brought into play; today we have the different approach of raising the age from 75 to 85. A different approach warrants a different response from the Minister, but we did not get one.

Life expectancy at 65 has been discussed at both ends of the Palace, but Baroness Hollis was still unclear in her response. She seemed to say that life expectancy at the age of 65 had risen by 16.3 years, but she then said that the typical 65-year-old would live to 82. The two statements do not appear to be consistent, so I am not quite sure what was going on there.

The issue is significant. If a typical 65-year-old now lives to 82 or 84, as the Turner commission figures on a different definition suggest, the key point is that, since the annuity age was last raised from 70 to 75, life expectancy has risen by three or four years or by perhaps as many as six or seven. I was interested to hear what the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) said. If the age became 80 instead of 85, as we are considering now, the case would be overwhelming. That would simply return us to the status quo.

I am struggling to think who passed the 1974 legislation, but the key point is that the annuitisation age was raised from 70 to 75 over a 20-year period—it was first set at 70 about 20 years previously—to keep up with changing life expectancies. As life expectancies move on, unless we want the annuitisation rule to bite harder and harder year after year, we need to raise the age from 75 even if we accept the principle of compulsory annuitisation. It is self-evident that even to maintain the status quo of the original policy intention when the age of 75 was brought in, we must raise it at the very least to 80. The age of 85 goes further in the direction that we want, but the Government should seriously consider 80 as a gracious concession.

I intervened on the Minister and asked whether this was an issue of principle. He declined to say that it was. Indeed, it is extraordinary that Baroness Hollis is saying that we cannot possibly make the change for all sorts of reasons. For example, when people take out a pension, they know it has to be annuitised so she says that it would be wrong to change the rules at the end. That is an issue of principle. She then says that those people have had what she described as tremendously generous tax relief. Because they have all that tax relief, it would be wrong not to force them to annuitise. She gave several other examples that also appeared to be arguments of principle. However, she then said, "Ah, but next year when Adair Turner has reported, we might change our minds."

Is this an issue of principle, or is it not? Patently it is not an issue of principle. If it were, the fact that Adair Turner might come up with a recommendation next year would not change the principle. It is therefore a pragmatic issue and, given the importance that the Liberal Democrats attach to the Bill—unlike the Conservative Opposition we did not vote to decline to give it a Second Reading; we have supported it throughout—we think that the Government need to recognise that it is not an issue of principle. If it were, they would not be saying that they might change their minds next year. Given that is not an issue of principle, why risk the Bill? Why not make a substantive movement in the direction of recognising that, even on a pragmatic basis, the age threshold should be raised.

Important contributions were made in their lordships' House about why the argument about tax, which is obviously important, does not hold water. I fully accept that if people have had some tax relief on the fund, the Exchequer should at some point receive a fair share of tax. I accept that principle. We have already pointed out, however, that if people defer annuitisation but start to draw down and then die, 35 per cent. will go in tax. In fact, although Baroness Hollis implied that if the fund were not touched it would be passed on tax free, Lord MacGregor pointed out that if that added to the value of an estate, a tax rate of 40 per cent. could easily apply to the many people who have houses at or above the value of the inheritance tax threshold. That is the higher rate of income tax.

If we force people to annuitise, the best that we will get is 40 per cent., which is the higher rate of income tax, and we might get less than that. If people do not annuitise and they become liable to inheritance tax, the whole thing will be taxed at 40 per cent. The Exchequer could benefit from not requiring compulsory annuitisation. I accept that the Exchequer has the right to the tax, but it is far from obvious that, by relaxing the rule on compulsory annuitisation, it loses out at all. Therefore, why not give people a choice? What would be lost by giving people a choice? No one would lose because the Exchequer would get its share, and possibly eventually more. If people annuitised, they would get a 25 per cent. tax-free lump sum, but if they did not do so, the whole value of what was left could be liable to 40 per cent. inheritance tax, and thus the Exchequer might receive more tax.

The Government should give people freedom of choice. No one would suffer under the proposal and we are discussing only a minority of people, albeit a growing number, because more people hold direct contribution schemes and life expectancies will continue to improve. Although such people form a minority now, even minorities have the right to fair treatment, as one might say in a different context. If the proposal would mean that no one would lose and that people would get additional choices, I do not understand why the Government will not accept it.

It is regrettable that the Government are simply arguing about privilege and that they will use their force in numbers to win the vote. We are discussing a matter of substance, but the Minister has admitted that it is not an issue of principle, so the Government should be willing to offer concessions. The Minister should respond positively to a pragmatic matter relating to a Bill that I support. I shall consult my colleagues in the House of Lords on the attitude that they will take tomorrow, but I hope that the Minister will sleep on what has been said and realise that we are willing to be reasonable. If he were to offer us the serious prospect of revisiting the matter, I would be happy to talk to my noble Friends to decide how to take things forward.

Malcolm Wicks: I did not think it useful to detain the House with a long speech because these issues have been aired many times in the Chamber and we had a proper discussion on them only yesterday. There is a difference between being serious and being verbose.

The Government take such matters seriously, and that is evidenced by the fact that we set up the Pensions Commission. Its three distinguished members have already produced what I judge to be the best evidenced report on the pensions question this century—certainly for the past 60 years.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): That is four years.

Malcolm Wicks: It is sometimes a struggle to be serious when facing the sixth-form humour of someone who might not yet be old enough to be in the sixth form. I want to take the matter seriously.

The Turner report, which is a key evidence-based document, has given us a good basis on which to discuss such matters. I know that the comment made by the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) was not meant entirely seriously and that he made it to serve a political purpose, but if he reads the report—I recommend that he does—he will note that Turner says that such problems have been building up since the 1980s.

Mr. Waterson: Will the Minister give way?

Malcolm Wicks: Not yet, because I am trying to be serious.

I have told the House seriously that we do not want to consider these key issues in such an environment, but that we want to examine all of them, including annuitisation at the age of 75, with care and urgency to determine whether the existing arrangements remain fit. I wish that hon. Members would take my pledge seriously.

Mr. Waterson: Surely the Minister must accept that one of the central conclusions of the Turner interim report—Turner is unlikely to retreat from this in his final report—is that there is a crying need to reincentivise savings in this country. Does he not accept the argument that by scrapping, or changing significantly, the compulsory annuitisation rule, he might well achieve that objective?

Malcolm Wicks: We have heard all that. I shall give way to a more serious person.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To accuse any hon. Member of being serious or not is unworthy of the Minister.

Will the Minister make a serious commitment tonight? If the full Turner report recommends changes to how the Bill deals with annuities once it is enacted, will he accept those recommendations and introduce them in the House as soon as possible?

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): We are going to win the next election.

Malcolm Wicks: I am never complacent about such things, but I, too, suspect that there will be a Labour Government later next year.

We said that we will take the Turner commission seriously. Of course we will. The Prime Minister established the report and we will take all its recommendations seriously. We will judge them when we see them. We will also give serious consideration to the annuity issue.

When I said that the House faces the difficulty of whether the Bill will become law, I was making the point that although there are serious issues at stake, most of those who would gain—this cannot be questioned—would be at the wealthier end of our community. We shall take those issues seriously. However, 80 per cent. of the people—just to give one statistic—with defined contribution schemes end up with a pension fund of less than £30,000. I hope that that puts in context the number of people who have a particular interest in the Bill.

It is interesting that the amendment is not to the Bill per se, but is an attempt to bounce the Government at the end of its consideration. The key point is that the Bill is concerned not with just a few people—either the poorer few or the richer few—but with bringing security and confidence to more than 10 million scheme members in final salary schemes, who are looking to Parliament to pass it. Frankly, they will judge badly indeed any parliamentarian, whether serious or not, of any political party who stands in the way of this becoming the Pensions Act later this week.

Question put, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendment disagreed to.

Committee appointed to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to their amendment No. 359B; David Cairns, Margaret Moran, Mr. Waterson, Mr. Webb and Malcolm Wicks; Malcolm Wicks to be the Chairman of the Committee; Three to be the quorum of the Committee.—[Margaret Moran.]

To withdraw immediately.

Reasons for disagreeing to the Lords amendment reported, and agreed to; to be communicated to the Lords.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Because of your duties in the House today, you may not be aware that the Prime Minister earlier this evening briefed the leader of the Democratic Unionist party, the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), on proposals to restore a power-sharing Executive in Stormont, and at the same time in Dublin the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic briefed the leader of Sinn Fein/IRA, Gerry Adams, on plans to achieve the objective of total decommissioning. Will you find time for the Prime Minister to come to the House tomorrow on this important matter for the future governance of Northern Ireland, to inform the House of what is in these proposals so that we can question him on what was proposed to the leader of the Democratic Unionist party and to the leader of Sinn Fein/IRA in Dublin earlier this evening?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): The hon. Gentleman is right. I have no knowledge of the matters that he is raising before the House this evening, nor do I have any knowledge of statements that are being planned at this time. No doubt the whole House and those on the Government Front Bench will have heard the points that he made, and they are now on the record.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would you be prepared to tell Mr. Speaker that it would be for the convenience of the House if such a statement were made tomorrow?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already said that Mr. Speaker reads the records of the House very carefully, and those matters are now on the record.

Post Office Closures (South Manchester)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Gillian Merron.]

9.36 pm

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): I am pleased to be granted this debate on the closure of post offices in South Manchester, because it is a matter of extreme importance to my constituents in that part of the city, as well as to people throughout Manchester who are similarly suffering from post office closures.

May I make it clear at the outset that I am not challenging the urban reinvention programme? I supported it in the House and I recognise the need for a proper, effective strategic review of urban post offices to ensure a comprehensive spread of that service throughout the city of Manchester. What I am challenging is the consultation process undertaken by Post Office Ltd., and the decisions on the closures that have been taken as a result of that consultation process.

In south Manchester, in my constituency, Manchester Withington, three post offices were identified for closure in the latest round of such closures. I shall briefly discuss each of them. First, I want to make a general point. When the three post offices were announced, one of them was already temporarily closed, but I immediately visited the other two and found that, prior to any consultation process beginning, arrangements had been made for potential pay-offs to those sub-postmasters. They already knew that the intention was to close those post offices before any consultation process had begun. Already there was an intention by the Post Office to identify and make arrangements for those post offices to close.

The consultation process began with Beech road in Chorlton. Beech road is a lively local shopping area that has become more and more popular in recent years. The post office on Beech road is at the heart of that community. The plan to close the post office was greeted with great dismay by local residents and a campaign to keep it open was immediately launched. Petitions were compiled and a public meeting was arranged locally. I pay tribute to the two local ward councillors—Labour councillors—Sheila Newman and Val Stevens, who did so much work to properly gauge public opinion on the proposed closure.

Several key points came out of that consultation exercise. First, a significant number of elderly and disabled people who live in that immediate area need local access to post office services. Secondly, the closure of that post office would have a serious impact on other local traders—the area is vibrant and expanding and the post office is part of that local economy.

Thirdly, and perhaps most importantly, the Post Office's view that the majority of current users of the Beech road branch would transfer to Hardy lane post office has no credibility. Anyone who understands the local geography of that part of south Manchester knows that if local people lost their local post office in Beech road, they would look towards Chorlton main post office, because of the natural flow of the population towards the centre of the city. Even now, however, Chorlton post office is incapable of dealing with the number of people who use it. Queues are long and no parking facilities exist, particularly for disabled people. If Beech road post office closes, it is a long walk to Chorlton main post office.

When the decision was taken to continue with the post office closure, the Post Office provided this justification:

> "From our planning assumptions, we would expect the majority of customers to migrate to Hardy Lane branch and others to Chorlton-cum-Hardy branch. I know you are doubtful about Chorlton-cum-Hardy branch being able to cope with any additional business and I hope that when my colleague, Helen Jachim, wrote to you last month she allayed your concerns."

She certainly did not, because the planning assumption that only a minority of people would transfer to Chorlton main post office was wrong.

Even if a minority transferred, the capacity problems would remain, because there is also a proposal to close another post office, which is just outside my constituency in Upper Chorlton road, with those customers transferring to Chorlton main post office. The arguments that have been advanced have no validity and the consultation, which showed local people's genuine feelings, was totally ignored.

Mr. Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will not be surprised to learn that the story that he is describing in south Manchester has also taken place in north Manchester. The consultation was a sham and a disgrace, and false and misleading information has been put out about alternative post offices and the facts and figures in north Manchester. Today, Collyhurst post office is closed, leaving the people of Collyhurst without any obvious alternative—one of the two alternatives identified is not on a bus route, while the other, the Crown post office, is in the city centre. The situation is unsatisfactory, and I look forward to the Minister's response.

Mr. Bradley: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's view. The key phrase is "sham consultation", and my second example will underline that point.

The second proposal was to close Mauldeth road west post office and Burton road post office, both of which are in the Old Moat ward in my constituency. As I said earlier, Mauldeth road west post office was already temporarily closed, and there were issues surrounding the location of that particular post office. It was only acceptable to confirm that temporary closure as permanent if the Burton road post office was still available to the people of Old Moat, and particularly those in the south of that ward.

As a result of hard work by Labour councillors, again, we had an opportunity properly to gauge public opinion during the consultation exercise, and, again, key points emerged. First, and most importantly, a previous closure had occurred in that area on Barlow Moor road in west Didsbury. The justification for that closure was that the Burton road post office would be the receiving post office for those customers. When I did not oppose that particular closure because of circumstances in that area, I made it clear that it would not be acceptable for the Post Office to return at a future date and close the Burton road post office, which is the receiving post office for the one that closed. That is typical of what is happening around the country. And it has been completely ignored by Post Office Ltd.

Secondly, Old Moat is one of the most deprived wards not only in Manchester but throughout the country. The closure of Burton road and Mauldeth road west would mean that the whole ward would have no post office service available to it. That is completely unsustainable in terms of the deprivation factors that should apply when considering closures.

Mrs. Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend share my utter dismay that although Members on both sides of the House voted for specific money to be allocated to areas of deprivation where sub-post offices were under threat, the Post Office admitted to me that it is closing such sub-post offices, but has passed the buck to my hon. Friend the Minister and to other Departments instead of owning its responsibility to find solutions in areas of deprivation?

Mr. Bradley: My hon. Friend makes a sound point. That flows through all the consultations that we have experienced in Greater Manchester and the north-west.

A second key point about the Old Moat ward is that many elderly people live in that area, and if these two post offices closed, leaving the ward with none, they would have to travel to the centre of Withington, which for some elderly people is well over a mile away, to get post office services. That is unacceptable.

Thirdly, the justification for closing the Burton road and Mauldeth road post offices was that a significant number of customers would transfer to Hart road post office. That view beggars belief. If the Post Office understood the geography of this part of south Manchester, it would know that the people of Old Moat would not even have Hart road on their radar. When I challenged it about that, it informed me that it had a state-of-the-art modelling system that had helped it reach its conclusion. When it failed to send me the details of that, I suggested that it might be better to ask local people what they thought about transferring to Hart road. The people to whom I spoke would probably need an overnight stay before returning home if they used that post office. It is a completely unacceptable alternative.

James Purnell (Stalybridge and Hyde) (Lab): I thank councillors Bernard Walsh and Kevin Welsh for their hard work in Ridge Hill in my area, where we faced exactly the same problem as my right hon. Friend describes. We thought that we had luckily found a solution whereby the mini-market next door would be able to take over the franchise, but the Post Office refused even to meet its owner, on the basis that it wanted to be able to transfer all the business to another post office. Is not that completely unacceptable when someone else is prepared to take over the service for a deprived estate that is on top of a hill and a long way from the town centre?

Mr. Bradley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In the course of the consultation exercise, I asked Post Office Ltd. to look for an alternative outlet in the Old Moat ward, but silence was the stern reply.

The only conclusion that we can draw from these examples is that the consultation exercise is a complete sham, as my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester,

[Mr. Bradley]

Blackley (Mr. Stringer) said. The Post Office knew what it wanted when it embarked on the exercise, and public opinion and the sound arguments that were put by representatives would only be ignored at the end of the consultation process. I ask the Minister to intervene in order carefully to consider the way in which these closures are being undertaken and the process that Post Office Ltd. is employing to arrive at its conclusions.

Will the Minister consider the precise role of Postwatch in this exercise? At a local level, I have received extremely good co-operation from Postwatch. Dario Cottingham has been extremely helpful. He has attended meetings with me, and he attended the public meeting and tried to represent the views expressed back through Postwatch to Post Office Ltd.

However, I question whether Postwatch is meeting the objectives that it set itself. Judith Donovan, the regional chairman of Postwatch Northern England, said to me:

> "As the independent consumer watchdog Postwatch want to ensure that a sustainable network of post offices is achieved and that any closure should cause the minimum inconvenience to local consumers. Postwatch is also ensuring that remaining branches are making the necessary improvements to create the network of 'bigger, better and brighter post offices'" for the local area. I question whether Postwatch can justify the closures and its views on them and also fulfil its commitment as the representative of the consumer in the process. Should not it challenge the decisions? Will the Under-Secretary therefore consider its role in the process?

I strongly believe that we must ensure public confidence in the urban reinvention programme, for which the Under-Secretary is ultimately responsible. I am sure that my hon. Friends from Manchester and Greater Manchester agree. It is not acceptable for Post Office Ltd. simply to ignore the views of local communities in constituencies such as mine. It should set about trying to protect the most vulnerable, the elderly and the disabled in our local communities to ensure that they have proper and efficient access to Post Office services and that south Manchester, Manchester and Greater Manchester have a proper network of post offices that meet the needs of local consumers.

9.51 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) on securing the debate. As we heard from his contribution, he has been assiduous in voicing, on behalf of his constituents, all the local concerns about Post Office Ltd.'s urban reinvention programme in his constituency. I pay tribute to his work and that of others in the community in Manchester in trying to come to terms with an emotive and difficult issue.

My right hon. Friend has expressed his depth of feeling and that of other hon. Friends about closures in Manchester. He knows that I met my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer), Councillor Jim Battle and Mr. Eddie Smith from Manchester council yesterday, when similar concerns were expressed to me about the role of Post Office Ltd. and that of Postwatch.

My right hon. Friend knows that responsibility for postal services has come to me only recently and that there have been many Adjournment debates, other debates and questions in the House about the process. I was grateful for his opening remarks about his support for the principles behind the urban reinvention programme. He is aware of the state of Royal Mail and post offices that we inherited from the previous Government. He will acknowledge and welcome the £2 billion that the Government spent on developing Royal Mail and postal services. He also knows that the Government are committed to maintaining a viable nationwide network of post offices for the future. In a wider context, he knows about the massive challenge for everyone involved in achieving that viability.

Under the previous Government, there was no planned programme, and unplanned closures and many gaps appeared in the system. That clearly affects the whole country. My right hon. Friend knows that the Government's policy for the post office network was based on the performance and innovation unit's report, "Modernising the Post Office Network", which was published in 2000. The report was widely welcomed as squaring up honestly to the challenges that the network faced. It made 24 recommendations for the future, all of which the Government accepted. It showed starkly that our network of post offices had not kept pace with the changing needs of its customers.

Too often, post offices had become dingy and shabby through lack of investment and were losing business. The business had lost touch with its customers' needs, which are different now from those of a generation ago. Following years of underinvestment, the Post Office business was in a spiral of decline.

It is important to detail the circumstances that led to the company's rationalisation programme, which includes the closure of some offices, including those that we heard about from my right hon. Friend, and some in my own constituency. He knows that a number of post offices closed in my constituency of Bradford, South and that two days before I achieved this responsibility there were issues surrounding the Crown post office in my city of Bradford. I too have been heavily involved in the process that the Government set up to try to ensure that consultation was adequate and real.

My right hon. Friend will know that in February our hon. Friend the Member for East Ham (Mr. Timms), who had these ministerial responsibilities before me, actually changed and detailed more fully the guidelines for the consultations that he expected to be undertaken.

My right hon. Friend and hon. Members will know that the Government are Royal Mail's principal shareholder, and that this Government gave Royal Mail the commercial freedoms that have allowed it to turn the business round, as it is doing. We are expecting to hear in the interim results this week that the situation is far better than it has been in the past. That does not help my right hon. Friend in respect of the closures in his constituency, but it is important to put on the record the general position, which I know that most Members of Parliament support—the need for a viable post office network within a viable Royal Mail.

I shall pick up some of the points that were raised. I too, in that meeting with elected representatives from Manchester, was very concerned about the role of Postwatch, because there is a clear procedure for Postwatch to use if it believes that closures are unnecessary, and I had concerns about the matters that were raised yesterday, and tonight by my right hon. Friend. So I will undertake to contact Postwatch to see what was done to find out why perhaps the next stage proposals were not achieved. I want to know from Postwatch its role in this matter, because as my right hon. Friend has said, it is the consumer watchdog in this case and it should be putting consumers' interests first.

I am also concerned to hear from my right hon. Friend's speech and from the meeting yesterday that the local authority, which has a wealth of information, was not included in the discussions and the final outcome. I will be speaking to Post Office Ltd. about that and I will ask the local authority to furnish me with information about the meetings that it had.

I hope that that helps my right hon. Friend in the detail of the constituency issues that he faces. He will understand why the Government, and I as the responsible Minister, cannot and should not intervene in every case, because obviously, as my right hon. Friend showed great foresight in acknowledging, one post office could close because it was no longer viable.

Postwatch has, up and down the country, made representations and resolved to the satisfaction of certain communities some of the closure proposals. I want to know the detail of what is going on as far as Postwatch is concerned and the relationship between the local authority and Post Office Ltd. That is the best that I can offer my right hon. Friend.

In addition, now that this programme has been going on for some time, Postwatch is undertaking a survey to look at what has happened to those post offices that have closed, to see whether any gaps have emerged. It may be possible, indeed desirable, for the situation in Manchester to be examined, and we can ask Postwatch to do that.

My right hon. Friend used very emotive language, which I know from our dealings on many issues in the past must be sincere, because he does not use such words without great care and cause, and he said that the consultation process was a sham. I would be very upset if that was the case. If the consultation process was a sham, we will need to investigate that, and we will do so.

My right hon. Friend will be aware that the post office closures came about because Post Office Ltd. tested the water with many of the sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses about their individual positions with regard to the future of their businesses. Many of them felt that their businesses could not continue and were happy to seek part of the payment for closing them voluntarily. That was the basis on which Post Office Ltd. looked at those post offices and their viability.

With regard to the consultation process, however, there is supposed to be a post office within a mile of any post office that closes. In the most deprived wards, there should be one half a mile away. My right hon. Friend will be aware of the funding that came from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to look at post offices in deprived areas and the support that was given to them.

In general terms, I am quite confident that the principles that have been laid out to support the viable network being put in place are there. What worries me is if those principles have not been followed. Clearly, that is the basis on which we should look at the position outlined this evening. If my right hon. Friend wanted me to do so, I could go into even greater detail about a large number of other things, but I do not think that that would help at this stage.

James Purnell: I do not know whether my hon. Friend can comment on this point. Does he think that there is merit in the Post Office investigating someone else taking over a franchise if that is possible? Does he agree that there should at least be discussions on that issue if the consultation is to be real?

Mr. Sutcliffe: My hon. Friend makes a good point, but if I dealt with it, it would confuse this matter. His point about franchises relates to directly managed offices and Crown post offices, with regard to which there has been lots of press speculation about what might or might not happen. I am happy to enter correspondence with him about the detail of the case that he wants to raise.

It is important that we have a viable post office network for the reasons that my right hon. Friend has given. The Government are committed to that, and we believe that it should be done in a planned way. We have offered financial support of £2 billion since 1999, and it is crucial that we have a viable network. It is also crucial that the consumer interest is looked after. With the provisos that I have outlined to him, I look forward to ensuring that we get to the bottom of what went on in his constituency.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Flood Defence

2. Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): What the anticipated time scale is for changes to local flood defence committees; and if she will make a statement. [198954]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): As you know, Mr. Speaker, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is unable to attend questions this morning, because she is attending the Anglo-French summit.

Subject to the necessary parliamentary procedures, the local flood defence committees in England will be revoked from 1 April 2005.

Mr. Francois: I thank the Minister for his reply, but is he aware that in Essex we have a perfectly good local flood defence committee that is not broken and does not need fixing? Given that recent events in the north-east clearly demonstrate that amorphous regional bodies are unloved and have little popular support, will he review his decision to merge us with Norfolk and Suffolk, and instead allow the Essex local flood defence committee to continue in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Morley: I have thought carefully about the changes to the regional flood defence committees. Without doubt, there is general support for moving to a single-tier flood defence committee, and the argument concerns the most appropriate regional scale. Regional structures are, indeed, the most efficient. I know the Essex local flood defence committee very well. The hon. Gentleman brought a delegation to see me, and I have had many connections with its members over the years. I went to Essex and talked to them, so I am familiar with the interest that elected Members in Essex take in their work. I very much hope that that expertise will continue under the new structure. A powerful argument was made to have a single flood defence committee for the Anglian region as a whole. I accept in part the validity of the hon. Gentleman's argument. The region is the only area to be divided into three regional flood defence committees, thus reflecting the point that he made.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): May I remind my hon. Friend that after the devastating floods in York in November 2000, the Government came up with substantial additional funding for flood defence? Because of the separate small committees around Yorkshire, however, counterpart funding from the local authorities did not materialise, as some areas did not think that they were at risk of flooding and did not want to contribute. I warmly welcome the steps that the Government have taken to ensure that all areas contribute equally to flood defences. Flood defences serve upland areas, because the water drains away from them through areas that are at risk of flooding.

Mr. Morley: I understand the point that my hon. Friend is making. Indeed, he made it powerfully in the debate about adequate resources for the Yorkshire regional flood defence committee. The changes that we have implemented, including the block grant to the Environment Agency, will address many of the concerns that he has so ably expressed.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Will the Minister pay tribute to Councillor Ray Howard, who is a major player in the Essex flood defence committee? What is his assessment of the effect on flood defences in Castle Point of the additional 4,000 houses that the Government are forcing the town to build?

Mr. Morley: I am more than happy to pay tribute to Ray, whom I have met on a number of occasions. He has enormous experience in flood defence matters and I hope that he continues to make a contribution. As for proposed developments, as the hon. Gentleman will be aware, we have revised planning policy guidance 25, which requires careful assessment of new developments in relation to flood risk. The condition of flood walls, continued investment and potential risks to life and property will feature very strongly in any future planning proposals in the hon. Gentleman's area.

Mr. Michael Foster [illegible]orcester) (Lab): What assistance can my hon. Friend's Department give with the better co-ordination of activities of highways authorities and water companies in tackling the growing problem, particularly in urban areas, of flash flooding?

Mr. Morley: Yes, it is a major problem. In the floods of 2000, 40 per cent. of the flooding was from non-river sources and was caused, for example, by blocked drains on highways. The issue is being addressed by the Environment Agency, as well as by the regulator in the periodic review, PR 04. Matters such as sewer flooding are a major concern for many hon. Members on both sides of the House, but I hope that my hon. Friend will take that work into account.

Climate Change

3. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): What recent research she has commissioned on the impact that climate change is having on the environment. [198955]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): The annual report of the global atmosphere research programme for 2002–03 outlines research activities on the impacts of climate change. The report is available on the Department's website, but I will arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library for the benefit of hon. Members.

Richard Ottaway: The Government are rightly making climate change a priority of their G8 presidency next year, if they win the election. Given that we are missing our targets on renewables, combined heat and power output is down, the energy efficiency commitment has been downgraded and, worst of all, carbon emissions are rising, should the Minister not put his own house in order before he starts to lecture the rest of the world? Does he think that he will hit his 2010 target for CO_2 emissions and, if so, will he set out very clearly how he expects to achieve that?

Mr. Morley: We have set out precisely how we intend to meet the climate change programme. While I do not dispute that there are challenges, this country's record on climate change is the best of any of the G8 nations. The UK is rightly seen as a leader on this issue. We are expanding the percentage of energy from renewables, and we are making progress on the introduction of carbon trading, which we pioneered. I believe that the 2010 target is achievable.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): To do more on the renewable energy part of the agenda, can my hon. Friend give some help to one of the farmers whose land partly covers my constituency and who has been growing renewable crops for 10 years, but has not sold a single twig? He has been given almost £1 million of potential grant from the Government, which shows their commitment to the issue, but he is having serious problems getting his business off the ground. Will my hon. Friend talk with his colleagues in the DTI to get this farmer the help that he needs?

Mr. Morley: As my hon. Friend rightly recognises, considerable funds are available for bio-energy and biomass energy. That includes giving support to the installation of equipment—generators, combined heat and power systems and central heating systems—that can use bio-energy. One significant development that has considerable potential is the co-firing of biofuel by coal-burning power stations such as Drax. That could present a long-term opportunity for farmers and a way of reducing carbon dioxide from coal-burning power stations.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): As it is universally accepted that there can be no effective solution to the problem of climate change without the wholehearted participation of the United States, why has the Prime Minister made so little effort to use his unique relationship to persuade the Americans to sign the Kyoto treaty?

Mr. Morley: That is not the case. At the recent meeting that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had with President Bush—he was the first leader to meet the newly elected President—climate change was one of the issues on the agenda. However, I do not think that people should delude themselves that the Americans—the President and Congress—have set their face against ratifying the Kyoto agreement. That does not mean that achievements cannot be made by reducing domestic emissions and investing in new technologies. Several US states are interested in introducing carbon trading. California and the north-west states are members of a group known as the climate group, which was launched by my right hon. Friend. We have a great deal of connection with those elements in the US who want to go further than the current Administration, and we should encourage them to do so.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): My hon. Friend the Minister will be aware of the recent flood maps produced by the Environment Agency, which predicts as a flood threat the river Calder, which runs through the Sellafield nuclear plant. Does he agree that it would be foolish to back nuclear power as the saviour technology in combating climate change if one of its main sites, and the site where any new nuclear reactor is likely to be built, is under water?

Mr. Morley: It certainly would not benefit anyone to build nuclear power stations in areas that are a major flood risk. That is taken into account at existing sites. The issue of nuclear power is being addressed in our energy White Paper. We have no current plans for nuclear power. We believe that there is considerable potential for renewables and new technologies, and that those will probably bring a better return than the huge investment that would inevitably be required for a nuclear power programme.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): The Minister's Department is doing its best to make climate change a priority, both internationally and within the Government, but does the Minister not feel a little unhappy when the rug is pulled from underneath him by the Prime Minister, who last month overruled the Department by sanctioning an increase of almost 20 million tonnes of carbon dioxide to be emitted under the EU emissions trading scheme? How can that be described by the Secretary of State in her press release as good news for the environment?

Mr. Morley: The Prime Minister's opinions should not be presented in such a simplistic way. The DTI has carried out detailed modelling of emissions by UK industry. That modelling did not exist before and is quite complex and sophisticated, but the final figure is a 5.2 per cent. decrease on business as usual, which is one of the biggest decreases in the whole of the European Union and takes us way beyond our Kyoto target—the only EU country to achieve that.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): In our response to climate change, the Department's recent consultation, "Making Space for Water", emphasises two separate challenges: one is preserving a finite and valuable resource; the other is protecting people from unexpected flooding. Can my hon. Friend confirm that land management practices in the future will be a vital way of meeting both those challenges?

Mr. Morley: Yes, I can confirm that. A range of management practices have to be put in place. They include developing whole river basin catchment plans, so that we have a much better understanding of the issue and a more integrated and holistic approach to water management.

EU Sugar Beet Regime

4. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When she next expects to meet representatives of the National Farmers Union in Norfolk to discuss changes to the EU sugar beet regime. [198956]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): In the past three months my noble Friend Lord Whitty, who leads on these matters, has had discussions with the president of the National Farmers Union, Tim Bennett. He has also had discussions with Tate and Lyle and with representatives of the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries that are affected by the present regime. There are no immediate plans for local NFU representative meetings.

Mr. Bellingham: Is the Minister aware that for every job that sugar beet supports on farms, there are probably six or seven more jobs in servicing and in the beet factories? That is a lot of jobs in a county such as Norfolk, which grows half the country's beet. Much of that beet is grown not on large farms, but on small farms and county council smallholdings. Given that the UK is a net importer of sugar, surely any cut in its beet quota, which would devastate small farms, would be grossly unfair?

Alun Michael: I hope the hon. Gentleman accepts that the current situation is unacceptable and that doing nothing is not an option. The EU price is three times the world level for sugar, and that is not sustainable. It is therefore important that we move as quickly as possible to the reforms that are needed, in order that everybody knows what they are doing and can plan their future business.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): If my right hon. Friend meets the farmers of Norfolk or any NFU representatives, will he politely suggest to them that there is a bigger agenda out there, which must include fairness to the developing world? Of all commodities, sugar is the biggest scandal. The way in which we treat the cane-producing countries is outrageous. Some of us met farmers from the third world this week, and they told us clearly what reforms they need and must have.

Alun Michael: Yes, I too have met representatives of countries affected in that way. I have also met farmers in the course of visits, which makes me aware of the problems of adjustment facing farmers in this country. The starting point for reform must clearly be the approach agreed by the European Council in June 2003. The findings of the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs were very similar to those of the Council, so we know the basis of the way forward, and change is vital.

Pest Control (Barnet)

5. Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): What assessment she has made of whether Barnet council's pest control service meets the council's statutory duties. [198957]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Since my hon. Friend first raised the matter with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State back in July, we have been in communication with Barnet council to assess whether it is meeting its obligations under the Prevention of Damage by Pests Act 1949. Where a council is found not be meeting its obligations, the Government have powers under the Act to order it to do so.

Mr. Dismore: Since I first raised the matter, I have had a further 21 complaints from all over my constituency with rapidly increasing frequency, which is perhaps not surprising, bearing in mind that a single pair of rats can lead to 15,000 offspring in a year. Short of renaming Hendon "Hamelin" and my hon. Friend donning a pied piper outfit, can he do something to shake the Tory council out of its complacency? The default powers must be used to protect my constituents from the growing and breeding problem of the terrible rat infestation from which we are suffering.

Mr. Bradshaw: I take note of what my hon. Friend says. Since he became so energetically engaged in the issue, we have asked the Central Science Laboratory to give us its view as to whether his local Conservative council is carrying out its duties properly. It has asked the council a series of detailed questions, a copy of which I have passed on to him. I am sure he will hold his local council to account, as will we, if it does not answer those questions properly.

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Can the hon. Gentleman tie his question into Barnet council? If so, I call him.

Mr. Flook: Barnet, like all areas, has pests that need controlling, and for some parts of our country it is the number of deer that needs to be controlled. If the current method is to be banned, does the Minister really have a plan for a deer management scheme on Exmoor?

Mr. Bradshaw: You are being very generous in allowing me to answer this question, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Gentleman will know that the Government are working on a new deer management strategy, and it will not rely on stag hunting.

Waste Management

6. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): If she will make a statement on the role of energy from waste in achieving the Government's waste reduction targets. [198958]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): Energy from waste cannot contribute towards waste reduction, but does contribute towards more sustainable waste management and the UK's landfill directive targets. Energy from waste is a viable waste management option, as demonstrated by its position in the waste hierarchy—below minimisation, re-use, recycling and composting, but above disposal and landfill.

Mr. Amess: If incinerators are to be built, what is the Minister doing to encourage the construction of combined heat and power plants, which have the advantage of offering cheap power and heat to local communities, and the added advantage of reducing the amount of waste to be taken to landfill?

Mr. Morley: I accept that if there is to be an energy-from-waste plant, for which a number of designs exist, combined heat and power is to be encouraged, and the Government have programmes and procedures for doing that. Through the waste and resources action programme we have supported new technologies as thermal treatments, such as pyrolisis, which also gasify waste, capture the energy and often produce residue that can also be refuse-derived waste. We are interested in all forms of waste treatments and it is up to local authorities to choose the system that they think is most appropriate.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that although the Government have done a great deal to stimulate energy-from-waste projects, it often becomes a matter of planning permission? Whether it is an incinerator or pyrolisis, or a different method of mechanical or biological treatments, so often a nimbyish attitude towards such a project prevents us from moving in a positive direction and the contribution that such technology could make is stilted.

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and on many occasions substantial investment in waste treatment facilities, which are not always thermal treatments or incineratory—it can be a range of facilities—is significantly delayed. Planning policy guidance 10 is under review, with consideration being given to waste disposal infrastructure, and we are keen to encourage a regional strategic approach. We do not want to ignore people's legitimate concerns, but nor do we want undue delays in terms of major investment, which is essential to a move towards sustainable waste management.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): The Minister is well aware of public concerns about the safety of incinerators, and studies show that results from biannual testing for dioxins in incinerators can be up to 50 times different from those provided by continuous monitoring. The matter was raised with the Minister some time ago and he said that he would look into continuous monitoring. Can he give us an update on the progress that is being made?

Mr. Morley: Yes, I can. It is a perfectly reasonable point to make that in relation to incineration capacity there should be regular monitoring of outputs. However, there is a huge difference between modern incinerators and some of the older ones in relation to their outputs and dioxin levels. The hon. Lady will also be aware that the Government have commissioned detailed research into the health effects of all methods of waste disposal, which also helps to inform this debate and the kind of choices that local authorities may want to make.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I am rather sceptical about the Government's soft-shoe shuffle towards waste incineration, but at least one form is acceptable, which is in use in Leicestershire, where 20 farmers in a co-operative are using the waste products from timber processing to produce wood pellets for incineration and heating in schools. Does the Minister agree that that is an acceptable use, and will he visit the Orchard school in Castle Donington with me to have a look at its new boiler system, one of several in the county, which I switched on just weeks ago?

Mr. Morley: I am always interested in looking at boilers, and I shall certainly talk to my hon. Friend about that. I agree that that is an innovative and useful way of utilising waste wood in relation to energy capture. I am also impressed with the very large biodigester that has been located in Leicester—another alternative way of dealing with waste.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Will the Minister take this opportunity to explain the implications for energy from waste of the Waste and Emissions Trading Act 2003? Can he tell the House whether he is blowing hot and cold on combined heat and power? Will he seek to extend plants such as the SELCHIP—south-east London combined heat and power—energy from waste plant to combined heat and power, enabling that plant to live up to its name?

Mr. Morley: Large emitters will fall within the scope of the Waste and Emissions Trading Act 2003. In relation to combined heat and power, the Government have made it clear that we want to encourage a higher proportion of good-quality combined heat and power. There may be some small measures in relation to carbon trading that can help in expanding plants and giving them some encouragement, and I hope that that happens.

Fisheries

7. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): What discussions she has had with representatives of the fishing industry ahead of the forthcoming European Fisheries Council. [198959]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, Ross Finnie and I met UK industry leaders in October. Mr. Finnie and I also met industry representatives at the successful launch in Edinburgh on 4 November of the North Sea Regional Advisory Council. We expect to have further discussions in the margins of the Fisheries Council next week.

Mr. Carmichael: I thank the Minister for that answer. I know that the process of engagement with the industry will be ongoing over the next few weeks, but may I urge him to recognise that that process should not end at the Council door, but continue throughout the negotiation process, and that the fishing industry's views should be sought before any deal is done? In that way, we might avoid the unintended consequences from the deal that we had last year, whereby fishermen in my constituency were left with a permit scheme that was both bureaucratic and, frankly, unworkable.

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes, I agree. I know very well the problems that the hon. Gentleman describes in his constituency, having visited the Shetland islands myself in the summer. He is right that it is important that we work closely with the industry, as we are doing not only through the new regional advisory councils, but through the science fisheries partnership, investing £1 million every year in collaborative work to try to bring science and the fishing industry closer together. That collaborative work is important. It is not always the case that we can do what the fishing industry wants, but it is still very important that we work together closely to get the best deal for the UK.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend bend his efforts to ensure that the Commission's proposals are based on accurate up-to-date stock figures that take into account the effects of decommissioning and the conservation measures taken so far, rather than the worst-case scenario of the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea, which the Commission seems to prefer? Secondly, the industry would want to him to recognise that, while the British industry has taken the biggest hit on decommissioning and reduction of the white fish effort, other fishing nations are still building up their white fish effort. That is totally unacceptable to the British industry.

Mr. Bradshaw: I certainly accept that we have to take account of the most up-to-date figures. My hon. Friend is right that, because of the decline of the cod stocks, it is the UK white fish fleet, which has traditionally relied on cod and has the biggest quota of cod, that has suffered the most. I suspect that at the forthcoming December Council, there will be some difficult decisions for the Spanish and others about hake, but we will certainly make it plain to the Commission, as we did at the launch of the regional advisory council, that it is important that it takes into account the decommissioning that has been so painful for his fleets and so many others in the rest of the UK.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): The Minister may know that the Canadian Fisheries Minister visited last week and had a meeting with the all-party fisheries group. One of the points discussed was the effect of the closure of the Canadian grand bank cod grounds on the cod fishery, but it appears that the long-term closure has had no appreciable effect on cod stocks in Canadian waters. Given that, can the Minister tell us what his attitude will be to the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea recommendation on the closure of the North sea cod fishery, which will have a dramatic impact on the Scottish haddock fishery?

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman may well be aware, if he has studied the history of the grand banks of Canada, of the scientific consensus that the reason cod stocks have not recovered is that the decision to close the fishery was made too late. If cod stocks are depleted to that extent, they often do not recover. Instead, there has been a growth in prawn stocks, which the fishing industry has been able to exploit.

I shall certainly make the hon. Gentleman's point during the December negotiations, but he should note that for the past two years ICES has advised a total closure of the North sea cod fishery. That advice has not been followed in the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that if we are to get our fisheries policy right, we shall need very good information from our scientists? Scientists at the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science—CEFAS—in Lowestoft are unhappy about the fact that their rates of pay are significantly below those of my hon. Friend's officials in the Department. Will my hon. Friend look into that? I would not wish the advice that he receives to be impaired by a work force who are becoming really fed up with not being treated very well.

Mr. Bradshaw: I certainly undertake to look into the matter. Let me take this opportunity to pay tribute to the excellent work that my hon. Friend's constituents do at CEFAS, and the invaluable advice that they give not just to us but to other decision-makers in Europe and the rest of the world.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I am sure that the Minister will join me in welcoming the growing improvement in relations and co-operation between fishermen and scientists, despite the pay levels. As he knows, however, we are one month away from making momentous decisions once again on the future of the fishing industry, and the European Commission has still not published stock assessment or effort control proposals. Is not leaving the opportunity for proper consultation and discussion with the industry until that late hour in December a recipe for the kind of mistakes that the December Council has made all too often?

Mr. Bradshaw: I take the hon. Gentleman's point to some extent. One of the reasons for our attempt to achieve multi-annual recovery plans was not having to go through that annual process, but ICES reports in October, which gives both us and the Commission a fairly tight time frame. That does not mean that we cannot have discussions with the industry based on our best guesstimate of what the Commission will recommend as a result of scientific advice, and we have had such discussions both before and since ICES reported.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Last year's Council resulted in a most impractical scheme in the North sea. The Minister did not consult the numerous British fishermen who are currently dotted around various hotels in Brussels waiting for news. Will he give a cast-iron guarantee that this year, before accepting any proposals, he will discuss them in detail and in a practical manner with those fishermen? He did not give such a clear reply to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael).

Mr. Bradshaw: It is not true that we did not consult fishery representatives during last year's Council. I should like to think that we have improved the process this year, not only through the personal contact that I have mentioned between leading fishing industry representatives and the Secretary of State and me, but through my regular, intensive contact with senior fisheries officials. What I cannot guarantee—and I hope the hon. Gentleman would not expect me to—is a veto for the fishing industry on any decision that we might make.

Rural Strategy

8. Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): If she will make a statement on progress towards implementing her Department's rural strategy 2004. [198960]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): We are making very good progress. Last month I announced the launch of seven local pathfinder partnerships, which will test practical ways of improving local delivery. Indeed, the pathfinder in the north-west includes the right hon. Gentleman's constituency. We hope to publish a draft Bill in the new year, and we are also making good progress towards setting up the integrated agency and the new countryside agency.

Mr. Jack: It is interesting that the Minister thinks that he is making good progress. I commend to him the evidence of the centre for rural economy at Newcastle university to the Select Committee, which is inquiring into the matter. The centre has criticised the Minister's strategy for lacking vision and clarity.

The Minister is currently establishing regional rural priority boards. Will they have rurally based business people on them, and how will their work under the aegis of Government offices relate to the economic development work being embarked on by the regional development agencies?

Alun Michael: I will read with interest any comments made by Newcastle university, but it is plain wrong to say that there is a lack of vision because we have a clear vision of a sustainable future for rural communities. We seek to engage with rural businesses in that work. At the beginning of this week, I met business representatives in the west midlands specifically to discuss engagement with rural business. We will provide details of the priority boards in due course, but I assure the right hon. Gentleman that we seek to engage with business and extend all aspects of sustainable development—economic, as well as environmental and social.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): We are rapidly moving towards a situation in which payments to farmers are decoupled from production. What assessment have the Government made of the risk that UK agricultural output will fall dramatically over the next five years?

Alun Michael: That is an interesting question that goes much wider than the question tabled by the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack). We have, of course, assessed the impact of changes on farming and food. Modernisation will challenge the farming industry, and that is why we established the policy commission on the future of farming and food, with which the farming industry has engaged strongly—indeed, Sir Donald Curry led the commission from within the industry.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend seen the speculation about the subsidies that individuals receive under the present scheme and whether those individuals will continue to receive the same subsidies under the decoupled scheme? Although such matters are private—unfortunately, they do not fall under freedom of information legislation—it has been speculated that one individual in this country gets £20 million a year in subsidy and that a number of others get more than £10 million. Will those individuals continue to receive those subsidies just for keeping their farms pretty and cutting the grass?

Alun Michael: As my hon. Friend anticipates, I will not comment on individual payments. At the moment, farm incomes are increasing by about 15 per cent. and the benefits of decoupling are beginning to work through into the farming industry's performance. We are seeking to strengthen the weaker aspects of the rural economy through the rural development regulation.

Flood Defence

9. Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): What steps his Department will be taking to streamline flood defence management systems. [198961]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): We are implementing the outcomes of the flood and coastal defence funding review. Those include making the Environment Agency responsible for all rivers that present the greatest flood risk; providing the Environment Agency with a single stream of Government funding with streamlined scheme approval arrangements; and creating a single tier of flood defence committees.

Mr. Bercow: I am not sure that the Minister's answer is particularly enlightening. He could usefully learn from Lord Falkland's dictum:

> "When it is not necessary to change, it is necessary not to change."

Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is a risk that Government fiat is a move away from the old system of local control and that local knowledge and expertise about the problems of particular localities will be lost? That will be done in the name of the Government's obsession with regionalism, which few people understand and even fewer people want.

Mr. Morley: A river catchment area is not a political or regional boundary, and the argument for a regional approach is strong and practical. Having said that, I concede that I do not want to lose local knowledge. The regional flood defence committees have a majority representation from local authorities. DEFRA also makes a number of appointments, and we try to reflect the range of interests in flood defence and flood defence management so that we have balanced flood defence committees with broad local knowledge. However, the main motivation is efficiency of delivery.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I welcome the changes that my hon. Friend describes. However, he will recall the terrible floods that we had in Northampton and may be aware that criticisms were made of the way in which the flood defence committee's management systems worked, in that they tended to favour agricultural, rather than urban and residential areas. Can he explain how his changes will give a better and clearer voice to urban and residential property owners and landowners, especially in an area that has been designated for growth and where there will be real pressures on the flood plains?

Mr. Morley: I understand very well the point that my hon. Friend makes. The Northampton floods were a seminal event that were responsible for significant changes in the way we approach flood management and defence. As I say, local authorities will have the majority, and we would expect them to have a reasonable cross-section of ability and representation. However, if there was an undue representation of agricultural or farming interests, that could be balanced by DEFRA's appointments.

Mr. Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): The Minister will be aware that, in many low-lying parts of rural Lincolnshire, efficient flood defence by local internal drainage boards is essential. Will he confirm to the House and to the people of Lincolnshire that DEFRA will pressure the Treasury and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to ensure that Lincolnshire local authorities are fully reimbursed for the levy costs so that council tax increases can be kept to a minimum and that there will be no reduction in flood defences through the IDBs as a result of the funding cuts?

Mr. Morley: As vice-president of the Association of Drainage Authorities, I can claim a considerable knowledge of drains that will match that of anyone in this House.

The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. We have to strike the correct balance in the contribution that we make to the Environment Agency and the internal drainage boards in terms of their levy-raising powers. Of course, that gives them some independence in making choices that reflect their own needs. I have always thought that the internal drainage boards do an important job and are very good at reflecting local knowledge and needs.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): One critical context for making decisions about how to allocate resources in flood defence will be the new fluvial strategies, three of which are being prepared in my constituency, one of the joys of South Derbyshire being the number of rivers that run through it. Communities such as Ambaston, on the Derwent, Shardlow, Willington and Barrow upon Trent, on the Trent, and Hilton, Hatton and Egginton, on the Dove, are all waiting anxiously for the publication of those strategies. Can we try to ensure that they move with some speed towards their conclusion so that we can start to see some action on the needs of those communities?

Mr. Morley: I know that my hon. Friend has been very much involved in this issue and has raised the potential impact on his local communities with the Department on several occasions. When I last spoke to the Environment Agency, I was told that the strategies are very close to completion. My hon. Friend will understand that, to provide effective flood defence, it is necessary to understand the whole catchment area and the nature of the river or estuary. The approach that the agency has taken in that sophisticated modelling and planning is exactly the right way forward, and I am sure that the report will be available in the very near future.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): Is the Minister aware that the new single-tier system that is being introduced will create a committee stretching from the Thames estuary to Bournemouth and that that will happen at crucial time for my constituency? The Minister may know that East head has recently been breached. If it is washed away completely, that will shortly threaten villages in my constituency, including West Wittering, with flooding. In the past, he has been very helpful in considering problems in Chichester. Will he now commit to looking urgently and extremely carefully at how we can assist the agencies and the flood defence committee to ensure that East head is not further eroded?

Mr. Morley: I recently spoke to the Environment Agency about East head, and I understand that, although there may be the risk of a breach, there is no immediate threat to properties in the area. I hope that that reassures the hon. Gentleman.

In the longer term, I revert to the point that I made to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble). A detailed study of the tidal conditions in the bay and the effect on East head is under way and the agency is considering it. It has been funded to do that. Before taking appropriate action, one has to understand the natural forces and the pressures on them.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's point about regional flood defence committees. Most parts of the country have had large regional areas that have worked effectively for some time. However, I am aware of specific issues in Sussex and I understand that they are being considered.

Rural Payments Agency

10. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): When she last met the chief executive of the Rural Payments Agency to discuss progress on implementing new technology systems. [198962]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I meet the chief executive of the Rural Payments Agency frequently to ensure that its programme of modernisation proceeds at a brisk pace.

Paddy Tipping: My right hon. Friend knows that the RPA faces a big change programme against a background of new and different ways of paying farmers and landowners that come into force next year. Is he confident, and will he give an assurance, that single farm payments will be made in December 2005?

Alun Michael: My confidence is growing as the meetings proceed and I can see each step of the way tested. We aim to make payments as early as possible in the window for payments, which starts, as my hon. Friend suggests, on 1 December 2005.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): As the Minister said, that window is not even expected to open until 1 December 2005. This year's payments are already later than last year's. Farmers face one of their worst years ever, with not only low commodity prices but, in many parts of the country, the consequences of a difficult harvest. Does not the Minister understand the cash-flow implications, which are estimated at some £50 million in East Anglia alone, of the delay in payments? Does he accept that anything less than annual payments puts an untold burden on farmers when they are rightly trying to face up to what everybody, including the Minister, accepts are massive changes in the future of farming in this country?

Alun Michael: My postbag, especially from Members of Parliament, reflects a considerable drop in complaints about the RPA and an increase in satisfaction with its performance. The payment window opens on 1 December next year and we are doing all that we can to ensure that everything is in place and works effectively. We are validating and testing everything, from the rural land register, which went live on 6 September, to implementation. All that is due to be completed by the summer. The hon. Gentleman's lack of confidence is therefore unfortunate and misplaced.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): In the discussions that my right hon. Friend is holding with the chief executive about new technology, will he examine businesses that are linked to farming? Following the BSE crisis, they have still not received the full pay-out that they would have expected, to the extent that the Inland Revenue is seeking to reclaim money. Will he ascertain whether getting the payments made can be joined up across Departments?

Alun Michael: I am happy to examine any individual cases that my hon. Friend may have. In general, we are trying to ensure that the system is joined up so that we do not have some of the dysfunctional interfaces that occurred in the past. That is at the centre of what we are trying to achieve.

Rural Development Regulation

11. Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): If she will make a statement on the implications of the draft EU rural development regulation. [198963]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): The Commission's proposals for the new rural development regulation were published in July 2004 for programmes running from 2007 to 2013. We have been negotiating—and continue to do so—for further simplification of the rules; a better focus of the EU rural development expenditure on the delivery of real public benefits; a clearer contribution with shared environmental objectives; and fairer allocation of EU money. We are concerned about the fairer allocation of EU money to this country, of course.

Mr. Thomas: I am worried about the impact of the draft regulation on upland farmers. The Minister knows that less favoured area status, which applies to 80 per cent. of Wales and almost all of my constituency, has been essential to support the sort of upland farming that has given us magnificent scenery that we can exploit for tourism. It has also given us a magnificent upland environment, which is an important part of the way in which we tackle climate change and the future of agriculture in this country. Will he give some assurances about how upland farming can be supported and the Government's attitude to the regulation so that we can maintain viable upland farming throughout the United Kingdom and the essential environment and landscape that is so important for us all?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman is correct to spell out the challenge in respect of upland farming, which we are seeking to address very carefully. In relation to Wales, that is a matter for the National Assembly, and I believe that Carwyn Jones will be in Brussels on Monday when further discussions are taking place. The consultation in England and that undertaken in Wales by the Assembly have both closed recently. We will consider the outcomes and I am sure that there will be discussion between us and the Assembly's representatives, which will include a focus on upland farming.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): As I understand it, the draft regulation is accompanied by proposals on common agricultural policy farming, which include the process of revising the designation of less favoured areas. Bearing in mind what DEFRA approved just a few months ago, which the Secretary of State announced, is the Minister aware that clarity and early explanation of what is meant by this are vital for those areas?

Alun Michael: As I understand it, the Commission has proposed that member states redesignate their less favoured areas, removing socio-economic factors from the definitions. That arises from criticism from the European Court of Auditors. We have supported the proposal. We do not expect it to lead to significant changes in the designation of less favoured areas in the UK, but under current Commission proposals there is considerable scope for socio-economic objectives to be met through axis 3 funding. We are also pushing for the criteria for designation to be strongly linked to land management benefits and the positive environmental contribution that the programmes seek to achieve.

Landfill Tax Escalator

12. Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): What proposals she has to recycle the proceeds of the landfill tax escalator to business over the next three years. [198964]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): We expect to announce a programme of measures shortly that will recycle additional landfill tax revenues—£284 million over three years from April 2005—back to business by providing support that specifically targets resource efficiency, waste minimisation and diversion away from landfill.

Dr. Whitehead: Does my hon. Friend agree with me on the importance of the initiative in ensuring that business plays a full and important part in the recycling, reuse and minimisation process? Will he consider prioritising funding for schemes that promote recycling and trading in materials between businesses where a material is a waste product of one company's processes, but might constitute raw materials for those of another?

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend makes a good suggestion. As part of the agreed split on the income from the landfill tax, a lot of it will go towards helping businesses with resource management in the most general sense—energy waste resource management. The idea of one company's waste being used as another's raw material is a good one. I will certainly consider it seriously.

Sewerage Regulation

13. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): If she will make a statement on the regulation of sewerage operation by water utilities. [198965]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): Sewerage undertakers are under a statutory duty under section 94 of the Water Industry Act 1991—enforceable by the Secretary of State or the director general of water services—to provide, improve and extend public sewers and to maintain those sewers to ensure the effectual drainage of their area.

Dr. Cable: Some progress is being made on odour pollution from sewage works following court action and an odour abatement notice being made in south-west London in respect of Thames Water and the Mogden plant. Will the Minister acknowledge that, for the court action to be effective, the Government will have to specify the standards that must be met and the water regulator will have to approve the necessary capital investment? Will he take action on those points?

Mr. Morley: I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that action is being taken on that and he will be aware that my noble Friend Lord Whitty paid a visit to his local sewage works to consider some of the odour problems. Enforcement action was taken in November. We are in the process of producing a code of practice that lays out those standards, which the hon. Gentleman has asked for. That will be a useful framework for the sewerage industry to work within as regards the standards that we want to be applied to odour control.

Mr. Ian Cawsey (Brigg and Goole) (Lab): My hon. Friend has already claimed the title of King Drain this morning, so I wonder whether he can do a similar job on sewers. Many Members will think that unadopted sewers, and the role of water utilities in them, are the biggest issue. In Dragonby in my constituency, which used to be in my hon. Friend's constituency, the sewers that are part of the former steel houses, which are now privately owned, cause regular blockages and problems. When does he expect to do something about that, with the water utilities, so that the blight on many of my constituents, and other hon. Members' constituents, can be ended?

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend makes a good point. As he rightly says, I know the situation in Dragonby, although it appears that the sewers have got worse since my hon. Friend inherited the village. The whole issue of private sewers is very complicated. We want to address it, and we have made clear in relation to the report that we commissioned the options that we can consider. That report showed that up to 50 per cent. of the population are connected directly or indirectly to private sewers, so it is a major issue. I will attend the all-party sewers and sewerage group meeting on 2 December, at which I hope to outline the steps that we can take, the kind of problems faced and some of the solutions that we can consider.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Is it right that, in 2004, many residents still suffer internal sewerage flooding in their homes and gardens? What power has the Minister to ensure that water utility companies put repairs in process immediately?

Mr. Morley: Yes, sewer flooding is an appalling experience for people, particularly for those who suffer it repeatedly. There has been some recent case law on the responsibility of sewer companies in relation to repeat sewer flooding, and I am happy to write to the hon. Gentleman on that, as it might be of use to him in relation to his constituency case. More generally, sewer flooding was a feature of the ministerial guidance to the regulator in relation to his current job of setting the prices for the next five-year period. I am confident that the regulator, who is well aware of these issues and has received direct representations from Members of the House, will bear that in mind in approving companies' business plans for that period.

Fallen Stock

14. Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): What additional facilities are planned for the disposal of fallen stock in the event of a hunting ban. [198966]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): None. Other operators in the fallen stock collection and disposal industry have consistently maintained that they have sufficient capacity to deal with additional quantities of fallen stock.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Is the Minister aware that the Mendip farmers hunt recently opened a facility, built to Ministry specifications, to take fallen stock from the whole Mendip area that will be jeopardised if hunting is banned? Will he state clearly whether rendering and incineration capacity is adequate to cope with the national fallen stock collection service, which is much delayed but is coming into effect later this month? Alternatively, will that shortage of capacity create problems in line with the general ineptitude and incompetence that has surrounded this whole issue and the way it has been dealt with by his Department?

Mr. Bradshaw: No. The National Fallen Stock Company running the scheme is satisfied that the rendering and incineration capacity is sufficient to cope with the stock.

Fruit Farming

15. Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): If she will make a statement on Government support for fruit farming. [198967]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs funds a substantial research and development programme that is of benefit to fruit farmers. Growers are also eligible for assistance under the England rural development programme.

Hugh Robertson: The Minister will be aware that fruit farmers are feeling the squeeze at the moment. Supermarkets are bearing down on them, which is affecting their income, while at the same time the Agricultural Wages Board has awarded a series of above-inflation wage increases. Given that we now have a national minimum wage, why does agriculture, and agriculture alone, still have a wages board?

Alun Michael: It has been the view of successive Ministers and Departments that the Agricultural Wages Board should continue. There are many differences between agriculture and horticulture. Horticulture has never had the distorting subsidies that agriculture has had. We contribute to the industry as a whole through the research programme, worth some £2.5 million this year. We want the industry to continue to be a success.

Points of Order

12.30 pm

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to raise a point about which I have already forewarned the relevant Minister's office.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in the last oral questions to the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on 21 October, the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), said, in reference to the foot and mouth video of Burnside farm,

"I have not seen the video".—[Official Report, 21 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 1006.]

Later, he did not refute my contention that no Minister had seen it. In a written question on 9 November, I asked the Minister when DEFRA first obtained a copy of the video. He answered

"DEFRA recently obtained copies of the video when it was referred to in correspondence received on 30 September 2004."—[Official Report, 9 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 577*W*.]

Yesterday, Lord Whitty, another DEFRA Minister, wrote to my noble Friend Baroness Byford and made statements that contradict the Under-Secretary of State. First, he stated:

"I confirm that I saw part of the video at the time of Mr. Waugh's trial".

Secondly, he said:

"The first record DEFRA has of receiving a copy of the video . . . is at the beginning of February 2003."

Both Ministers cannot be right. Would it be in order for the Under-Secretary of State to explain why Ministers disagree in explaining what increasingly looks like a cover-up, and to apologise for—no doubt inadvertently—misleading the House?

Mr. Speaker: I am quite sure that the hon. Gentleman will know how to follow up his inquiries, but it is not for me to ask a Minister to apologise.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): But he is in the Chamber.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know that the Minister is in the Chamber, but it is not for me to pursue an apology.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Come on, Ben.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It was a point of order, and I am responding to it.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Point of order, Mr. Letwin? [Interruption.] Mr. Heald.

Mr. Heald: I think that Mr. Letwin may be a little thinner than I am, Mr. Speaker. My point of order has to do with the amendments tabled by the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality and his Parliamentary Private Secretary, in lieu of the Lords amendments passed last night. The new proposals were made available in the Vote Office at 12.5 pm—that is, 25 minutes ago. They raise issues that hon. Members of all parties may wish to consider. In those circumstances, would you be prepared to suspend the sitting for a short period, so that hon. Members can familiarise themselves with the new proposals, which are very different from what has gone before?

Mr. Speaker: No, I will not suspend the sitting.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will be aware of the very serious events last night in the Bernabéu stadium, which followed similar incidents in the England under-21 international—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman may be aware of that, as he submitted an urgent question on it. I refused the urgent question, so I will not take a point of order on the matter.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a genuine point of order. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] It follows on from the point raised my hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House. That, too, was a genuine point of order, as was, I am sure, the one raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson). Will you confirm that it would be in order, in principle, to table manuscript amendments to these very late Government motions? The new proposals mean that those of us who wish to oppose a ban on hunting face difficult decisions. If there is to be a ban, we would want it to be extended for the maximum period before implementation. Are manuscript amendments acceptable in principle? Will you explain how we can submit such amendments if we are to move immediately to the business in hand?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has been a Member of the House for some time. He will know that I will look at and consider manuscript amendments, but that whether I accept them is another matter.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, Doug Smith, chief executive of the Child Support Agency, resigned. Earlier that day, he told the Select Committee on Work and Pensions that the CSA has no contingency plan if the computer system proves to be beyond repair. Have you had any notice from the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions that he intends to come to the House today to explain what the Government's plans now are? We all have constituents who are not getting money because the CSA system does not work and the Government are ultimately responsible for the shambles.

Mr. Speaker: I have had no such notice.

Mr. Heald: Further to my point of order, Mr. Speaker. You have decided that the House must go ahead immediately with the Hunting Bill, but can you give any guidance for the future on the amount of time that the Government should allow hon. Members when amendments in lieu are tabled? Twenty-five minutes are not enough. Although I fully understand and accept your decision and the reasons for it, some guidance for the future would be most welcome.

Mr. Speaker: I am not worried about the future; I am worried about getting through today.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Some of those present have been Members of Parliament for a considerable number of years but have never seen the Parliament Act invoked—[Hon Members: "Yes, we have."] There are new Members who have not seen it. I ask for some explanation of the Speaker's role in the Parliament Act.

Mr. Speaker: Old Members and new Members can always go to the Library—it is very conveniently placed only a few yards away and I often use it. It is nice of the hon. Gentleman to make that request on behalf of Members, but that is why the Library exists. It is very useful.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Are you prepared to consider a manuscript amendment that would allow two votes, one on the first part of amendment a and another on the second?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. Gentleman puts a manuscript amendment to me, I shall consider it.

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have two matters to raise. First, I should be grateful if you asked the Minister in charge of the Hunting Bill to explain how the commitment that he has repeatedly given at the Dispatch Box, and therefore in the House, that Labour Members of Parliament have a free vote is compatible with the activity of Government Whips trying to get Labour Members to vote for a specific amendment?

Secondly, on a point of order directly for you, last night, when at a high level assurances were given to right hon. and hon. Labour Members—[Hon. Members: "Oh!"] Hon. Members should contain themselves: I am asking the Speaker to clarify procedure. Given that we are now in a position other than the one set out in the assurances given last night to right hon. and hon. Labour Members regarding the Government's view on the implementation date, and given that there are two amendments dealing with the implementation date, one tabled by the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality and the other by the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley), I seek your guidance on whether, if either amendment is carried, it will affect the integrity of the Bill in relation to the invocation of the Parliament Act?

Mr. Speaker: On the second point, the House makes decisions; I am then guided by the Parliament Act in working out how to proceed from there. As for Whips' activities, Whips are always active and hon. Members know how to handle them.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): Further to the first part of the point of order raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman), Mr. Speaker. I thought that all my right hon. and hon. Friends were aware of this fact, but let me make it absolutely clear: for Labour Members this is a free vote.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been listening to one or two people sitting round me in the House, and it is clear that everyone has a different interpretation of what is happening. We recognise that we are in an unusual position, and we are depending on you to guide us to ensure that at the end of the day, this Hunting Bill is carried. [Interruption.] That is the will of the House. People in this Chamber believe that there is a rat that smells, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hunting Bill (Procedure) (No. 3)

12.40 pm

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I beg to move the Hunting Bill (Procedure) (No. 3) motion, standing in my name and that of the Leader of the House. It might assist the House if I read out the terms of the motion, so that they are clear to all Members. The—

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Speaker: I have taken a point of order from the hon. Gentleman. I hope that this is a different one.

Mr. Luff: On a completely different point of order, Mr. Speaker. It would be helpful if we knew for how long this debate can continue.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is not debatable. The Question will be put forthwith.

Alun Michael: The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), through his point of order, makes it clear why it will assist the House if I read out—

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD) rose—

Mr. Speaker: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is rising to make different a point of order.

Lembit Öpik: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On the basis of what you have just said, I am surely correct in assuming that it would not be appropriate for the Minister to participate in such a debate, given that the Question has to be put immediately.

Alun Michael rose—

Mr. Speaker: The Minister should confine himself to reading the motion.

Alun Michael: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker. The motion states:

> That the Orders of 15th September and 16th November shall be supplemented as follows:
> 1. At this day's sitting proceedings on consideration of any Lords message relating to the Hunting Bill shall be brought to a conclusion (unless already concluded) one hour after commencement.
>
> 2. For the purpose of bringing proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 the Speaker shall put the following questions forthwith (and no others)-
>
> (1) any question which has been proposed from the Chair and has not yet been decided, and
>
> (2) the question on any motion moved by a Minister of the Crown.
>
> 3. Paragraphs 3 to 5 of the Order of 16th November shall apply.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am putting the Question.

The House proceeded to a Division.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This Division seems to have gone on for 17 minutes. I think that there is an argument in the Government Lobby. Can it be investigated?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the Serjeant at Arms to find out what is happening.

The House having divided: Ayes 271, Noes 136.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: The Clerk has informed me that a number of manuscript amendments have been tabled and, of course, I have promised hon. Members that I will give them consideration. In view of the number of manuscript amendments, I am going to suspend the House until 1.40 pm.

1.2 pm

Sitting suspended.

Orders of the Day

Hunting Bill

1.44 pm

On resuming—

Lords message considered.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the House is in his place. Has he given you any indication that he intends to make a statement on what has obviously gone wrong today? Does he accept that this is no way to run a national Parliament, let alone a ping-pong tournament?

Mr. Speaker: Nothing has gone wrong—absolutely nothing. I am running the proceedings in the House.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance. A paper is going around that I have not had the opportunity to see, but if any amendment to the Bill is carried today and if the two Houses cannot reach agreement on the Bill at the end of the day, will you be able to invoke the Parliament Act?

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising that point of order. The Parliament Act is applicable if agreement on the Bill as a whole is not achieved. That will not be affected if the House agrees to either of the two motions that are being proposed today. Beyond that, I do not want to be drawn into ruling on hypothetical situations, because it might be thought that I was trying to influence the debate. It is up to the Minister to explain the effect of the motion that he is bringing before the House.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you clarify whether, if you chose to use the Parliament Act and it was used under your guidance—you have to follow the rules—you could be swayed at all by a vote in this House? Do you agree that the only way in which you can be prevented from using the Parliament Act is by a vote in this Parliament telling you not to use it, and can we have that vote?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Lady is correct; that is the case.

Lords amendments: Nos. 1 to 44 and 46 to 54.

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that privilege is involved in Lords amendments Nos. 10C, 12C and 52C. If the House agrees to the amendments, I will arrange for the necessary entries to be made in the Journal. I inform the House that I have selected the amendment to the Minister's amendment in the name of Opposition Members.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. For clarity, there are two amendments in the names of Opposition Members. Which one are you referring to?

Mr. Speaker: Amendment No. 1.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I beg to move, That this House insists on its disagreement to Lords amendments Nos. 1 to 44 and 46 to 54, disagrees with the Lords in their amendments 10C, 12C, 46C and 52C, but proposes the following amendment in lieu—

Leave out Clause 15 and insert the following new Clause:—

'Commencement

(1) The following provisions of this Act shall come into force on 31st July 2007—

(a) sections 1 to 4,

(b) Part 2 in so far as it relates to sections 1 to 4,

(c) sections 11 to 14 in so far as they relate to sections 1 to 4,

(d) Schedule 1, and

(e) Schedules 2 and 3, except in so far as they change the law in relation to an activity to which section 5 applies.

(2) The following provisions of this Act shall come into force at the end of the period of three months beginning with the date on which it is passed—

(a) section 5,

(b) Part 2 in so far as it relates to section 5,

(c) sections 11 to 13 in so far as they relate to section 5, and

(d) Schedules 2 and 3 in so far as they change the law in relation to an activity to which section 5 applies.'.

Essentially, I am inviting the House to restore the Bill to the form that we have previously agreed, but I shall also be inviting it to consider proposals in respect of commencement. I want to explain what I am trying to do today. As always, the Government want to be helpful and constructive, giving people time to adjust to the reality of legislation on the statute book. I shall then explain the procedure. I want to do those two things very clearly and without taking interventions, so there is absolutely no doubt about what I am saying. Of course, I will then be prepared to take interventions from hon. and right hon. Members.

This House previously agreed to propose a delay in commencement until July 2006. I have tabled a motion proposing July 2007, and my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) has proposed 2006. Those are both choices that would enable this House not only to be reasonable but to be seen to be reasonable by going the extra mile, if we like. The House insists on the Bill as it has already agreed it, with only that date being changed. That is what is before us today.

Let me come to the procedure. I suggest to the House that it is clear but complicated, and I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for the clarification that you gave before we started the debate. I want to give hon. Members complete certainty about the impact of what we are asking the House to agree to today. I am advised that passing either motion on commencement would not in any way affect the application of the Parliament Act. We would be passing not an amendment to the Bill, but a motion to propose an amendment in lieu. In other words, we would send the Bill to the other place as previously passed by this House in its Parliament Actable form. Alongside it, if passed, would be the motion making the proposal that the other place amend the Bill in order to delay commencement of the ban. From that point on, the only question is whether the Bill becomes law with the agreement of the other place or via application of the Parliament Act, with or without the proposed change in the date of commencement.

If we send a motion proposing an amendment to the Lords and they accept it, it will form part of the Bill as enacted. If there are no other disagreements, the Bill will pass without the Parliament Act. If there are disagreements, the Parliament Act will enact the Bill as first sent to the other place, but with the amendments proposed by this House today. If neither of the amendments is carried, I will move that this House insists on its disagreement with all the Lords amendments and disagrees to their amendments in lieu. Our position is very simple.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend knows, the Countryside Alliance has threatened to drag this through the courts. Can he guarantee that the High Court, the Court of Appeal and the judicial council of the other place will absolutely agree with the interpretation that he has given us today?

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend knows that it would be unwise of any Minister to predict what they will do about anything, be it the original Bill, an amended Bill or any other legislation. I can say, however, that if we do what I suggest and pass the Bill in its Parliament Actable form—that is, if we reject the Lords amendments and invite the Lords to take the common-sense step of agreeing to our proposition for a delay in the date of commencement—that sensible approach would lead only to the courts' considering whether the date of commencement should be a date that we have agreed in this House or the original date three months hence, in February 2005. I think that the position is entirely clear, and although I appreciate the wish of some hon. Members to make it more complicated, I shall do my best to keep it simple.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD) rose—

Alun Michael: I give way to the right hon. Gentleman, who I am sure will help me in that regard.

Mr. Beith: I am trying to help with clarification. The Lords having already rejected the 18-month delay, if this House sent that proposal to them by passing the second of the two motions—which would require the Minister to move it—what would happen then? Would the proposal come back to us for further consideration, or for us to suggest a further alternative? If the Lords insisted on, let us say, three years or two and three quarter years, what process would follow?

Alun Michael: I think that if the Lords did not accept our proposed date of commencement, we would have reached the end of the road. The Bill would be Parliament Acted with no change in the date of commencement.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I am not convinced that the Minister is necessarily correct, but perhaps he can put me right. As I understand it, there are two debates going on, one about the nature of the Bill and the amendments and the other about the date of commencement. The date of commencement is not connected with the question of the Parliament Act. In theory, we could go on arguing about the commencement till kingdom come, regardless of whether the rest of the Bill is enacted.

Alun Michael: In theory, we could indeed continue to argue about it for a long time. I am giving the hon. Gentleman an assurance that we will not.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Does the Minister understand that everyone in the countryside who cares for liberty and the environment will see that his machinations over commencement have absolutely nothing to do with reasonableness, as he is suggesting, and everything to do with shabby political horse-trading between Labour Members behind the scenes? The whole thing is a disgrace.

Alun Michael: I know that no hon. Member would seek to mislead the House, but it sounds as if the hon. Gentleman wants to mislead the countryside. In our original discussions with organisations that have been involved in this debate for many years, including the Countryside Alliance, those organisations—including the Countryside Alliance—accepted that the issue was cruelty. That is the subject that has dictated the debate about legislation on hunting. Let me also tell the hon. Gentleman, yet again, that people in the countryside are divided on hunting, just as people in urban areas are. This is not about a divide between urban and rural people.

This House voted on Tuesday to insist on the Bill in the form in which we sent it to the Lords in September—that is, what is generally called the banning Bill. The Lords have now insisted on their feeble version of the registration scheme, so it is the Lords who have chosen confrontation, and I regret that. At this stage, I sense no appetite among supporters of a ban in this House for any change in the House's well-established position. It is the will of this House of Commons to have this Bill. I should make clear that it is not this House that is insisting; it will be the House of Lords, if it does not accept what we are saying today, that will have provoked the application of the Parliament Act.

There remains the question of when the Bill is to come into force. As it stands, it will come into force in three months, on 18 February 2005. That three-month period applied to the original Bill, involving a tribunal system which I sought to persuade colleagues to support and which would have come into force three months after the Bill. This House has reasonably proposed a delay of about 18 months, until 31 July 2006, for the start of the ban on hunting—but not on hare coursing events, which would be banned three months after implementation in any case.

In their amendments the Lords suggested a three-year delay for all hunting, including hare coursing events, until 1 December 2007 or even later; but that would be for their registration Bill. At the same time, they voted against our suggested amendment proposing commencement on 31 July 2006. In doing so, they have in effect voted for a ban that will come into force in February next year. All the Lords' decisions on the Bill have been, in my view, irrational. With this one, they have behaved like turkeys voting for Christmas. I cannot believe that they meant it, although my noble Friend Lord Whitty made the position absolutely clear to them.

My proposed amendment in lieu would give the Lords another chance. It takes the same form as our earlier suggested amendment. It would bring the Bill into force on 31 July 2007 for hunting purposes, but again not for the purposes of hare coursing events. By sending it back to the Lords, we will give them a straightforward choice between the date that we suggest and three months from Royal Assent today. If they seek to insert a different date or to change the clause in any other way, this House will insist on the three-month period, because that will keep the Bill within the Parliament Act.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that those of us who want a total ban were willing, and continue to be willing, to go along with the earlier postponement to 31 July 2006, but no later than that? Is there not a danger that what he now proposes will give the impression that we are terrified of the threats of violence and thuggery from those who intend to break the law? Given that the House of Commons has agreed to a total ban six times in the past four years, what we propose—unlike what my right hon. Friend now proposes—is surely compromise enough, and responsibility for any further delay lies entirely with the House of Lords.

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend is quite right. I think it showed great willingness to be reasonable on the part of Members to agree to the delay of commencement until 2006. I am asking them now to go the extra mile. Whether they do so or not is in their hands. It is Members of this House who will vote on the two motions in lieu; I simply seek to persuade them to consider the 2007 option.

My proposal for a delay until July 2007 would indeed be a compromise between the Lords' proposal for 1 December 2007 and the House's earlier proposal for 31 July 2006. Hon. Members will know that my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) has tabled an amendment to reinstate the 31 July 2006 commencement date, which gives my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick) an opportunity to vote in the way in which he has suggested. I do not feel passionately about the choice between the two dates, but it is important for us to demonstrate—as my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North did when he agreed to 2006 on the last occasion—that this House is being reasonable, as well as insisting on the Bill being in the form for which this House has voted on a number of occasions.

2 pm

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): When the original Alun Michael Bill, as it came to be called, was recommitted to the Standing Committee on which I sat, I tabled 45 amendments, which the Government adopted, to make it a banning Bill. I deliberately did not table amendments to change the three-month implementation period, and nor did the Government. Will my right hon. Friend explain why he appears to have changed his position, because he could have tabled an amendment in Standing Committee to change the three-month period? He did not do so, but he now seeks July 2007.

Alun Michael: When the Bill came before the House last year and it became clear that it could be reintroduced and have the Parliament Act applied to it, I thought that common sense would prevail and that people involved with hunting would say, "Well, if the elected House of Commons in the Parliament of this country is intent on taking that decision, we had better start thinking about it." However, those who oppose a ban on hunting have encouraged their followers to believe that legislation will not be introduced. Ordinary people, who have perhaps been misled by their leadership, should be given time in order to prepare for a ban, deal with animal welfare considerations and change the activities and businesses in which they are involved. That is the common-sense and generous way in which to approach the Bill, without changing the nature of the legislation, on which this House has agreed on more than one occasion.

Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood) (Lab): Many of us think that the constant dithering over the Bill brings our political processes into disrepute. We thought that we had reached an agreement with the Government on 2006 to settle the matter. Will the Minister explain what could possibly be gained by extending the implementation date to 2007?

Alun Michael: If my right hon. Friend had listened to my response to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris), the answer would be clear: it is because the people involved in hunting are unwilling to accept that the Bill will completely change their situation and make illegal some of the activities in which they participate. I want law-abiding people to obey the law, and I hope that they will do so. The change in the implementation date will make it more possible for them to obey the law, without giving rise to employment problems or animal welfare difficulties, concerning, for instance, the disposal of packs of dogs. That is a perfectly reasonable way in which to proceed. I say to my right hon. Friend that being reasonable, which is all that I seek, cannot bring this House into disrepute. I ask the House to insist, as it has done, on the nature of the legislation that it passes, but to do so with a reasonable implementation date.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The Minister said that the countryside has been misled. Is not the truth that the countryside has been misled by the honeyed words from No. 10 to the effect that a ban would not be implemented?

Alun Michael: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is totally wrong, as he very often is. I did not say that the countryside has been misled; I said that those who are active in hunting have been misled by their leaders into thinking that this House would not act. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has acted with integrity throughout: he made it clear that he wanted to see a compromise and that he supported the Bill in the form in which I brought it to the House. He also made it clear that he respected the fact that for many years this has been a free vote issue for hon. Members—I thought that it was a free vote issue for hon. Members on both sides of this House. That is acting with integrity, and it does the right hon. and learned Gentleman no credit to cast doubt on that.

Mr. Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): I agree with my right hon. Friend on the need to go the extra mile, but will he accept that many Labour Members think that we went that extra mile with the July 2006 date? If he does not feel strongly about 2006 or 2007, will he assist other hon. Members and me by explaining why he has introduced the 2007 implementation date?

Alun Michael: Essentially, the 2007 date gives the House the option of being reasonable, as we were on the last occasion when we proposed 2006. It also gives the House the option to go the extra mile. It is between the date that we proposed and the date agreed in another place. Either 2006 or 2007 would be reasonable, but 2007 would go the extra mile.

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend clarify this point? Two months ago, he moved that the implementation date be postponed to 31 July 2006, and the House of Commons voted in favour of that. Now, he says that he wants to be reasonable by postponing the implementation date for a further year. What has happened between his moving that motion two months ago and today to make 2007 more reasonable than 2006?

Alun Michael: First, if one of the choices is reasonable, the other choice is even more reasonable. Secondly, on what has changed, we have continued to have discussions and arguments in the public domain in seeking to demonstrate that this House is being reasonable, and I have therefore put the two options before the House. I am convinced that the House will be reasonable and that one option is more reasonable than the other.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): Will the Minister clarify whether he accepts the fact that, if the Bill were introduced within three months, it would have a substantial impact on rural areas? If either of the two amendments were defeated in the Lords, is the Minister saying that he accepts in principle that the Bill would have a substantial effect and that he would introduce measures to ameliorate the effect on hunts and on the rural economy?

Alun Michael: No. As I have explained to the hon. Gentleman before, the effect on the rural economy—this is demonstrated in the Burns report—will be small, but the Bill will affect some individuals. Although it is not wrong to impose a three-month limit, which raises no serious issues, delaying implementation until July 2006 would provide a reasonable and generous opportunity to prepare for the application of the legislation, and a delay until 2007 would provide an even greater and more generous opportunity. That is the only difference.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): Earlier this week, it was trailed that some elements within the Government are concerned about the possibility of a judicial review of the procedure. The right hon. Gentleman may know that the main criterion is to have acted reasonably—this afternoon, he has repeated the word "reasonable" 25 times.

Alun Michael: That is because I am being reasonable, and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has noticed. I have received legal advice, and we are content that the Bill and the process will not lead to difficulties of the sort that, for instance, an attempt at judicial review might bring about. It is, of course, open to organisations to seek judicial review—I understand that the Countryside Alliance has sought to do so—to give notice and to take action in the courts, if they wish to do so. However, my legal advice is clear.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): The Minister is not being unreasonable with the House this afternoon, even to those of us who fundamentally disagree with the Bill and who are 100 per cent. in support of hunting. He is advancing a number of propositions, but is he prepared to advocate from the Government Front Bench that Labour Members should vote for 31 July 2007?—[Interruption.] I am not saying that he is mandating Government Members; I am suggesting that he might advocate that they vote for the amendment that would enable the country as a whole to take a decision on this issue, because between now and then there will be a general election, which can perhaps finalise the matter.

Alun Michael: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments and for his recognition that I am trying to be reasonable. I am glad that he spotted that each individual Member on this side of the House will make up their own mind and vote as they see fit. I have tabled the motion on 2007 and will invite my right hon. and hon. Friends to join me in the Lobby to vote for it. I make it clear—because at that point only motions moved by a Minister will be considered—that I intend, should the 2007 date be defeated, to move the second motion to give the House an opportunity to vote on the date of 2006. I am grateful for the opportunity to clarify that.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): On the question of possible challenges in court to the Bill once it is enacted, what legal advice has my right hon. Friend received as to whether such challenges would be more or less likely to succeed if the Bill were to be further complicated by amendments at this late stage?

Alun Michael: I am advised that the Bill is sound and secure with or without any such changes. My hon. Friend can have full confidence in that.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): Given that it is a free vote, will the Minister tell the House how the Prime Minister is likely to vote?

Alun Michael: Given that it is a free vote, it is up to the Prime Minister just as it is up to the hon. Gentleman. The way in which all right hon. and hon. Members vote, or do not vote, will be clear when the record of the Division is published.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, despite the hyperventilation of some sections of the media, the latest date for a general election is late June 2006? In contradistinction to the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), I suggest to my right hon. Friend that the rationale for his motion might be that to add one further year beyond that latest date for the next election would allow for the election of a more hung Parliament and delay the issue into the middle distance.

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend has made his point. I make proposals based on the practicalities of animal welfare and issues of that sort.

Mr. Tony Banks (West Ham) (Lab): My hon. Friends and I trust my right hon. Friend, but it is what might happen afterwards that really concerns us. If both the amendments on the implementation date fall, he will then move the Bill as it left this place before. In those circumstances, would not it be much clearer were the Government to say—perhaps he can say now—that during the new Session of Parliament a one-clause Bill will be introduced with an implementation date of 2006, so that there is no dubiety, as they say in the trade union movement?

Alun Michael: I am not prepared to do that. It is an option for the Government to introduce a one-clause Bill to delay implementation, but that would have two disadvantages. First, it would be some time later, and part-way through the period to February 2005, and therefore would not provide immediate clarity on the date of commencement. Secondly, it would mean this House and another place spending more time debating this issue, on which plenty of time has been spent over many years. It would be better for us to agree today a motion proposing an amendment in lieu and to invite another place to agree with it, and then to have drawn a line very clearly under the whole issue and to have given a very clear date of commencement for the legislation.

The important point is to put the issue back to the Lords to ask them to think again. Do they want the hunting ban to start this February or at whatever later date this House suggests? They will have a straight choice, and we should leave it to them. They claim to defend the interests of people and animals involved in hunting—I refer of course not to the whole House but to those who support hunting. If they want the ban to start sooner, so be it.

In asking the House to support the motion, I hope that it will respond in the spirit in which Members have questioned me today, and send to the House of Lords a reasonable proposition, as well as the Bill in the form on which this House has already agreed.

2.15 pm

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) to move his manuscript amendment, I make it clear that the debate will also cover motion b, in the name of the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley).

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): I beg to move manuscript amendment No. 1,

"leave out from '52C' to end."

Before I speak to the amendment and to the amendments proposed by the other place, I should explain why my name appears on the amendment with what might reasonably be described as a fairly unholy alliance of individuals. Our reason for tabling it is simple and principled—namely, because the way in which the Minister tabled his motion would have required us either to vote against the amendments tabled by the other place in order to secure his timing proposals, or to vote against his timing proposals. That is wrong. It is reasonable that we in this place should speak and vote in support of amendments proposed to us by our noble Friends, and that we subsequently have the opportunity to support what the Minister has proposed with regard to timing. It is unreasonable, however, to place us in the position of being unable to speak in favour of the amendments from the other place in order to try to secure the delay that the Minister proposes. We are therefore ready to consider the entire question of the Minister's motion and to seek to strike down the part of it that is to do with the timing of an outright ban.

Today's debate is not only about implementation dates, which the Minister largely focused on—it is about all the proposals from the House of Lords. I shall try to address several of those as well as the very important issue of when the Bill and the ban should be implemented.

Before I do so, I should say that this debate has all the feelings of the final act of a sombre and melancholy tragic drama. For me, it is the end of a kind of parliamentary nightmare—a ghastly rural soap opera in which ignorant urban interests triumph over the countryside. For a few moments last night, I was glad that this would be the last time that I rose at this Dispatch Box to discuss hunting—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is far too much noise in the Chamber; it is unfair to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

It then occurred to me that although this is the last time that I will rise at this Dispatch Box to discuss hunting, I can look forward to the opportunity this time next year of rising at the Government Dispatch Box as the Minister responsible for proposing the repeal of this disgraceful, prejudiced and ignorant little Bill.

Last night, when she moved the amendments in the other place, Baroness Mallalieu, who is, among other things, president of the Countryside Alliance—I pay tribute to her and to the Countryside Alliance for the wonderful work they have done over many years in seeking to save the liberties of the countryside—said that this is a "rank bad" Bill. That sums up the Bill: it is indeed "rank bad". She continued:

"Its foundations are naked prejudice and wilful ignorance. It is without rationality, without principle, and it runs counter to all the evidence gathered . . . at the Government's own inquiries."

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gray: I shall get into my stride and then I shall happily do so.

Baroness Mallalieu said that the Bill was a badly drafted measure, which "allows terrier work . . . in order to protect a pheasant or a partridge but not to protect a lamb or a curlew, which allows the hunting of rats but not mice, rabbits but not hares; which destroys jobs . . . homes . . . and does so without compensation".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 November 2004; Vol. 666, c. 1556.]

The noble Lady, a Labour peer, puts her finger on the spot. It is a "rank bad" Bill, which her amendments would do much to improve.

The House made clear its views on licensing versus banning less than 48 hours ago. I was delighted to go through the Lobby with the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary, the Home Secretary, the Minister for Rural Affairs and Environmental Quality and his boss, the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to vote for the Lords proposals on licensing, although we ultimately lost the vote. It is odd that we are considering using the Parliament Act to drive through a Bill against which the Prime Minister voted only two days ago. That is a constitutional peculiarity to which I shall shortly revert.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): The hon. Gentleman believes that he may not discuss hunting again for some time but, depending on the outcome of votes today, the Minister has already contemplated a one-line Bill. Given the flaws that the hon. Gentleman has already identified, if the Government use the Parliament Act to force through the Bill without accepting the registration scheme, is not there every chance that they will have to revert quickly to the matter to make the measure workable?

Mr. Gray: I fear that the hon. Gentleman is right. The Bill is badly drafted and even if, like so many Labour Members, one were committed to abolishing hunting, the measure is not the way to do it. It will not work; it will prove impossible to police; its definitions are difficult to understand—it is extraordinarily badly drafted. I therefore believe that we shall have to revert to it.

Dr. Turner rose—

Sir Gerald Kaufman rose—

Mr. Gray: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner) and subsequently to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman), who was so complimentary to me yesterday when we met in the Lobby.

Dr. Turner: Will the hon. Gentleman enlighten me? Perhaps I am being even thicker than usual, but the effect of the manuscript amendment would simply be to disagree with the Lords. We would not change one jot or comma of the Bill. If the amendment were accepted, we would go straight to the point at which the Parliament Act would be invoked. Am I right?

Mr. Gray: I claim no great expertise in some of the more abstruse parts of parliamentary procedure, but my understanding is that the hon. Gentleman is wrong. The purpose of the manuscript amendment is to seek an opportunity to vote in favour of the other place's amendments and subsequently to vote for or against—we will have to decide—the Minister's proposal. The precise consequences will become clear later.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Has my hon. Friend read any legal advice about whether the Bill is more likely to be effectively challenged if the delay is three months, 18 months or three years?

Mr. Gray: I am grateful for that interesting intervention. The answer is a straightforward no. I have seen no legal advice and have no idea whether challenges are more likely if the delay is three months, 18 months or any other time. I suspect that, if the Bill is bad for human rights reasons or if the Government make bad use of the Parliament Act—several legal challenges are pending on that—the courts will find that to be the case, so it is not for us to prejudge the outcome. I fear that I cannot help my hon. Friend.

Sir Gerald Kaufman rose—

Mr. Gray: Before I give way to the right hon. Gentleman, I must tell hon. Members that, only yesterday, we met in the Lobby and he was extraordinarily complimentary, not necessarily about what I was saying but at least about the way I was saying it. I am most grateful for that.

Sir Gerald Kaufman: I stand by that. I respect and admire the hon. Gentleman's parliamentary performances, even if I disagree with him. Through some recondite parliamentary procedure, which I do not understand despite all my years in the House, my name has appeared on the amendment. I make it absolutely clear that I shall not vote for the amendment and I shall advise my hon. Friends not to do so.

Mr. Gray: I am most grateful for that clarification. I am relieved that my name and the right hon. Gentleman's do not appear on the same proposal. I am sure that the House will note the great relief all round.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): As the Official Report will show, the hon. Gentleman told the House a few moments ago that the Prime Minister voted against the Bill. That is not true. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will put the record straight. Like everybody who voted for amendments to the Bill, the Prime Minister did so in the sincere belief that they would improve it. I happen to disagree, but I stress that nobody voted against the Bill the other day when we discussed only amendments.

Mr. Gray: My instinct is to say that anyone who votes for an amendment that fundamentally changes the Bill thereby votes against the measure. If the proposal of the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) had been accepted on Tuesday, a licensing regime would have been introduced. It seems straightforward to me that the Prime Minister effectively said that he did not want a ban. Even if that were not the effect of his vote on Tuesday, it reflects his comments in press conferences and what his official spokesman has been authorised to say on countless occasions. It is plain that the Home Secretary, the Foreign Secretary, the Prime Minister and others oppose a ban and would like a middle way. Unfortunately, they have not achieved their aim because of the actions of Back Benchers. None the less, that was their view.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Is not the simple truth that the Prime Minister, with the support of many Cabinet colleagues and others, was trying to restore the measure to its original form, which the Minister introduced? He is nodding assent.

Mr. Gray: My hon. Friend makes a good point, which speaks for itself.

Mr. Hogg: Does my hon. Friend agree that we should be careful not to describe the amendment that the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) tabled as a middle way or a compromise? It proposed a ban through a tight licensing regime.

Mr. Gray: My right hon. and learned Friend is right.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): My hon. Friend mentioned a potential challenge. The Joint Committee suggested that a three-month ban was unreasonable and potentially open to challenge under the Human Rights Act 1998. Has he noticed that coursing is not included in both extensions that the Minister proposes? If something is unreasonable for hunting, why is it not unreasonable for coursing?

Mr. Gray: My hon. Friend makes a good point about the Joint Committee, which has tentatively concluded that a measure that included a three-month ban would not comply with the Human Rights Act 1998. That will be tested in the courts. He also makes a good point about hare coursing, which is, bizarrely, singled out for an immediate ban. Hare coursing kills fewer hares than shooting or hare hunting, which would be allowed. It would be delayed for three years if the Minister's amendment were passed. However, hare coursing, which aims not to kill hares, would be banned in three months.

Lembit Öpik: On legal challenge—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are still too many conversations. [Interruption.] Order. Clare Short, too many conversations are happening. Perhaps they can be conducted elsewhere and not in the Chamber.

Lembit Öpik: In terms of legal challenge, does the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) accept that the biggest problem is the way in which the Bill is constructed? For example, if a member of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals found a dead mouse in someone's back yard and reported them to the police, it would have to be proved that the cat had killed the mouse, because if the dog was found guilty that person could go to prison.

2.30 pm

Mr. Gray: The hon. Gentleman makes a good but abstruse point. Perhaps we should move on.

I want to focus particularly on the question of when and why the Bill should be implemented—either immediately, or effectively immediately, within three months; within 18 months, as the Minister's Parliamentary Private Secretary, the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley), has suggested; or within two and three quarter years, which the Minister himself seems to be suggesting.

I believe that when the Government originally proposed 18 months it was not for animal welfare reasons; it had about it the stench of political expediency. They wanted to allow the ban to come into force after the general election and for hunting not to become an issue in that general election. In that context, Mr. Speaker, I have to tell you that a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends, and indeed people in the countryside, are, for that very reason, perfectly content with an immediate ban.

A significant number of people who believe in hunting want an immediate ban so as to focus attention on opposition to the Government in the run-up to the general election. I have not gone along with that view, as it seems to me that there are some extraordinarily important animal welfare reasons for seeking to delay the Bill's implementation. This is all to do with animal welfare; it should not be to do with the election, political expediency or arguments. It should be to do with the best way of implementing what is to Conservative Members an obnoxious move.

That is why we are quite content to accept what the Lords propose—namely, a three-year delay. If we were given the opportunity to vote on it, we would doubtless at least consider what the Minister proposes, which is a delay of two and three quarter years. That is reasonably sensible.

It might be worth touching on why I believe that to be the case, why I believe that 18 months is no good at all and why three months is even less good. First, the Minister has said that the reason for the delay is to assist with re-homing hounds, as he calls it. The notion of re-homing hounds is absurd. Anyone who has ever been to a hunt kennels knows that the notion of removing any one of 100 dogs, some of which are as large as this Table and which have been living together for years—indeed, they may have been bred for generations for the purpose of hunting—and re-homing it in the front room of someone's bungalow is a great deal less—

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gray: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me for not giving way. I am just getting into my stride and we do not have much time.

The notion of re-homing hounds is extraordinarily absurd. We need to find a way to reuse the hounds. The animal welfare committee in this House proposed that, for example, they might be exported to take part in hunting overseas. That is an absurd suggestion.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Gray: The hon. Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey) was on the animal welfare committee and I happily give way to him.

Mr. Ian Cawsey (Brigg and Goole) (Lab): May I offer clarification to the House? The report that the hon. Gentleman is referring to, which looked into the welfare implications for hunting dogs, was not from a committee of the Associate Parliamentary Group for Animal Welfare. The group commissioned the report, but the people on the committee were from the Kennel Club, the Dogs Trust and the RSPCA, as well as a veterinary surgeon from the university of Bristol, who specialises in dog behaviour. We did not agree with the idea of dogs being re-homed abroad—we had grave reservations about it. We simply said that when a ban was put in place in Scotland that is what some hunts did.

Mr. Gray: I am happy to accept the hon. Gentleman's correction on that point. That was a very select little committee and the report it produced has been rubbished, to use that common new Labour word, by a variety of learned people, including the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons.

The truth of the matter is that if hunting were banned within three months there would be a significant problem over what to do with hounds. I think everybody agrees with that.

Mark Tami: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gray: No, I will not. The problem will not only be with hounds. I have here an interesting letter that the British Horse Society addressed to the Minister this week on the subject of the consequences for horses as well as hounds. Incidentally, the person who wrote the letter, Mr. Graham Cory, was until recently the Minister's horse tsar in the Department before becoming chief executive of the society.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): This is a question not only of animal welfare, but of those who will lose their job, livelihood and income for feeding their family, so will my hon. Friend press the Minister for some form of compensation package for such people in my constituency and elsewhere?

Mr. Gray: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point, which I shall discuss in a moment.

On the subject of horses, the British Horse Society makes it plain that an immediate or early ban on hunting will have significant consequences for horses. Mr. Cory says:

> "Horses bred mainly or solely for hunting are not pets . . . By temperament and conformation, these are strong and vigorous animals . . . To expect these hunting horses to thrive in roles for which they are not suited by breeding would be as unrealistic as to expect trained sheepdogs to thrive as family pets . . . a sudden influx into the market of thousands of redundant hunters would be beyond the capacity of equine welfare organisations to manage. Some will undoubtedly be slaughtered, others will be forced into roles for which they are wholly unsuited."

The British Horse Society goes to great lengths to make it absolutely plain that there would be significant animal welfare consequences for horses, as well as for hounds, were there to be an immediate ban.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Gray: The hon. Member for West Ham (Mr. Banks) has already contributed, so I give way to the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), who has not.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): There is no reason for any hound to be put down. The hunts can continue as drag hunts.

Mr. Gray: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that point. We could all quote Lord Burns back and forth at each other, but the interesting thing is that he came to only one absolutely clear, absolutely plain and totally agreed conclusion, which is that by no stretch of anybody's imagination could drag hunting replicate hunting at the moment. That is a unanimous opinion in respect of the notion that those horses and hounds could be used for drag hunting.

There is a more interesting point here, none the less. Let us imagine that those hounds were used for drag hunting and that in the course of their drag hunting day they killed a fox accidentally—without that being the intention. Would they be guilty of an offence or not? The Bill does not make that plain. That is one aspect where the legislation is badly drafted. However—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Gray: If hon. Members will forgive me, we are not re-entering a substantive discussion on the Bill. We are discussing when the Bill should be implemented.

Mr. Banks rose—

Mr. Gray: That is what I want to focus on, which is why I do not intend to take an excessive number of interventions from those whose opinions I am well aware of, having been involved in such discussions a number of times.

Mr. Banks rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not giving way. He has made that very clear indeed.

Mr. Gray: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I have given way reasonably generously. With only 10 minutes left, I cannot accept too many other interventions, although I may do so from time to time.

If today, despite everything, the House decides to use the Parliament Act to force through this bad and illegitimate law, it will do so against the wish of the Prime Minister and the wish of the Home Secretary, who will have to police it. They both voted against it only 48 hours ago. The House will also do so against the wish of the Lord Chancellor, who voted for the Lords amendments that we are considering today.

Kate Hoey: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gray: In a moment, of course I will.

There can be no possible parliamentary precedent for the use of that ultimate nuclear procedural device, the Parliament Act, to force through a Bill that the leaders of the Government and holders of the great offices of state, who will be required to implement it, specifically and repeatedly voted against. The Parliament Act 1949 will itself be subject to judicial review in the months ahead, as will this most bizarre and unprecedented use of it.

Kate Hoey: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that given the unprecedented nature of the use of the Parliament Act—the majority of Parliament as a whole has voted not to ban hunting in this way—there should be a vote of this House to make Members formally agree to Mr. Speaker using that Act?

Mr. Gray: I agree, which is why I put my name to the motion that the hon. Lady tabled to that effect. We in this House should be asked to vote on whether to use the Parliament Act, although I fear our procedures do not permit that. No doubt when the use of the Parliament Act is considered in the courts, the very point that she makes will be part of that consideration.

The Parliament Act challenge and the Human Rights Act challenge face us in the courts, which is where the battle will move to, assuming that the Parliament Act is used to push the Bill through this afternoon. The battle will be joined in the streets and in the countryside too. Mass protests, civil disobedience within the law and political campaigning of every kind will be unleashed. I appeal to the supporters of hunting and of freedom to remain within the law at all times, to abhor violence or intimidation of any kind, and to seek to avoid inconveniencing the general public, most of whom support our cry for freedom. They should focus their efforts on those people who are responsible for this illiberal law—namely, Labour Ministers and MPs, especially in the run-up to the general election. A Conservative Government will introduce an early Bill to repeal this ban, which makes our task at the general election clearer than ever, both nationally and in Labour and Liberal marginal seats, whose Members should watch out.

If the House decides to use the Parliament Act to force through this disgraceful and illiberal Bill, especially if we decide that it should commence in three months' time, we will send a clear message to lovers of hunting, lovers of shooting and fishing—which, without doubt, will be next—lovers of the countryside, and perhaps above all, lovers of our ancient freedoms that we care more about prejudiced and ignorant political correctness than about animal welfare. There will also be a hidden message to the countryside, which reads: "Cry havoc, and let loose the dogs of war."

Peter Bradley (The Wrekin) (Lab): I beg to move the amendment in my name. I must be brief. I no more wish to prolong the debate than I wish unduly to prolong hunting—

Mr. Beith: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it possible for the House to have two amendments before it, both moved at the same time?

Mr. Speaker: This is an amendment to a motion, and it is perfectly in order. The right hon. Gentleman can take my word for it.

Peter Bradley: With respect to you, Mr. Speaker, I should point out that it is a Wrekin amendment and not a wrecking amendment. It is characteristic of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality that he should want to go the extra mile, or, in this case, an extra year. He knows that I, as his Parliamentary Private Secretary, am always right behind him, even if I will not go the extra mile myself this afternoon.

My right hon. Friend has sought to identify common ground with the hunting fraternity and the House of Lords. It is doubtful, however, whether there is a piece of common ground big enough on which to pitch a tent that accommodates all of us. That is why he says that while one amendment before the House is reasonable, the other is more reasonable. It is up to the House, I suggest, to decide which is the more reasonable.

Mr. Beith: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The amendment to which the hon. Gentleman has referred can only be voted on if it is moved by a Minister of the Crown. He has now moved it, so it cannot be moved by a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. Speaker: Order. For the sake of clarity, the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) is actually speaking to his amendment. [Interruption.] Order. Many are the times that I have heard hon. Members say that they are moving an amendment when they are not doing so. What a Member says and what he gets are two different things. I am trying to tell the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) that although the hon. Member for The Wrekin may have said that he was moving his amendment, he is speaking to it. The right hon. Gentleman's latter point is correct; at the end, when the shutter comes down, only a Minister can move such an amendment.

Mr. Beith: I distinctly heard the hon. Gentleman move the amendment, and I am sure that the record will show that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have distinctly heard other hon. Gentlemen say that they are moving an amendment when they are not really doing so; they are merely debating it. I will clarify the matter if it keeps the right hon. Gentleman happy; the hon. Gentleman is not moving his amendment, but speaking to it.

Peter Bradley: As the House can tell, I am not moving, but I am speaking. [Laughter.] I am doing so because I want the House to have the opportunity to choose which of the motions on the Order Paper is the most reasonable. I believe that delay until 2006 is reasonable and sensible because it gives hunts the opportunity to adopt drag hunting to save the jobs, the dogs—and the fox for that matter—the fallen stock collection service to farmers and the way of life in which they believe, and will provide opportunities for riders who currently would like to ride across the country but who will not chase a fox.

2.45 pm

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Peter Bradley: In a moment. The delay gives hunters the opportunity to make this an election issue—none of us should be frightened of that—and deprives them of any vestige of an excuse to shoot their dogs or hounds or to support unlawful protest in the countryside.

Mr. Michael Foster: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for speaking so clearly to the amendment. I intend to vote against amendment a, which is in the Minister's name, and for his amendment b. Does he believe that the vast majority of people in this country will understand the reasonableness of our actions when following his lead on this matter?

Peter Bradley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, whose support is valuable given his reputation on this issue. He is absolutely right; there can be no reason for anyone in the country to believe that the House is acting unreasonably if we provide an 18-month delay to allow hunts to make their arrangements and to change to drag hunting if that is what they choose. What would be unreasonable is for the House of Lords to reject the motion. It would be perverse indeed if those who claimed to support hunting were those who put the last nail in its coffin.

Not many Members have remarked on it but, last Tuesday, those Opposition Members who support hunting voted for a Bill that they voted against on Second Reading just a couple of years ago. I suggest that the confusion is theirs, not ours. We want a ban, but we want it introduced in an orderly fashion and in a reasonable way. I therefore hope that colleagues on both sides of the House will support the motion to bring in a ban on 31 July 2006.

Andrew George rose—

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Time is now up.

It being one hour after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. SPEAKER put the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

The House proceeded to a Division,

Mr. Steinberg: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. A number of hon. Members are confused about the first vote. What would happen if the amendment in the name of the Opposition spokesman, on which we are now voting, gains a majority? Would there be a further vote, or would the other amendments fall?

Mr. Speaker: We would then vote on the Minister's motion, as amended, because the amendment being voted on is an amendment to the main motion.

The House having divided: Ayes 146, Noes 286.

3.15 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you confirm my understanding that an amended Bill can have the Parliament Act applied to it only if the amendment in question is agreed by both Houses of Parliament, and that those who wish to ban hunting must therefore vote, in respect of the next amendment, for the original Bill and for an immediate ban?

Mr. Speaker: I answered a similar point of order earlier, and to summarise what I said, I will not be drawn into that one. I did invite hon. Members to clarify the matter with the Minister, and the hon. Gentleman had the opportunity to do so. It would be wrong of me to be drawn into such issues while voting is taking place.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As the House has now recorded the biggest majority ever against the banning of fox hunting, may we please move to the next business?

Mr. Speaker: When I was a member of a political party, I used to get involved in tactics—[Interruption.] Order. I invite the Minister to move the amendment in the name of Mr. Bradley.

Motion made, and Question put, That this House insists on its disagreement to Lords amendments Nos. 1 to 44 and 46 to 54, disagrees with the Lords in their amendments 10C, 12C, 46C and 52C, but proposes the following amendment in lieu —

Leave out clause 15 and insert the following new clause:—

'Commencement

(1) The following provisions of this Act shall come into force on 31st July 2006—

(a) sections 1 to 4,

(b) Part 2 in so far as it relates to sections 1 to 4,

(c) sections 11 to 14 in so far as they relate to sections 1 to 4,

(d) Schedule 1, and

(e) Schedules 2 and 3, except in so far as they change the law in relation to an activity to which section 5 applies.

(2) The following provisions of this Act shall come into force at the end of the period of three months beginning with the date on which it is passed—

(a) section 5,

(b) Part 2 in so far as it relates to section 5,

(c) sections 11 to 13 in so far as they relate to section 5, and

(d) Schedules 2 and 3 in so far as they change the law in relation to an activity to which section 5 applies.'.—[Alun Michael.]

Question accordingly agreed to.

Civil Contingencies Bill

Mr. Speaker: Under the Order of the House of 17 November, any message from the Lords relating to the Civil Contingencies Bill must be considered forthwith, without any Question put. I have to acquaint the House with the fact that a message has been received from the Lords as follows:

> "The Lords agree without amendment the amendments proposed by the Commons in lieu of certain Lords amendments to the Civil Contingencies Bill to which the Commons have disagreed. They do not insist on certain of their amendments to which the Commons have disagreed, but do propose amendments in lieu thereof, to which amendments they desire the agreement of the Commons. They do not insist on their remaining amendments to which the Commons have disagreed."

Lords amendments considered.

Lords amendment: No. 49B

3.31 pm

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Ruth Kelly): I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this we may consider Lords amendment No. 50B.

Ruth Kelly: Following the concerns voiced both in this House and the other place, we have reconsidered the issues of sunsetting and reporting on the use of part 2 of the Bill. The Government remain convinced—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must have order in the House.

Ruth Kelly: The Government remain convinced that sunsetting the Act itself is not appropriate in this case. The need to be able to respond to the most serious emergencies will not disappear after a given period, and revocation of the legislation would simply necessitate replacing it with something very similar.

As I made clear in Commons consideration of Lords amendments, any use of the powers under part 2 will be subject to detailed and rigorous parliamentary scrutiny and will be limited by the restrictions and safeguards set out in the Bill. Any regulations made under the Bill will be subject to sunsetting after a maximum of 30 days. This is one of the most aggressive sunsetting clauses to be found anywhere on the statute book.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): I am sure that the Minister has had the opportunity since yesterday to speak to her advisers about the test of reasonableness. The plain fact is that the Bill does not contain an express reasonableness test with regard to the use of emergency regulations. In the light of the debate yesterday, will she explain to the House why that is not in the Bill?

Ruth Kelly: I explained in terms to the hon. Gentleman yesterday that it was not necessary to have express provision for a test of reasonableness in the Bill. I also explained why that was the case.

The Government remain convinced that the sunsetting of regulations, and the need for them to receive the assent of Parliament, is the right way to ensure that the powers cannot be misused and that effective scrutiny takes place. Indeed, we have amended the Bill to specify that regulations must contain provision to ensure that parliamentary scrutiny can take place where this is effected by the emergency in question, or by response efforts.

Mr. Cash rose—

Ruth Kelly: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman one more time.

Mr. Cash: The Minister may recall that the Minister in the Lords continually referred to the use of the powers as a temporary arrangement, yet it is clear from the wording of the Bill as it now is that the powers are not temporary but permanent. Will the Minister explain that as well?

Ruth Kelly: As I explained yesterday to this House, and as has been explained in the other place, the regulations and the exercise of the powers under the Bill are temporary and subject to an aggressive sunsetting clause, in that they fall after 30 days unless Parliament confirms that they should continue and the orders are relaid.

There is no doubt that, given the scale of the emergencies that we are talking about, the Government's handling of such an emergency will be subject to intense scrutiny both inside and outside Parliament after the event. I need only refer to inquiries and reports published after the foot and mouth outbreak—in that case, emergency powers were not necessary—to highlight the fact that post-event scrutiny and review are, and will remain, defining features of the most serious emergencies.

However, in the light of the concerns that have been expressed, the Government are minded to give a firmer assurance to both Houses about the way in which we will ensure that the Bill operates correctly. In the event of the use of emergency powers, the Government would put in place formal arrangements to review the way in which the Bill and its mechanisms, including the safeguards, had worked in practice. To that end, within one year of the end of the point at which the emergency regulations fall, a senior Privy Councillor, appointed by the Government, would carry out a review of the operation of the Bill. The process would be repeated for each emergency for which the Bill is used. That review would be published, and thus be available to Parliament.

The findings will provide a useful tool for the Government, who would aim to learn lessons from any emergency and improve processes wherever necessary. They will be conscious of the need to justify their decision to use the powers and their handling of the emergency in the cold light of day, both before they use the powers and throughout their exercise.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Does the Minister believe that the appointment of a Privy Councillor by the Government is a broad enough base to secure a properly independent view? Would it not be appropriate for Parliament, with Members from all political parties, to agree the appointment of the Privy Councillor?

Ruth Kelly: The Government's approach is consistent with the long-standing convention that, following major emergencies, Governments appoint senior independent figures to review events. The Anderson inquiry into foot and mouth is a good example. There are also strong parallels with the practice used under the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I am grateful for the commitment that the hon. Lady has given, as it substantially meets the Opposition's arguments. It is obviously desirable to have such a report, but can she make a commitment that it would be debated in both Houses?

Ruth Kelly: I would certainly expect it to be debated. The nature of the review would be determined by the nature of the emergency—that is more flexible and less mechanistic than a sunsetting debate a year after the use of the powers, which could be disproportionate and unnecessary, particularly if the exercise of the powers was uncontroversial and effective.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): I do not wish to be churlish, but the hon. Lady was asked to give a commitment. What she expressed was expectation, so would she now give a commitment?

Ruth Kelly: I can assure the House that a debate will take place—that is the commitment that I am giving on behalf of the Government. An independent report will be published and debated by Parliament.

Mr. Cash: Can the Minister confirm that the independent Privy Councillor who was appointed would not be a politician? He would be a person of independence and integrity by virtue of his oath, but should not be involved in politics.

Ruth Kelly: I have given a commitment that the Government will appoint a senior independent figure to review events along the lines of the practice adopted under the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act. If we can agree to that—I hope that all hon. Members accept that it represents movement by the Government and a real increase in parliamentary scrutiny—we will have settled on a powerful, dual-track approach. First, actions under the Civil Contingencies Bill will be subject to the existing 30-day sunset provision. Secondly, there will be a slower review of the operation of the Bill itself.

I hope that that gives the House the reassurance that it seeks and demonstrates the Government's commitment to effective review and scrutiny of the use of the emergency powers legislation, not just at the time that it is used but in the longer term, when we can consider its appropriateness in the light of experience and the passage of time.

I have been impressed by the sensible and consensual nature of the debates on this important piece of legislation, both in the House and in the other place. The Bill has, indeed, benefited from a number of helpful amendments made in the light of concerns expressed during debate. I hope that all hon. Members receive this proposal in the same light, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Heald: I agree with the point on which the Minister ended. The Bill has been fully considered. It started with pre-legislative scrutiny and it was fully considered in Committee. The pity of it is that when it came to Report, which is an important stage of any Bill, such a draconian guillotine was imposed that hon. Members who had taken an interest in the Bill over some time were unable to discuss large parts of part 2. With that caveat, I thank the Minister and her predecessor for the consensual nature of the discussions that we have had on the Bill.

I made my remarks yesterday about sunsetting. It is a good thing to have sunset provisions for draconian powers. Having said that, today in the other place my noble Friend Baroness Buscombe tabled amendments to make the sunset provision take effect a year after any occasion on which the powers in part 2 were used. The purpose of that is to provide an opportunity to reflect on the power itself in the light of the way in which it had been used. None of us knows what circumstances will arise.

I accept that the Minister's commitment today to a report from a Privy Councillor every time that the part 2 provisions are used, followed by an opportunity to debate that report, is a substantial commitment and meets the case. I would like to press the Minister a little on one thing. My hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) intervened in the Minister's speech to make the point that the person who did the report should be a respected independent figure. Will she say a little more about the independence of the person chosen to produce such a report?

We feel that we have achieved something. I would like to think of it as perhaps not a full loaf but certainly a half.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I am pleased that we are able to finish the proceedings on the Bill on a consensual note. It has perhaps a more select audience than the previous Bill that we were debating, but in many senses it is a more significant measure.

The Minister has set out a procedure for reviewing the use of the emergency powers that fits in with what we argued for in the House of Lords and in this House yesterday. Lord Carlile is independent, but I would not say that he is non-political. He is still a political Member of the House of Lords. He reviews procedures used under the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001. That was precisely what we were looking for in the context of this legislation. We have set certain thresholds for Ministers to invoke the powers; as we discussed yesterday, those thresholds remain subjective. A review of the operation of those subjective tests is all-important. The Minister helpfully set out yesterday the way in which the thresholds worked—the difference between the Minister "thinking" and being "satisfied".

I now have that difference straight in my head with the illustration of the Prime Minister's argument that he did not think that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction, but he was satisfied that it had. There is something there that can be tested. Similarly, in the context of a flu outbreak, a Minister might be satisfied that an outbreak was deadly and justified all kinds of emergency provisions being brought into place. That is a testable set of criteria; it is not the Minister simply thinking that a deadly flu outbreak is taking place and that things need to be done. Those are judgments that we believe Ministers are entitled to make, but Parliament is entitled to go over them again to see whether the facts justified the conclusion that was reached.

We think that the procedure that the Minister has set out today will meet our requirements. We are content not to oppose what the Minister suggests as a substitute for the set of arrangements sent to us by the House of Lords. I reiterate the comments that the Minister and the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) made about the conduct of proceedings on the Bill. This is the last opportunity that we will have to debate it in this place, but we have a different piece of legislation now from the one with which we started some time ago.

Mr. Heald: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is important that the person should be an independent figure? Does he also agree that the one thing that scarred the progress of the Bill was the very stiff programme motion introduced on Report, which meant that we were not able to discuss a large portion of the Bill at that important stage?

3.45 pm

Mr. Allan: I am able to close on a consensual note by agreeing with the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire. The way in which the Report stage was handled was disgraceful. Part 2 of the Bill is far more significant than part 1 in terms of civil liberties and its constitutional implications, yet we ended up spending more time on part 1 than on part 2. We certainly did not have enough time to go through all the aspects of part 2 that we wanted to consider. That was reflected in the number of amendments from the Lords to part 2, which showed that there was still plenty of work to be done. I do not want the House of Lords to be used as a Committee stage for the more significant parts of the Bill, while the House of Commons gets to debate just the froth around the edges. The way in which part 2 and the Report stage were handled was disappointing.

I return to the hon. Gentleman's point about the independence of the person who carries out the review. Many of the concerns expressed yesterday from the Opposition Benches were about the fact that when there is an emergency, the requirement for the Government to get a majority in Parliament is not a sufficient safeguard. Under those circumstances, Governments can whip their Back Benchers—by definition, they have a majority of them—behind them, so that is not an adequate safeguard. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the key test is whether the person who conducts the review will stand outside the normal political melee and be able to reach an independent judgment.

For that to happen, two criteria must be fulfilled. One is that the person makes that judgment at a distance, as the Minister set out today, not in the debate about the emergency regulations themselves. That would be in the heat of the moment, and we want the judgment made at a cool reflective distance. The second criterion is that the person should be outside the normal political arena, so I understand why a Privy Councillor would be appropriate, assuming they were acting as an independent Privy Councillor with the nation's interests at heart, rather than with a party political interest at heart. Having listened to the contributions from right hon. Members in all parts of the House, including the Conservative Benches, I have confidence in the majority of the Privy Councillors present putting the nation's interests ahead of party interests and being very interested in the constitutional implications of the emergency powers.

If that can be achieved, we will have reached a reasonable compromise. I am grateful to the Minister for acceding to our arguments, whereas yesterday she had to argue that the Government did not consider that necessary. I thought we were persuasive and I am glad that she was persuaded to move in this direction.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I rise to follow up briefly the point that I raised in an earlier intervention, which was supported by my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), the shadow Leader of the House, relating to the appointment of an independent Privy Councillor to review the powers contained in the Bill. As my hon. Friend said, those powers are draconian and if they are to be reviewed, the person reviewing them should be genuinely independent. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan), speaking for the Liberal Democrats, highlighted that. He also expressed confidence that a majority of Privy Councillors can display proper and appropriate independence.

I shall press the Minister, however. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam emphasised that on Report inadequate time was provided for large sections of part 2, which is the most important part of the Bill, to be debated. I hope the Minister, for whom I have considerable affection and regard for her abilities, will take a message back to her party that it is inappropriate that on Report, which is the only stage at which Back Benchers can fully participate in the consideration of legislation, they did not have an opportunity to contribute because of the limitations imposed by the programme motion. Therefore, many of us choose Lords amendments as an opportunity to participate.

Will there be any discussion between the Opposition parties and the Government before a Privy Councillor is appointed, so that there is confidence across the House that the individual who is appointed to undertake this important task is genuinely independent? This legislation is critical. As several of my Opposition colleagues have highlighted during the debate, the powers that are granted to the Government under the legislation are draconian—probably the greatest powers in any legislation to have been vested in Government in the 34 years that my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) has been in the House. Therefore, I seek an assurance that the independence of the Privy Councillor is verifiable and that there is genuine consultation across the political parties prior to this person being appointed to undertake this important job.

I am slightly delaying sitting down to enable the Minister to receive the appropriate information from those who advise her. It is an important matter, I hope that she considers it to be an important matter, and I hope that she will reply to my request and that of my hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House.

Mr. Cash: I am here at the bitter end because I remain deeply concerned about the potential impact of the way in which these powers could be used in terms of the liberty of the subject—not an expression that should be used lightly. But in this particular context, and in view of the rejection of the inclusion in the list beyond the Human Rights Act 1998 of habeas corpus and the duration of Parliament, to give but two particularly important provisions, I remain deeply concerned about the way in which these powers could be misused. In particular, as I have already said, there is no express test of reasonableness, and impermanence is imported into the arrangements, which is unsatisfactory.

With regard to the nature of the decisions that could be taken, even Law Lords have recently, in relation, I think, to the Rehman case, said that political decisions in matters of this kind would be best taken by Ministers rather than by the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary where there are extremely delicate questions about the liberty of the subject in relation to issues of national security. That is where the interface comes between emergency powers on the one hand and questions of national security on the other, because the two are likely to interlock. I simply make the point that the Human Rights Act in itself, irrespective of what the noble Lord Lester of Herne Hill said a few days ago, is inadequate to cover the various difficulties and dangers to the liberty of the subject that I believe are inherent in the proposals.

It is a step in the right direction to have a review by a senior Privy Councillor, but I repeat what I said in an intervention, that under no circumstances whatever should that person come from a political background. I say that because, having regard to the case law that has developed in relation to decisions of the most sensitive nature that I have just described, the view is taken that these are and should be political decisions and that that question has been adjudicated by the courts themselves. In this particular context, there would be a greater degree of independence if no person who held the job came from a political background.

I appreciate that my Front-Bench colleagues and the Liberal Democrats have now concluded that exchanges between the two Houses have reached their final stage. Nevertheless, I fear that the powers could be misused, and I think that the fact that the Government's programme motion impinged on Report, which is in many respects the most important stage in any Bill's consideration—it is particularly important in dealing with a Bill such as this one—was disgraceful.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Will my hon. Friend remind the House of the distinction that he made between the need for political decision making in the sense of the Minister making a decision and the need for non-party political independence in terms of the Privy Councillor?

Mr. Cash: Absolutely. My right hon. Friend puts it extremely well. On emergency powers and national security, the decision to invoke the powers is bound to be political at that point. Any question of review would need to be balanced with a degree of independence that would be guaranteed only by ensuring that any subsequent decision on the review was taken by a person without a political background.

I have made my reservations clear. There will not be another Division on these matters, but they will continue to evolve. Given the permanence of the issues and the incredible importance of getting them right, at least we have fought as hard as possible to ensure that they are dealt with in the right framework for future generations.

Ruth Kelly: I thank the hon. Members for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) and for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) for the way in which they have approached the Bill and the graciousness with which they have received the Government's proposals, which I have just set out. I also thank the hon. Members for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) and for Stone (Mr. Cash) for recognising that the Government have gone at least some way towards meeting their concerns, even if they have not been met in full.

I understand that there is some natural concern about how the review will be carried out and who will be appointed to lead it. The intention is that a single Privy Councillor will lead the review; but they will of course be assisted by a review team in carrying it out. The review will be independent, and the United Kingdom has a strong track record of appointing independent senior figures to carry out inquiries. In any event, to maximise the lessons learned, the Government would want to appoint someone who could step back from the situation. The report would be published and there would be a debate, and one of the issues debated would surely be the nature of the review itself.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I accept what the Minister is saying, but will she draw a distinction between what has been described as a political background, which is not the critical issue, and mindset, context and the way in which the process will be achieved, which will be much more important? Somebody's background will perhaps be irrelevant, as somebody who is not of a political background can have very strong political views. The critical issue is the context and process, not the background.

Ruth Kelly: I completely agree. As I have set out, it would be extremely important for the Government to appoint someone who could step back from the situation. Of course, that ability comes from the personal specifications of the person who is carrying out the review and their willingness and freedom from political influence. It is such concerns that would inform the Government in their choice of Privy Councillor. The Government would of course discuss on Privy Council terms and consult the principal parties, thereby meeting the concerns of the hon. Member for Macclesfield. I hope that those assurances will satisfy nearly, if not all, Members.

I am sorry that doubt has been expressed about whether the Bill has been debated and consulted on enough. I am fairly new to it, but there has been considerable discussion—not least during pre-legislative scrutiny—and, as usual, the amount of time agreed between the political parties was not subject to much dispute.

Mr. Heald rose—

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman may agree to differ with me on that.

4 pm

Mr. Heald: In fact we divided on every programme motion, although we have the highest opinion of the Government Whip involved.

Ruth Kelly: I thank the hon. Gentleman for making that clear. In any event, I think there was considerable scrutiny both in Parliament and outside. We do not follow this course lightly, and I believe that it will create a much more substantial and flexible framework than the one that it replaces.

Mr. Allan: The pre-legislative scrutiny was very helpful, and the Committee stage worked well. The problem arose on Report. The bottleneck relates to time in the Chamber, and that is where the dispute remains. If we learn anything from the process, it will be about expanding the time available to Members who cannot take part in pre-legislative scrutiny and the Committee stage.

Ruth Kelly: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, made it a personal priority to respond fully in writing to points to which she could not respond on Report. I hope that that helped Members to some extent.

Mr. Heald: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Members throughout the House, apart from Ministers, have expressed concern about the Report stage, when large parts of the Bill could not be discussed. Would it be possible for you to bring that to the attention of the Chairman of Ways and Means—th Deputy Speaker—who, on occasion, is called on to giv evidence to the Procedure Committee, the House of Lords Constitution Committee and other bodies?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I think I understand the hon. Gentleman's sentiments, and I assure him that the matters he has raised never escape the attention of the Chairman of Ways and Means.

Ruth Kelly: Or, indeed, the attention of Ministers. I have certainly heard what has been said today.

I thank Members on both sides of the House for the scrutiny that they have devoted to the Bill. I think that it has improved significantly as a result, and I believe that the review process will go a long way towards meeting the last remaining concerns.

Lords amendment disagreed to.

Committee appointed to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to their amendments Nos. 49B and 50B: Mr. Allan, Mr. Heald, Ruth Kelly, Ms Bridget Prentice and James Purnell;

Ruth Kelly to be the Chairman of the Committee; Three to be the quorum of the Committee.—[Ms Bridget Prentice.]

To withdraw immediately.

Reasons for disagreeing to certain Lords amendments reported, and agreed to; to be communicated to the Lords.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the Order of the House of 8 November, the sitting is suspended. Shortly before the sitting resumes, I shall cause the Division bell to be sounded.

4.4 pm

Sitting suspended.

6 pm

On resuming—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the consideration of any Lords Amendments and Messages that may be received may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Ms Bridget Prentice.]

Question agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Pursuant to the Order of the House of 8 November, the sitting is suspended. Shortly before the sitting resumes, I shall cause the Division bell to be sounded.

6.1 pm

Sitting suspended.

Hunting Bill

9.1 pm

Mr. Speaker: I have to inform the House that a message has been brought from the Lords as follows:

> "The Lords insist on their amendments to the Hunting Bill, to which the Commons have insisted on their disagreement, for which insistence they assign their reasons. They insist on their amendments to which the Commons have disagreed, for which insistence they assign their reasons, and they disagree to the amendment proposed by the Commons in lieu of the Lords amendments, for which disagreement they assign their reason."

Hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Speaker: I read these messages; I don't understand them. It was not a Glasgow man who wrote that one, anyway.

As the Minister made clear to the House in his remarks earlier today, a rejection on these lines has brought us to the end of the road. I am satisfied that all the provisions of the Parliament Acts have been met. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Accordingly, I have to tell the House that I have certified the Hunting Bill under section 2 of the Parliament Act 1911, as amended by the Parliament Act 1949. The Bill endorsed by me will be sent for Royal Assent at the time of prorogation in compliance with the provisions of the Parliament Acts.

Sitting suspended.

ROYAL ASSENT

9.59 pm

Mr. Speaker: I have to acquaint the House that the House has been to the House of Peers, where a Commission under the Great Seal was read, authorising the Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Armed Forces (Pensions and Compensation) Act 2004
Civil Partnerships Act 2004
Housing Act 2004
Pensions Act 2004
Civil Contingencies Act 2004
Hunting Act 2004

Prorogation

Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech

Mr. Speaker: I have further to acquaint the House that the Lord High Chancellor, one of the Lord Commissioners, delivered Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament, in pursuance of Her Majesty's Command. For greater accuracy, I have obtained and also directed that the terms of the speech be printed in the Journal. Copies are being made available in the Vote Office.

The Gracious Speech was as follows:

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

My Government has taken action in support of economic stability and growth, and to deliver reform of the public services, increasing opportunity and social justice.

My Government is committed to delivering a world class education system to allow individuals to achieve their full potential. An Act has been passed to enable higher education institutions to secure the additional necessary funding and ensure fair access for all. My Government has brought forward a Bill to enable some local authorities to pilot new arrangements for school transport to extend provisions to cover more pupils.

An Act has been passed to provide all children born from September 2002 with a child trust fund, encouraging parents and children to save and ensuring that all children have a financial asset at 18.

Legislation has also been passed to protect pension scheme members if companies become insolvent, to encourage employers to provide good quality pensions and individuals to save effectively for retirement.

My Government has published a draft Bill to ensure comprehensive civil rights for disabled people.

In addition, legislation has been passed putting in place a range of measures to streamline the asylum and immigration system and tackle abuse.

My Government continues to make the reduction of crime and the fear of crime a priority, and to enhance security and protection.

An Act has been passed modernising the laws on domestic violence and establishing a Commissioner to support the interests of victims and witnesses.

A Children's Commissioner for England has also been established as part of legislation improving services to protect children.

Draft legislation has also been published on establishing a national identity card scheme.

Legislation has been passed creating a long-term foundation for civil contingency planning in the UK, improving the basis for preparations at a local level and modernising the emergency powers framework.

An Act has been passed to ensure the fire and rescue services can respond effectively to the changing demands they face.

Members of the House of Commons

I thank you for the provision you have made for the work and dignity of the Crown and for the public service.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

My Government remains committed to working closely with the political parties and the Irish Government to see an end to all forms of paramilitary activity and to restore as soon as possible a stable and inclusive partnership government in Northern Ireland. An Act has been passed establishing a Northern Ireland Judicial Appointments Commission.

My Government continues to work closely with the devolved administrations in Scotland and Wales. Acts have been passed to retain the current number of members in the Scottish Parliament and to establish a single public audit body for Wales. A Bill to provide the National Assembly for Wales with a range of transport-related powers has been published in draft.

My Government continues to take forward a programme of constitutional reform.

Legislation has been passed to improve traffic flow and manage road works more effectively.

An Act has been passed to establish a Nuclear Decommissioning Authority and to promote secure and sustainable energy supplies.

Legislation has been passed to help create a fairer housing market and protect the most vulnerable, and to make the planning system fairer and faster with greater community participation.

In addition, legislation has been passed implementing the Government's review of the Employment Relations Act 1999, and to improve company law by strengthening accounting, audit and inspection arrangements removing barriers to recruiting directors and creating Community Interest Companies to enable social enterprises to meet the needs of their communities in new and innovative ways.

My Government has brought forward draft legislation on a number of other matters including animal welfare, charities and mental health.

Other important measures have been enacted.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

The Duke of Edinburgh and I were pleased to pay a state visit to Nigeria in December and attend the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting. We were pleased to receive the state visit of His Excellency the President of Poland in May, and to pay a state visit to Germany earlier this month. We were also pleased to mark the centenary of the Entente Cordiale with a state visit to France in April and will receive His Excellency the President of France this week.

My Government played an active role in preparing the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation for further enlargement in March and the European Union for the accession of ten new member states in May. They worked with other member states to conclude negotiations on a new constitutional treaty for the European Union and to strengthen peace and prosperity in Europe.

My Government has worked for a strong partnership between Europe and the United States, and for effective action against the threat from global terrorism and weapons of mass destruction. My Government was active in securing the first ever generic United Nations Security Council Resolution on the non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. The resolution imposes obligations on all states to criminalise the possession, manufacture or trafficking of such weapons, in particular for terrorist purposes. My Government was active, with the Government of the United States, in working with the Libyan Government towards their renunciation of weapons of mass destruction.

My Government has maintained the United Kingdom's commitment to enhancing stability in the Balkans and in rebuilding Afghanistan and Iraq. My Government worked with the people of Iraq and the United Nations to establish the Iraqi Interim Government in June.

In partnership with France, Germany and other partners, my Government has worked to persuade Iran to address international concerns regarding its nuclear programme. My Government supported international negotiations with North Korea, and has continued to work towards peace in the Middle East.

My Government was active in securing a United Nations Security Council Resolution imposing obligations on the Government of Sudan to take action to end the terrible suffering in the Darfur region. My Government is the second largest bilateral donor working to improve the humanitarian situation in Darfur.

My Government published White Papers providing a statement of Defence Policy, and an assessment of capabilities the Armed Forces will require to meet the new strategic environment. Legislation has been passed giving enabling powers to bring in new pension and compensation arrangements for the Armed Forces.

My Government has worked to reduce poverty and for the achievement of the millennium development goals. It established the Commission for Africa to focus on development and progress in Africa. In addition my Government launched an HIV and AIDS strategy for the developing world which announces the UK's commitment to spend at least £1.5 billion over the next three years.

I pray that the blessing of Almighty God may attend you.

A Commission was also read for proroguing this present Parliament, and the Lord Chancellor said:

"My Lords and Members of the House of Commons; by virtue of Her Majesty's Commission which has now been read, we do, in Her Majesty's name, and in obedience to Her Majesty's Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Tuesday the twenty-third day of this instant November, to be then here holden, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Tuesday the twenty-third day of this instant November."

End of the Third Session (opened on 26 November 2003) of the Fifty-Third Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in the Fifty-Third Year of the Reign of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second.

Disability Benefits

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Vernon Coaker.]

9.30 am

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): I welcome all Members to Westminster on this somewhat dull day, but I suspect that in the order of world affairs it may be an interesting one.

Mr. Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): I am very grateful for the opportunity to start a debate on disability benefits. It is an issue of great importance not only to the 10 million disabled people in this country, but to their families, friends and all of us who, in the words of the Disability Rights Commission, want a society where disabled people can participate fully as equal citizens.

I want to raise three issues. We could spend hours discussing disability benefits—there is a range of incredibly important issues—but the three issues that I want to focus on are the current debates about incapacity benefit, the recent report by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation on the additional costs of disability, and age discrimination in the system of disability benefits with particular reference to the disability living allowance. It will not be the first time that that issue has been raised in the House; I hope that it might be the last, but we shall find that out when the Minister makes her winding-up speech. I am delighted that the Minister is here to speak on behalf of the Government today. She is an outstanding Minister for disabled people, and is widely respected inside the House and out, particularly among disability organisations.

In recent weeks there has been a spate of hostile media stories about incapacity benefit, which have taken many forms. One group of them has suggested that consideration was being given to cuts in the level of incapacity benefit, or restrictions on eligibility. I was delighted when the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions gave an assurance in the House on 11 October, and I should like to place it on the record again so everyone is clear about it. On 11 October, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Mr. Best) asked the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions for an assurance that the Government had no plans to cut incapacity benefit or rights to it. The Secretary of State replied:

> "I assure my hon. Friend that we have no such plans."

Later he said:

> "I saw some of those press reports on the first weekend that I took on the job. None of them is based on fact."—[Official Report, 11 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 2–3.]

I was delighted when my right hon. Friend made that statement, and I am delighted that that remains the policy of the Government.

There have been other media stories that have not referred to speculation about the future of IB. Those stories have suggested that incapacity benefit is out of control in some sense. A well-known tabloid had the front-page headline, "Sicknote Britain". I will not name the publication because I do not want to give it any publicity. The "Sicknote Britain" story implied that people can simply pop along to their GP, get signed off and claim incapacity benefit. Every Member knows that they have constituents for whom that description of getting incapacity benefit has no basis in reality. It could not be further from the truth. Many of my constituents—I am sure that this is the case for all hon. and right hon. Members—have enormous difficulty in trying to satisfy a Department for Work and Pensions-approved doctor that they are unable to work because of disability or illness. The most striking thing about the system is that an alarming number of people who are rejected when they make an incapacity benefit application miraculously find that on appeal they get it back. That does not suggest that those who are assessing people for incapacity benefit are doing so in a way that makes life easy for those people. Indeed, I know from personal experience of my constituents that the system makes it incredibly difficult for many deserving applicants for incapacity benefit.

At Prime Minister's questions, the Leader of the Opposition also asserted that

> "incapacity benefit is out of control".—[Official Report, 15 September 2004; Vol. 424, c. 1262.]

I obviously had the courtesy to drop him a note to say that I would refer to that. To say that incapacity benefit is out of control is not only nonsense, but arrant nonsense. The number of people in receipt of incapacity benefit has been falling for a decade. It is not only nonsense to support fallacious stories of that kind, but deeply offensive to people who rely on incapacity benefit and who, as I have said, in many cases have to fight very hard to secure that to which they are entitled.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): Has the hon. Gentleman discovered that medical examiners are not listening carefully to the clients that they are examining and are ticking off boxes wrongly, and that that is one of the reasons why appeals have been so successful?

Mr. Berry: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. That is certainly the allegation that has been repeatedly made to me. The fact that such a large proportion of incapacity benefit claimants who have their initial application rejected win on appeal—I think that the figure is close to 50 per cent.—is suggestive to me. But it is not just what I believe is happening; it is what those in the appeal system believe is happening. I would be interested to hear from the Minister how the Department for Work and Pensions plans to address that problem.

The facts are simple. The number of people in receipt of incapacity benefit has fallen by 20 per cent. since 1995. The current number of beneficiaries is fewer than 1.5 million; 10 years ago it was more than 1.8 million. At the same time, as we all appreciate, there has been a huge increase in the number of women entering the labour market, paying national insurance contributions and, therefore, should they be sufficiently ill or disabled not to be able to work, having an entitlement to claim. So, there has been a significant and sustained reduction in the number of people in receipt of incapacity benefit at the same time as a growing number of people are entitled to it.

Anybody who believes that incapacity benefit is out of control is more attracted to soundbites and slogans than to the reality of what is going on in our community. People may say that numbers do not matter and that we should be looking at the proportion of the working-age population. That is fine. The proportion of the working-age population in this country in receipt of incapacity benefit has fallen over the past 10 years. Why? It is because, as the Government rightly point out, the number of people flowing into incapacity benefit is falling. It has gone down by about 40 per cent. over the past 10 years, from 1 million on an annual basis to about 600,000. I repeat: let us have no more, please, of this nonsense that incapacity benefit is out of control. Nothing could be further from the truth.

I shall make two final comments about incapacity benefit before I move on. First, fraud is virtually non-existent. People have a legitimate concern that our social security system should be fraud-free. We have a responsibility to chase up people who want fraudulently to claim benefits to which they are not entitled. However, the Office for National Statistics has found that evidence of fraud is virtually insignificant, statistically. The margin of error is less than half of 1 per cent. That is trivial compared with other forms of fraud that occur in our society. Fraud is virtually non-existent, so incapacity benefit is not out of control in that sense either.

Finally, the benefit is not a generous one. On average, it comes to £84.51 a week. I do not know how many hon. or right hon. Members would, if they were sufficiently ill or disabled as to be unable to work, find it easy to survive on £84.51 a week. The benefit is not getting any more generous compared with average earnings. The incapacity benefit payable to a single person qualifying for the long-term rate fell from 17.4 per cent. of average earnings in 1995 to 15.2 per cent. of average earnings in 2003.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend say a word about those people who receive incapacity benefit who would like to get into work but who face real difficulties in doing so? First, the reorganisation of the Department for Work and Pensions has taken services away. The second real disadvantage is that some people fear that, if they went to work, they would lose their benefits.

Mr. Berry: My hon. Friend must be psychic. I was about to say that, having demonstrated that incapacity benefit is not the problem that some suggest, there is a problem: many disabled people who are in receipt of incapacity benefit because they are unable to or cannot get work, would like to work. Therefore, I warmly welcome the Government's initiatives to enable disabled people to get into work. The new deal for disabled people, access to work, and the pathways to work pilots are making real progress.

As the Department for Work and Pensions announced on 11 October, the results of the pathways to work pilots demonstrate that twice as many incapacity benefit claimants in those areas are finding jobs as are those in other areas. It is a success story. My hon. Friend is right to suggest that the focus on reducing the number of people in receipt of incapacity benefit recognises that many people do not wish to be in receipt of incapacity benefit; they wish to work. The focus on reducing the number of people in receipt of incapacity benefit intends to give support to enable them to do precisely that.

When I think of pathways to work, I think of my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), the previous Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. I place on record my thanks to him for all that he, together with the Minister, did in promoting the pathways to work pilots. It is the right direction in which to go in enabling disabled people to access the labour market. That is the success that we need to build on. There is, therefore, a powerful case for labour market programmes of that kind.

In the UK, we are spending more on labour market programmes, but compared with the rest of the European Union we spend little. The European Commission says that UK spending on labour market programmes for disabled people is about 0.02 per cent. of GDP. That is less than one fifth of the average for the European Union and way behind the support given in Scandinavian countries.

So, the problem with incapacity benefit is not that it is out of control. One problem is that the amount it pays those who are unable to work is far too low. The other problem is that many people on incapacity benefit could secure work if the obstacles to employment were removed. We should, therefore, support the Government's efforts to remove those obstacles.

I turn briefly to a report published a couple of weeks ago by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation on the additional costs of disability. The report was based on a survey of disabled people who were living in different circumstances and had different types of impairment. To my knowledge it is, to date, the only research of that kind. The report demonstrates beyond doubt that disability benefits are substantially below the income required to ensure a decent standard of living.

Paddy Tipping: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way again. The Joseph Rowntree Foundation report is strong on the extra cost faced by people with a disability. Does he, like me and the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, find it rather odd that winter heating allowances are made available to elderly people, but not to people with real and additional needs, such as many people with disabilities? They do not qualify, although their needs are clear.

Mr. Berry: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. One additional cost that the Rowntree report identified was heating. It estimated that heating bills are up to one third higher for disabled people than for non-disabled people. I share my hon. Friend's view that it is not fair that the 1.3 million severely disabled people under the age of 60 and not entitled to winter fuel allowances do not receive support to cover that extra cost. The allowance recognises the problem that particular families may have in meeting heating costs. Why it should be people over 60 only who have that problem, I do not know.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's giving way. I appreciate also that he is dealing with disability benefits. When we talk about the cost of disability and of those under pensionable age, however, does he acknowledge that England in particular needs to come into line with Northern Ireland and abolish the means-testing of homes fit for children who are disabled?

Mr. Berry: I very much agree. I have long supported the campaign for England to follow Northern Ireland in that respect, and I warmly welcome the intervention.

Early-day motion 108, which I tabled last November, relates to winter fuel payments for severely disabled people. It has 153 cross-party signatures and reflects the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) and myself. I hope that the Minister in her winding-up speech will respond positively to the suggestion that the allowance should be extended to severely disabled people. In terms of a definition, those people on the middle or higher rate of the disability living allowance care component and those on the higher rate of the mobility component fit the bill as those people who need significant additional resources to meet the heating costs arising from their disability.

Overall, the Rowntree report identified that for many disabled people personal assistance was the greatest cost. That includes interpreters for deaf people, support for personal care and so on. Even if that largest cost is left out of consideration and we simply look at other costs, such as food, clothing, transport and housing, according to the report disabled people on benefits are at least £800 a month short of being able to enjoy an acceptable quality of life. Many press reports said that the Rowntree report stated that disabled people are £800 a month short, but that is after the substantial cost of personal assistance has been taken out. If it is included, the figure is much higher.

The shortfall in income has many implications. It must be addressed through environmental improvement, with better access to transport and buildings, and it must be addressed through enhanced service provision, better wages for people who have jobs and improved benefits for those who are unable to work. The first implication of the Rowntree report is that disability benefits are too low. The second conclusion is that current statistics seriously underestimate poverty among disabled people and their families. Government statistics show that 29 per cent.—almost one third—of households with a disabled person are poor, compared with only 17 per cent. of households without a disabled person. The Rowntree report shows that those statistics seriously underestimate the true extent of poverty among disabled people simply because they do not take into account the additional costs of disability.

Therefore, one factor that contributes to poverty and the isolation of disabled people is an ungenerous benefits system. Another is that older disabled people face age discrimination within the benefits system. A few days ago, on 20 October, my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Caton) briefly raised this issue in his Adjournment debate on disability living allowance, although he focused mainly on the lower age limit for eligibility for the mobility component. He expressed concern, which many hon. Members share, about the inherent age discrimination in our system of disability benefits, particularly disability living allowance, which cannot be claimed after the age of 65 unless an entitlement has already been established before that age. It is a curious system. People who claim and are awarded DLA before their 65th birthday—for example, on their 64th birthday—can carry it forward beyond the age of 65. However, someone who claims and is awarded DLA on the day after their 65th birthday does not get it and is told to rely on the much more limited attendance allowance.

That is a curious feature of a social security system, not least because attendance allowance is, as we all know, an inadequate alternative for many reasons. It does not contain a mobility component, so those aged 65 and over cannot receive help with mobility costs. Many of my constituents, family and friends over the age of 65 have mobility problems that incur significant additional costs, but, unless they have claimed before their 65th birthday, DLA cannot be used to help out. In addition, the DLA mobility component is the gateway to the Motability scheme to provide adapted cars, powered wheelchairs and so on. The age bar on DLA means that the vast majority of disabled older people are denied access to the scheme. In addition, the attendance allowance has no equivalent of the lower rate of care component of DLA, so again the situation is perverse and older people must have greater care needs than younger people to receive help with care costs.

In summary, I believe that the benefits system should be available to provide support on the basis of need, not of age. The current system devalues the role of older people in society. It does not enable them to participate in society to the full and is clearly age-discriminatory. It is hardly surprising that there is a growing campaign to do something about that.

Hon. Members will be aware of the "Mobilise" campaign to end age discrimination in disability benefits. It was launched earlier this year by more than 20 of the most influential organisations in the field of disability and ageing. Those who support this campaign include the Disability Rights Commission, which was set up by the Government to advise them on how to ensure equal opportunities for disabled people, Age Concern, Carers UK, Citizens Advice, Help the Aged, the Royal British Legion, the Royal National Institute of the Blind, and so on.

In March I tabled early-day motion 953 urging the Government to support the aims of the campaign and to end age discrimination in disability benefits. When I logged on at 9 o'clock this morning, I discovered that 234 right hon. and hon. Members have now signed that early-day motion. Of the 2,040-odd early-day motions on the Order Paper, only 16 have more signatures, and this one is moving up the list. I acknowledge and celebrate the fact that the Government are spending an extra £10 billion every year on pensioners in comparison with 1997. I celebrate the fact that almost half that extra money is going to help some of the poorest pensioners. I acknowledge that, inside and outside the House. However, the fact of the matter is that we still have a benefit for disabled people that is age-discriminatory and has the bizarre implication that if someone gets their application in a few hours before they are 65, they are all right, but if they do so a few hours afterwards, they are not.

That policy of age discrimination is in stark contrast to the Government's commendable commitment to equality and diversity. They plan to abolish age discrimination at work by 2006, and I say well done to that—great stuff. The national service framework for older people includes a strong statement against age discrimination in health and social care, but if that is wrong in social care, why is it right in the social security system? I simply do not understand that. All disabled people, regardless of age, should receive financial assistance based on their need to participate equally in society.

The Government have an outstanding record on disability issues. We have a Disability Rights Commission and we passed the Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001. Loopholes in the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 have been plugged, and a new disability discrimination Bill is to be introduced any minute—the Minister will tell us at the end of the debate when that will be. We have the new deal for disabled people, more money for access to work and the pathways to work pilots, and, yes, we have had a number of significant improvements in disability benefits. That is a record of which the Government should be proud, but we need to challenge the nonsense that some people still put forward about incapacity benefit, we need to recognise that disability benefits are too low and we need to tackle age discrimination that denies older disabled people the opportunity fully to participate in society.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the Rev. Martin Smyth for rising hesitantly to his feet.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I was waiting, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I thought that the spokesman for the official Opposition would be called next. As you know, as a humble man I try to keep my place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is indeed a humble and reverent man and much respected, but the Front Benchers wind up; they do not open.

9.58 am

Rev. Martin Smyth: I support the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry), with whom I have worked on these issues over the years, and I, too, pay tribute to successive Governments who have improved care and provision for people with disability. However, I learned many years ago that the biggest room in the world is the room for improvement. In that context, I agree with the arguments on age discrimination, particularly the tendency to minimise the opportunity for elderly people to get out and about. That is one reason why I wholeheartedly support the hon. Gentleman's argument that those over 65 should also be entitled to mobility allowance.

However, I want particularly to deal with another aspect of discrimination: in education. This was recently brought to my attention by a family in my constituency. As hon. Members know, we do not have the same opportunity at present to debate such issues in Northern Ireland, so it is important that we raise them in this place.

A young girl with a medical condition that could eventually lead to complete blindness was preparing for further education at the special school in Jordanstown. The education authority was aware of her needs through the reports that were made each year. This year, she moved to the national school for the blind in order to equip herself for her future life. Unfortunately, it seems that the education authority in Belfast did not follow through the reports that were sent to it. As a result, the young girl was turned down for an education grant.

What disturbed me even more was that when I took the matter up with the board and the Minister I was told that no grants were available because the girl was doing an academic course rather than a vocational one. There is discrimination on the grounds of disability and also in respect of future prospects. It is short-sighted to be prepared to equip someone for a vocational job but not in an academic capacity.

I raise the matter in the hope that perhaps somewhere in the labyrinthine pathways of government there will be another examination to determine whether such obstacles to young people who have the potential to develop might be removed, so that they may be enabled to develop and so that eventually young and old might be treated equally in law and in the benefits system.

10.2 am

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) on securing the debate. It is far from the first time that he and I have taken part in such a debate, whether in Westminster Hall, the main Chamber or elsewhere. He made a powerful case on behalf of disabled people, as he has on every occasion on which I have heard him speak. As always, I agree with almost the entirety of his comments.

The hon. Gentleman began by referring to the recent media hype about pushing people off incapacity benefit. According to some newspapers—and, indeed, some politicians—too many people are claiming benefits who do not deserve them and, who are swinging the lead. The Prime Minister has said that many IB claimants were pushed from unemployment into incapacity benefit in the 1980s and early 1990s in order to massage the unemployment figures. That comment has been repeated several times in recent years, and there have been many comments in the media and from politicians about the perceived problem of the number of IB claimants being out of control. In his opening comments, the hon. Gentleman did a good job of demolishing many such arguments and revealing them to be based on nonsense.

I said that I could agree with almost everything that the hon. Gentleman said in his speech, but of course one has to step back briefly from some of his points. I was a little alarmed to hear that he was reassured by the new Secretary of State, who assured Parliament that there were no plans to crack down on IB claimants. I wonder just how much reassurance we can take from the wording, "there are no such plans." I remember the 1997 general election, when the then Leader of the Opposition, who was about to become Prime Minister, told the London Evening Standard that he had no plans to introduce tuition fees.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): The hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) was quite right about the exchange in which the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Mr. Best) was involved. He no doubt inadvertently did not go on to read the further exchange between the Minister and I, later in the same series of questions. I asked the Minister specifically whether he would rule out putting time limits on incapacity benefit during this Parliament. The Minister said—I think I am quoting him more or less accurately—that he was not ruling anything in or out at this stage.

Paul Holmes: I agree entirely with that point, which reinforces what I was saying. When the words are, "We have no such plans" we have to consider whether, metaphorically or literally, the rider "at the moment" is there. In 1997 we were told that there were "no such plans" to introduce tuition fees, but four months later we discovered that they were going to be introduced and that free grants for poorer students were to be scrapped. We need to consider the context in which things are said.

Given the amount of coverage that this issue has had, we must have a little sceptical doubt about whether the threats will materialise, or whether they will just be part of election media hype, in which the Prime Minister unfortunately seems to want to play to that particular audience, perhaps to keep a certain newspaper proprietor on side.

Mr. Berry: Will the hon. Gentleman at least acknowledge that no Minister has actually made such a foolish statement as the Leader of the Opposition, who has said that incapacity benefit is out of control?

Paul Holmes: I am in the unusual position of so far being able to agree with everyone, from both sides, although I am sure that that will not last. The Leader of the official Opposition has indeed made rather out-of-control statements about how IB is out of control. We have already heard a very good demolition of that argument, with some good statistics to prove that the underlying facts do not back it up. We have heard the Prime Minister, many in the press and many from the official Opposition recently saying that we need to do something about the runaway problem of IB claimants. I agree with the hon. Member for Kingswood that the problem is not quite as it has been portrayed in the press, and I shall return to that later.

We have heard comments about the difficulty that people seeking to go on to IB have in passing through the necessary gateways. One of those, which several hon. Members have mentioned in previous debates, is the problem that people have in getting past the doctors appointed by the Department for Work and Pensions, or by the privatised contractor that runs part of that system, and in getting those doctors to accept that they are genuinely incapacitated or disabled.

I have previously mentioned examples from Chesterfield, which is a coal-mining area—although there are no pits now—with a long legacy of former miners. Many people there have, over many years, gone through the difficult medical process of proving that because of their work in the mines, they suffer from lung disease, vibration white finger and other related illnesses. They have gone through lengthy processes established by the former mineworkers union, the medical system and the Government, including visiting expert medical centres based in Nottingham, and they have established that they are indeed incapacitated. They then go for a quick 20-minute interview with a Government-appointed doctor, who casually ticks off the appropriate boxes on the forms and says, "Oh no, you're fit", or, "You're only 50 per cent. disabled, not 80 per cent."

People come to my surgeries absolutely furious that, having taken two, three or four years to prove their disability with medical experts who specialise in that field, they can then be casually dismissed as all right in 20 minutes, and perhaps have their benefit cut by half because they are told that they are only partially incapacitated. That is often not really a medical assessment at all. A constituent of mine on IB, not a miner this time, was visited by the doctor at home, rather than having to go to an appointment. When the report was submitted, it said that he was not entitled to IB because he had a heavy garage door that was manually operated, which clearly proved that he was able because the car was not parked on the front drive, so it must be inside the garage, whose door the man must be opening and shutting every day. The doctor never asked about or commented on that to the man. In fact, the car was not on the drive because it was an automatic and permanently parked on the road—it was not in the garage, but the doctor had just jumped to an assumption that was nothing to do with medical grounds.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will report any such incidents that he comes across to the Department, because we now have much more rigorous ways of dealing with inappropriate quality in medical services reports. I advise all hon. Members to ensure that they tell us of such incidents that they come across.

Paul Holmes: I accept the Minister's point. In fact, the case has been dealt with and solved.

To finish the story: that was one of the points that the doctor made as part of a so-called medical assessment. A second point was that the claimant's garden was in immaculate condition so clearly he was not so disabled that he could not go out and do the garden every day. Those two observations had no basis in medical fact. They were not discussed with the claimant at all. The doctor simply went away and wrote them up. When I took the case up, both through the Department and the complaints procedures, we got an apology and the total reversal of the finding.

In that instance, a reversal did occur. However, these are not just isolated cases. They are widespread across the country; they do not just occur in my constituency. The number of successful appeals against rulings by Department for Work and Pensions-appointed doctors has been increasing year on year over the past few years. Depending on the category, the success rate for appeals ranges from something like 46 per cent. to 53 or

[Paul Holmes]

54 per cent. The average is about 50 per cent. That figure has been increasing year by year, as questions that I and other hon. Members have tabled in Parliament have shown. There is clearly a problem, and it is not down to one or two rogue doctors, but down to the whole process, which seems to be designed to trick people and to exclude them from benefits because the problem is seen to be out of control. As a result, people are getting unfair treatment.

We heard about the long-running campaign on winter fuel payments for disabled people. We have debated that a number of times over the past few years and hon. Members were debating it long before I entered Parliament in 2001. This year, there is a motion in Parliament, which many MPs have signed and which was tabled by the hon. Member for Kingswood. Last year, I tabled a similar motion and the year before that it was the hon. Gentleman again. This is a cross-party programme that also gets widespread support across all the disability organisations. Disability Now, in particular, deserves a lot of credit for the way in which it has spearheaded the campaign over the years.

However, every time that Ministers respond we hear nothing of comfort. It is argued that disabled people get various benefits already so those should cover any extra fuel costs that they have. That seems disingenuous. Pensioners, who might be very well off because they have good private pensions—perhaps they are retired MPs, for example—automatically get the winter fuel payment because they have reached the age of 65, whether they need it or not. They receive the payment whether or not they are able-bodied, poor or particularly suffer from the cold. They may well live in an extremely well appointed and centrally heated house and not need the payment at all.

There are other people, below the age of 65, who are disabled and who, because of the nature of that disability, feel the cold much more than many pensioners, yet they are excluded from the extra payment. A disabled person will not be going out to a place of work, so they have to heat their house 24 hours a day. People at work, in places such as the overheated—in more senses than one—House of Commons, do not need to pay fuel bills for that part of the working week, but a disabled person does not have that advantage. They have to heat their house 24 hours a day, seven days a week and, because of the nature of various disabilities, they will feel the cold much more than other people, including quite a number of pensioners—although the older and frailer pensioners get, the more they need the payment as well.

It seems illogical that although we provide the winter fuel payment to all pensioners automatically—I would not argue against that—we exclude disabled people who might be only 60, 61 or 62, or 30, but who feel the cold in winter to a far greater extent because of their medical condition. This is a long-running campaign. We have debated the issue a number of times and we have still never heard the appropriate Minister give any ground or offer any hope that there will be movement on it. Perhaps, in 30 or 40 minutes' time, we shall all be relieved to hear that the Government are going to move on the issue.

We heard an eloquent description of the problems that age barriers present to older disabled people when trying to access certain things that are available to younger disabled people. That is the reverse of the winter fuel situation. Older disabled people may not be able to get carer's allowance or Motability money because they are pensioners and therefore do not qualify. That seems ludicrous. While campaigning, one of the disability organisations pointed out: "If you are going to have a serious motor accident and become disabled, make sure you do it when you are 64, before your 65th birthday, because a few days before your 65th birthday you will qualify for all sorts of assistance for mobility, care and support. Five days after your 65th birthday, you won't qualify because you don't need that support any more because you are an old-age pensioner." There is no logic whatever to that approach.

We need to step back and carry out some more independent assessments of the purpose of the benefit system in relation to a whole range of benefits. I have pointed out that we have not had an up-to-date definition of poverty since William Beveridge produced one in the 1940s. That is 60 years out of date now. When assessing poverty levels in relation to what is required of benefits, and what is to be achieved through them, we need proper, up-to-date assessment of those levels and of the purpose of the benefit. That particularly applies to disabled people who have become pensioners but can no longer get access to things like Motability. There is no logic to that.

Why are we providing care, attendance allowance and Motability allowances to disabled people? It is because they need it due to their condition. Why would they no longer need it when they pass a certain age limit and become classed as a pensioner?

Maria Eagle: The hon. Gentleman just said "attendance allowance". He is well aware that attendance allowance is paid to pensioners, but he suggested that it was not.

Paul Holmes: I accept the correction on that point.

The opening speech touched on one or two points relating to helping people with disability who were claiming IB to get into work. We shall hear from the Minister in half an hour or so a litany of success and good things that the Government have done, and undoubtedly it is true that the Government have a good record of improving the situation of disabled people, as I have acknowledged a number of times before. However, as we heard in the opening comments, although that record is good by European standards and is much better than what happened prior to 1997, there is an awful lot more ground to cover.

For example, we have a new deal programme to help people into work, which covers a range of people from the young to the elderly, disabled and so on. Just 3 per cent. of the new deal budget of three quarters of a billion pounds per year helps one of the groups that needs help most in order to overcome all sorts of barriers to get into work: the disabled. Only 3 per cent. of the total goes to the group that needs help more than any other.

Maria Eagle: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that disabled people cannot benefit from all the new deals? The figures show that 180,000 have been helped back to work by all the new deals and only 45,000 by the new deal for disabled people.

Paul Holmes: I am going to develop the point that disabled people often experience a particular range of circumstances that make it hard for them to get back into work. The standard new deal processes applied with short-term targets lead to a rush to get people into work quickly. Personal advisers meet the targets set for them, and there is a strong tendency—well documented by reports from the Department for Work and Pensions, the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee—to go for the superficial opportunities for people who would find work anyway and to ignore the more difficult cases.

We are talking about disabled people, but I have made the same point in other debates about people coming off drugs and alcohol. There are progress2work programmes for those coming off drugs, one of which is being piloted in the Chesterfield area, and I have been to visit it. That pilot is proving quite successful, but it is a limited one. People with low educational attainment, rather than learning disabilities, would be another category to consider. There are various such categories, of which the disabled is probably the largest, where people experience particular problems in getting into work—much more so than the average jobseeker.

Before staff can even consider helping such people to seek work, they have to start further back with personal confidence, life skills and communication skills. I have talked before about a pilot project set up three years ago by the chamber of commerce in Chesterfield. There are many Government replicas of it throughout the country now. The project began working with people who were disabled and may never have worked in their lives. Before it could even think of trying to get those people into a work experience programme or job placement, it had to spend weeks and months on people's life skills and self-confidence, or on tasks such as showing them a computer and how to use it, which is a huge obstacle in the modern labour market for someone aged 50 who has never worked, let alone someone aged 50 from an old manual industry such as mining. Large groups of people, particularly disabled people, face specific problems that the superficial quick-fix approach of the new deal in general has not dealt with. We should target much more of the new deal money to the particularly hard-to-place groups instead of to the groups that, as reports by the Department for Work and Pensions, the National Audit Office and the Public Account Committee have said repeatedly over the past seven years, will get jobs anyway. The money has not been as well spent as it might have been and there are many examples of that among disabled people.

During the opening speech, we heard some good examples of Government experiments, and all credit to them. The pathways to work experiment is being piloted in half a dozen areas throughout the country, including the Chesterfield and north Derbyshire area. I have talked to the personal advisers who are delivering the scheme, which is not even a year old—it was six months old when I talked to them—and they were full of praise for it. It is an excellent scheme to help disabled people to go back to work. There were problems; one was the Government's obsession with imposing sanctions on vulnerable people, such as writing to every disabled person and telling them to come in for a compulsory interview or else. That had a hugely frightening effect on people. The personal advisers that I spoke to said that they know when the letter will arrive, so they ring the recipient the day before and the day after to tell them not to panic or worry about it and that all they have to do is to come in and have a chat. The personal advisers waste a lot of time trying to undo the harm that is done by the standard letter that threatens sanctions if the recipients do not go in for an interview. We have discussed previously the Government's obsession with sanctions, and an increasing number of reports from the Department for Work and Pensions document the problem of sanctions driving people back to crime, drugs and the black economy, and off benefits.

The pathways to work pilot to help disabled people is excellent. It is less than a year old, but is proving to be extremely successful so far and very innovative. However, it is more intensive and the tick-box targets for putting people into sustained jobs quickly cannot be hit because there are so many initial obstacles to overcome. There are particular problems with benefits. The Liberal Democrats have long argued that there should be a partial benefit that recognises that some disabled people will not be able to return to full-time work. Some disabilities come and go, such as multiple sclerosis, and sufferers may be able to work one week but not the next. There should be a partial benefit that recognises that some disabled people want to work—1 million of them say that they do—but want help to enable them to do so. A partial benefits system would allow such a balance.

One obstacle that all the surveys showed was that when disabled people want to return to work they are scared that, having spent so long getting access to benefits, which are not especially generous, they will lose them if they try a job and find that after a month they cannot keep up with it because of their disability, and will again face the problem of trying to get back on to benefits. The Government are making improvements, but that problem is still a major one for disabled people. The pathways to work experiment is helping in some ways and provides support for people going into work, but only for a year. The pilots are not even a year old yet, so we do not know what happens at the end of a year. What will happen to those who lose the temporary support of payments and benefits and must rely entirely on a wage? Experiments in the right direction are paving the way, but there are not enough of them.

If the Government believe in evidence-based policies—they so often say that, but we do not see them materialise—they should look at the success of their own pilots for disabled people and to help ex-drug addicts and so on.

To return to a comment made during the opening speech, there is progress and there are good experiments, but the expenditure on helping people in those categories to get into work could be increased by 500 per cent. and that would only bring us to the European average. We have started down the path and are making improvements, but we are well behind good examples in this area.

[Paul Holmes]

The Shaw Trust is another success story. I have visited two of its projects, and it is the biggest job broker for the Department for Work and Pensions. It is very successful, dealing with 30,000 people out of 1 million who want work this year alone. That is progress but still a drop in the ocean.

Many projects are being told this year that they are too successful and that they must stop placing disabled people in work. The Shaw Trust has talked to me about that, as has the Groundwork Trust, and the press have documented a whole series of incidents where trusts that are too successful and are outstripping the resources available are being told that they must cut back for the rest of the year and not place any more people. That is so short-sighted, because every disabled person who goes to work saves the Government money in benefits and taxes. Every success story saves the taxpayer money, and it boosts the self-esteem and lifestyle of the person getting back into work. I urge the Minister to look again at what many disabled organisations working in that area are saying. Their budgets are being cut this year because they are too successful at placing people in work.

Maria Eagle: It is absolutely wrong for the hon. Gentleman to suggest that any providers are having their budgets cut.

Paul Holmes: If that is what I said, I will correct it. The trusts are not having their budgets cut; they are having them frozen, because they are outstripping the available money. One can see the short-term logic of that. The Papworth Trust is another, along with the Shaw Trust and the Groundwork Trust, which says that budgets are being frozen, and they cannot all be wrong. I was a head of department in a school, and in any organisation in any year, one has a certain budget that one cannot exceed. In this particular instance, I ask the Minister to look again, because every person who gets into work through such schemes saves the taxpayer money in benefits and taxation. The trusts are a good investment, which saves money over many years. Pilots that are becoming too successful are being told that they will have to lay off staff for the rest of the financial year because they have got too many people into work.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Her Majesty's Opposition spokesman, Mr. Paul Goodman.

10.27 am

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): It is a great pleasure to see you in the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It has been an enjoyable and robust debate. I enjoyed the contribution by the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth), and it is always good to see him. The hon. Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes) was right to say that there are some problems with the Government's contracting arrangements with the Shaw Trust, but he was wrong to say—I think he said this, but the record will reflect it—that there has been no definition of poverty since Beveridge. My recollection is that the Government have a commitment to eradicate child poverty, and there has been considerable debate about what eradication might mean. They have three targets for eradicating child poverty. I am not entirely convinced of the merits of one of them, but it is inaccurate to say that the Government have no targets.

Maria Eagle: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. Far from there not being an acceptable definition, as a result of widespread consultation last year we have the three measures to which he refers. The hon. Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes) must have been looking the other way.

Mr. Goodman: The Minister is right on that point. There has been considerable debate about what eradication means, but I will not be sidetracked by a debate on poverty when we are debating disability benefits.

The hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) has a long-standing interest in disability. I prepared for the debate by going back to mug up on the gospel according to Berry. I re-read his speech from 21 May 2003 during the debate on the European year of disabled people. It was one of the first that I read when I took up my appointment as shadow Minister for disabled people. I also re-read his speech on Second Reading of the Carers (Equal Opportunities) Bill on 6 May, which was introduced by his hon. Friend the hon. Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis) and which with all-party support was passed and became the 2004 Act. During that debate, the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), argued that the carer's allowance stops when pensioners start to claim the retirement pension because that pension, like the carer's allowance, exists to replace lost income. The hon. Member for Kingswood argued in reply:

> "The issue is whether or not carers over 65 should get increased support for their caring activities, not least because if they did not undertake them it would be far more expensive for the Government to fund them."—[Official Report, 6 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 1068.]

When challenged by the hon. Member for Kingswood to name a resource that funds such support, the Minister cited—you might not be surprised to hear this, Mr. Deputy Speaker—attendance allowance. I suspect that neither the hon. Member for Kingswood nor I would be surprised if the Minister advances similar arguments today.

I cited that exchange because it touches on some of the main points raised by the hon. Member for Kingswood. I enjoyed his speech very much, although I thought that some of his statistics were a little selective. For example, the total number of IB claimants in May 1995 was—

Maria Eagle: Say 1997.

Mr. Goodman: I will say 1997 if the Minister likes. In fact, the 1997 figure would be even more helpful to my case. The number of IB claimants in 1997 was roughly 2,370,000. The figure is now 2,404,000. So I am glad that the Minister brought me from 1995 to 1997.

Mr. Berry: I was not referring to the number of claimants. I was referring to the number of people who benefit from and receive—beneficiaries. According to the Department for Work and Pensions, in 1995 the number of incapacity benefit beneficiaries was 1.8 million. The hon. Gentleman, like some of his hon. Friends, should make a clear distinction between claimants, some of whom do not get the benefit, and beneficiaries. I was referring specifically to beneficiaries and was using the Department's statistics, not my own.

Mr. Goodman: I am aware that the hon. Gentleman was referring to beneficiaries and did not for a moment claim that he was not. I was simply pointing out that, by not quoting the claimant figures, he was being somewhat selective with the statistics.

Mr. Berry: I would not press this, but that is a serious accusation. I am being accused of being "selective" in the use of statistics. I specifically referred to incapacity benefit beneficiaries and I specifically quoted the Department for Work and Pension's source. I was not being selective at all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Does the hon. Gentleman seek to raise a point of order with me or does he merely seek to intervene on the Opposition spokesman?

Mr. Berry: I was hoping that the hon. Gentleman would do me the courtesy of apologising for the clearly unfounded accusation that I was using statistics selectively.

Mr. Goodman rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before the hon. Gentleman continues his speech, I can only say that this is a matter of debate. The hon. Member for Kingswood made his point. The hon. Member for Wycombe will now respond.

Mr. Goodman: I think that the hon. Member for Kingswood knows that this is a matter for debate. I was not accusing him of misquoting figures. I merely pointed out that he quoted some figures and not others.

I want to step back from that exchange to consider both the problems and the possibilities that the debate on disability benefits opens up. At one end of the life cycle, more disabled children are surviving. At the other end, more people are living for longer and incurring disabilities as they do so. In between, there is greater consciousness of disability than there was. I will give one striking example of that, which relates directly to disability benefits and was, I believe, the point that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) made in the remarks that the hon. Member for Kingswood quoted.

I discovered by tabling parliamentary questions that, since 1997, the number claiming incapacity benefit on mental health grounds has risen to 718,000. That is a rise of 38 per cent. It is also one quarter of all incapacity benefit claims. Conditions such as stress and depression account for 65 per cent. of all mental health cases. I believe that there is some element of fraud in the system, although I have no doubt that, as the hon. Gentleman said, it is small. The focus on fraud as part of the debate about incapacity benefit is, to some degree, a red herring. If one studies the figures closely, it seems that what is actually happening as part of the tale of incapacity benefit is that there is a rise in mental health claims, which do appear to be out of control. That tells us not that large numbers of people are engaged in fraud but that large numbers of people are enduring mental health problems.

Mr. Berry: Will the hon. Gentleman therefore simply state whether he agrees with his right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition that incapacity benefit is out of control? Is there evidence for that or not?

Mr. Goodman: The hon. Gentleman was not listening to me. It is the rise that is clearly out of control, and it was that to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred. I shall return to incapacity benefit later.

The example in the figures that I gave makes an important point: benefits that are paid to people with disabilities, whether on the objective basis of age or on the more subjective basis of individual assessment, become controversial—perhaps inevitably—as social change gathers pace.

Another example is the current "Mobilise" campaign. I was confident that the hon. Member for Kingswood would refer to it and he duly did so. It is supported by Help the Aged, among others, and aims to remove the upper age limit of 65 for claiming disability living allowance. The campaigners say that older people can now work longer—they are right about that—and that, given social change, the age limit of 65 is outdated as well as discriminatory. In response, Ministers usually say that many benefits contain age rules—child benefit is paid for children, pensions are paid to older people and so on—and that there is no intrinsic reason why the disability living allowance should not have an upper age limit. I anticipate that the Minister may deploy some of those arguments when she speaks in a few moments. Ministers usually do not say that a commitment to remove the upper age limit would have a cost to the public purse and that the Treasury simply would not wear it, at least at present.

I confess to having some sympathy for the dilemma in which Ministers are placed. My party recently launched its largest ever consultation on disability policy. In doing so, we pointed out that 50 per cent. of disabled people have incomes below the poverty line and that there are particular complaints—I have the list here—about non-access to winter fuel payments, which the hon. Member for Kingswood mentioned, the lack of a mobility payment for attendance allowance, the downrating of benefits while disabled people are in hospital and the withdrawal of benefits if they earn income.

Personally, I find the argument about access to winter fuel payments absolutely compelling. It seems curious, to say the least, that a non-disabled person on a relatively high income can obtain the winter fuel payment while a severely disabled person on a low income cannot. This is where my sympathy for the dilemma of Ministers comes in. There is a cost to the taxpayer in meeting human needs and satisfying the demands of the lobbies, but Ministers are aware that there are always more human needs to meet and that the lobbies are never entirely satisfied. Therefore, although

[Mr. Goodman]

I am personally sympathetic to the argument, I cannot make a commitment that my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor has not cleared, any more than the Minister can make a commitment today that her right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not cleared—news that I suspect will come as no surprise to the hon. Member for Kingswood. However, before I am accused of being soft on Ministers, I should make the following points, without in any way anticipating the response to my party's consultation.

First, the benefits system is too complex. My party is committed to keeping the winter fuel payment, but that payment provides an illustration of how creating a more complex system, sometimes in response to the very demands of lobby groups, which have been mentioned today, creates inconsistencies and injustices.

Secondly, a complex system does not just create systematic inconsistencies. It also intensifies human problems. Disabled people often find it difficult, if not impossible, to fill in long, complex forms and undergo long, complex assessments, even if—as is often not the case—they have family or professional support in claiming. Let me give as an example an elderly Kashmiri woman in my constituency for whom English is not a first language, or who might not speak English at all. Such a person will have immense difficulty accessing the system, and the more complex the system becomes, the more difficult she will find it.

Thirdly, a complex system not only intensifies human problems but is felt by many of those who use it to insult human dignity. We all know from our correspondence that older people feel that they have earned the benefits that they receive, and that means-testing, in particular, insults their dignity. That explains the high non take-up rate of pension credit—the Government themselves anticipate a non take-up rate of a quarter even in 2008.

Finally, I return to incapacity benefit. There is a problem on incapacity benefit in particular that is also a problem for the Government more generally: the question of who is actually driving policy. When the hon. Member for Kingswood quoted the new Secretary of State, it sounded to me as though he was not saying that the Government had now entirely satisfied him on that point, but that he was still worried that there might be a question of time-limiting future incapacity benefit claimants. The Prime Minister has recently explicitly linked the payment of higher pensions with reducing the incapacity benefit bill. Having ruled out raising taxes to pay for larger pensions, he has said that it is important to reduce the number of people on incapacity benefit because:

> "It is particularly important as we have got to spend more money on pensions. It is a question of reconfiguring the welfare system."

The Prime Minister did not directly say that the rules that govern IB will be tightened, or that it might be time-limited in the future, but recent reports have suggested that, and the hon. Member for Kingswood is clearly well aware of it. If I read those reports rightly, I rather think that they have come not from the Minister's Department but, as journalists say in the trade, from sources close to No. 10.

When the Minister replies to the debate, will she say whether the Government have ruled out time-limiting IB and, in particular, ruled out doing so before the next election? The hon. Gentleman can then go away entirely satisfied. It would also help him and me if she would say whether the Government have finally ruled out accepting recommendation 17 of the report of the Joint Committee on the draft Disability Bill. We agreed unanimously, even including such well-known drippy wets as Lord Tebbit, that the Government should consider—I emphasise, only consider—whether eligibility for certain disability benefits should automatically provide coverage for a disabled person under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. That point was agreed by the Committee, on which the hon. Member for Kingswood and I served and on which the Labour party had a majority.

I look forward to the Minister's reply on that and other points.

10.44 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): May I first compliment everyone who has taken part in the debate? It has been superb, and quite sharp for so early in the morning. I almost feel as though I do not have to get involved in some of the arguments going on between my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) and the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), who seem to be quite capable of having a pretty good argument without my intervention. That is enjoyable for me as a Minister to sit and watch, instead of necessarily having to participate.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth), who takes whatever opportunities he can to raise issues that matter a great deal to his constituents, particularly his constituents who are people with disabilities, to use the Northern Ireland phrase. I have noticed that he quite rightly finds every opportunity to do that in the House. He made a point about discrimination in education and referred to a particular constituent. If he wants to provide me with the details, I am happy to take the matter up with my colleagues, the Northern Ireland Ministers, and ensure that they are fully aware of the situation.

I pay tribute to the work of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood in this field, in which he has an excellent background. He has raised, laser-like, three issues. We could spend all day discussing them, but we have only 15 minutes remaining. I fear that I might not be able to deal with every point raised, but I will do my best to take the most important and I undertake to contact hon. Members by letter about any points that I have inadvertently missed out or have not had time to deal with.

My hon. Friend started his speech with media stories about incapacity benefits. They have been referred to by the hon. Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes), who was a little less churlish than he usually is. He must have got out of bed on the right side, and I recommend it to him because it made for a much less tense debate and a friendlier occasion. Those stories have also been mentioned by the hon. Member for Wycombe.

There has been much quotation of the new Secretary of State, which he will be glad to see. I will provide the quotation that people could not quite remember and which the hon. Member for Wycombe raised in an intervention. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said when challenged further on 11 October that he could not formally rule anything in or out for all time. That is obvious. He went on to say:

> "However, I stress that any longer-term reform to incapacity benefit has to build on our existing approach in pathways to work".—[Official Report, 11 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 3.]

That is an important qualification, which I hope provides proper reassurance.

Much as we would like to be in charge of various newspapers, none of us are. I caution hon. Members not to believe too much of what they read in the newspapers. There is often wild speculation that does not necessarily come from any source close to anybody apart from the nearest journalist in the nearest bar. I do not wish to impugn the integrity of journalists, however; they have their job to do as well.

There has been an interesting debate about whether the number of people on incapacity benefit is out of control. I enjoyed hearing the little spat between my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood and the hon. Member for Wycombe, who was valiantly trying to defend the words of the leader of his party. He obviously must do so, but he put a slightly different interpretation on the numbers by talking about the number of people coming on to incapacity benefit who report stress or low-level mental illness. It was an intriguing and valiant attempt to support his leader, because, having looked at the figures, he clearly does not believe that the number of people on incapacity benefit is out of control.

The number of people in work is higher than ever before. We have our highest employment level for 30 years—75 per cent. of the working age population are in work. We have our lowest level of unemployment for the same period and there are 2 million more jobs in the economy. The inflows on to incapacity benefit have gone down by 25 per cent., and more than 90 per cent. of the increase in the number of people on incapacity benefit between 1979 and this year happened between 1979 and 1997. The hon. Gentleman was not in Parliament at the time, but many of his hon. and right hon. Friends, including his leader, were and they had important jobs, such as running Government employment policy. I hope that puts across my point.

The idea that incapacity benefit is out of control is complete nonsense; I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood on that point. However, that does not take away from the fact that we must help those who wish to get back to work and leave the incapacity benefit roll. We must provide proper, targeted help. In that regard, I was pleased to hear from those who have spoken the widespread support for pathways to work and the initiatives that we are piloting. Even the hon. Member for Chesterfield, who usually looks on the dark side of such things, admitted that some good was coming out of the programme. I was glad to hear that.

Of course, these are early days. Three of the pilots have been going for a year, but the other four have been going for only nine months, so we cannot say what the sustained outcomes will be. The pilot programme costs about £100 million in additional resources. It is very exciting to see from the early results that twice as many people are leaving the incapacity benefit rolls in the pilot areas.

Mr. Goodman: Will the Minister give way?

Maria Eagle: I will in a moment, when I have spat out this statistic. I may not have all the statistics, but here is one. In the pilot areas, six times more people are taking up the help that is being offered, and that has to be good.

Mr. Goodman: With reference to the statistics, some of which the Minister recently provided in a written answer to me, when will she be able to tell us how many of the people who have gone into work as a result of pathways to work have stayed in for longer than 13 weeks?

Maria Eagle: The hon. Gentleman could use his calculator to work out that 13 weeks after they have gone into work we might be able to say whether they are still in work. We need another half year. The hon. Gentleman must remember that for the first three months work-focused interviews were just starting. The help that is then given can vary; for example, eight weeks for the condition management programme. Some people may move into work only after that. Of course, with the return-to-work credit and not as much help, some people go straight into work.

We need at least a year. The pilot programmes are two or two and a half years long. Only at the end of that time will we be able properly to evaluate sustained job outcomes, although we will produce information about how the pilots are working as we go. Qualitative and quantitative evaluations will be produced during the life of the pilots, but only at the end of the period will we be able to evaluate the pilots fully and determine how people do, particularly in respect of sustained job outcomes. Obviously, statistics will be made available as they become available to the Department.

We are certainly excited thus far about the early indications, which appear to be good. We must ensure that we build on this approach in order to help people who get stuck on this benefit. Of the people who come on to it, 90 per cent. wish and expect to go back to work but find that after a year the average length of stay on it is eight years. Clearly, there is a problem that must be tackled, and it is fallacious to argue about whether it involves fraud or some kind of psychological effect.

The hon. Member for Chesterfield said that his constituents have to prove that they are incapacitated and that they cannot do this, that or the other. There is a psychology surrounding this benefit that is not helpful. People have to prove what they cannot do; they have to show others that they really are incapacitated. That is not helpful. We want to tackle those issues because, rather than fraud, that is what keeps people on benefit and prevents them from getting into work.

As hon. Members can tell, I could talk about the issue for some time if induced to do so. However, I should move on, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood raised three issues and I want to say something about all of them. He would expect me to do so. Let us move on to age discrimination, which is how his early-day motion refers to it, in the disability living allowance. I believe that he said that the rules were "curious", and the hon. Member for Chesterfield also gave some examples of inconsistencies. Since I became a Social Security Minister, I have discovered that benefit rules always have curious aspects to them. One can consider an individual benefit in itself and think how curious it is, but one should also consider how it fits into the rest of the benefits system and what the rationale is for it. When the disability living allowance was established in 1992, the rationale was to ensure that those who were severely disabled earlier in life received additional help. The research that underlay the work that was done to establish the benefit indicated that people who are disabled earlier in life have tougher outcomes, have more extra costs and find it more difficult to get income. The rationale of the benefit was to try to provide targeted extra help to those who are severely disabled earlier in life.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood and others in the House know, the care and mobility components act as proxies for the extra costs that a disabled person might face in dealing with their disability. I do not think that anybody has ever suggested that the care and mobility components can capture or attempt to capture all those extra costs. I will come on to the Joseph Rowntree Foundation report shortly. It is another attempt to capture those costs. The care and mobility components are proxies for the extra costs that severely disabled people face.

Care and mobility are, I argue, good proxies to capture those extra costs. That is certainly the rationale of the benefit. The aim was to provide extra help to people disabled at a younger age because they would—at that time and now, although the situation is improving—have had less chance to work, less chance to save and, therefore, less income available to them. So, the idea was to focus help on people who are disabled at an earlier age. That is why the mobility components are available in DLA but not in attendance allowance.

I acknowledge that, under DLA run-on, those who qualify for DLA aged under 64 may keep the mobility component after they become 65, and that, under DLA cut-off, those who qualify for extra cost-benefit after the age of 65 cannot take advantage of the mobility component. Both of those rules can, I accept, seem curious if considered in isolation, without having in the back of one's mind the rationale of the benefit. Of course it is possible to change the rationale of a benefit, but that is something that ought to be done when considering how the entire benefit operates. It is not something that can be done piecemeal or easily, or something that should be undertaken lightly.

The hon. Member for Wycombe suggested that I might make some arguments that I have not made, but would have made had he not done so, about the rationale of the benefit. It is not as easy to make these changes as one might think. The hon. Gentleman referred to costs. Of course there would be a huge extra cost if we were to extend the mobility components of DLA into attendance allowance and eligibility for those who qualified after age 65.

We do not have a precise figure about those costs. The figure that was given in parliamentary answers is old and is based on old research. The newer figures must be based on assumptions because, as I have often said to the hon. Member for Chesterfield, it is difficult to know what the take-up of an extra cost benefit such as attendance allowance or disability living allowance will be. One cannot tell. The allowance considers the effect of a disability or condition on the care and mobility needs of an individual. It is difficult to work out what take-up should be. It is easy to work out what take-up of pension credit should be because we know how many pensioners there are and what the income distribution is. It is not so easy to work out what take-up of an extra cost benefit should be. So newer assessments of cost must be based on assumptions rather than on the old research, which is out of date.

Mr. Berry: The argument is that people who require DLA earlier in life should get more support. We would not dream of saying to older parents that their child benefit should be less than that of younger parents on the grounds that they had had the opportunities "to work and save". Is that not the same principle?

Maria Eagle: I am obviously failing to convince my hon. Friend and I am not surprised by that. The rationale of the benefit, when it was formed and now, is to provide extra help to those who are disabled earlier in life in recognition of the fact that it is harder for them to get income in any other way. The mobility components are used as a proxy for that income. That is why the cut-off came about. I do not think that my hon. Friend will be convinced by that argument, but I am trying to explain the rationale, which has not changed. It is difficult to change the rationale of benefits in a piecemeal fashion without causing chaos.

I am running out of time. That measure certainly has a high cost. I acknowledge that. The hon. Member for Wycombe said that, for the same reason, he could not make any promises. There is no doubt about that. I am well aware of the strength of feeling on the part of my hon. Friend and others in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid that time is up, despite the importance of the subject.

Defence Aviation Repair Agency

11 am

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): I am grateful for this opportunity, however brief, to draw hon. Members' attention to the important matter of the future of the Defence Aviation Repair Agency at RAF St. Athan and, in my opinion, the future of the whole Defence Aviation Repair Agency. This is the first opportunity to debate the subject since the Minister announced his preferred option—I stress "preferred"—on 16 September 2004, effectively to remove the deep repair and maintenance of virtually the entire front-line Royal Air Force fleet of fast jets, the Tornado GR4, from St. Athan to RAF Marham in the east of England. That follows his decision earlier this year to remove repair and maintenance of the Harrier GR9 from RAF St. Athan to RAF Cottesmore in Leicestershire.

The work has been carried out at St. Athan for nearly 50 years. Generations of workers and RAF personnel have successfully carried out repair, deep repair, major repair and overhaul of our front-line fighter fleet at St. Athan for many years. I hope that my right hon. Friend will take my comment in the spirit in which it is intended by a friend and long-standing supporter of the Government's defence policy, which has been brave, radical, and until now, very successful, but I must place it on the record that the decision is wrong in principle and in practice. It will turn out to be bad news for the military and particularly for the RAF, because it will undermine front-line capability, and for British taxpayers, because the cost of the work will spiral out of control, as it did in the past, which was the very reason for creating DARA.

I recognise that the decision is not entirely my right hon. Friend's responsibility, but it will have a devastating effect on the south Wales aviation industry.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I agree that the decision is bad news for the Welsh aviation industry as a whole, because we are becoming a global centre of excellence in just the areas that the hon. Gentleman is describing.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman is right, because the success of the south Wales aviation industry has been predicated on the existence of that centre of excellence for military aircraft repair for many years. Many of the industries that now exist have been a spin-off from that. Future plans for the aviation industry in south Wales, most notably the centre of excellence, the aviation business park, will be fundamentally undermined by the decision, because the only way of making it a centre of excellence is to build on the skills and expertise of the people who already operate from the site.

I want to explain why the decision is so wrong and why it is such bad news. However, I had better spend a minute or two explaining what DARA is, because it has not been with us for long. Her Majesty's Government formed the agency as a trading fund as recently as April 2001, with a specific strategic role in supporting our front-line forces: to provide—I shall say this slowly—a competitive alternative to sources of repair in the commercial sector in Britain.

A review carried out by the Ministry of Defence in 2003 came up with three clever options. We either move the work forward to military operational bases, or we move all the work—that is deep support for military aircraft—back to DARA at St. Athan and other locations. Alternatively, we come up with a hybrid solution, which the Minister has done. However, that end-to-end review of logistics undertaken by private consultants and the RAF is fundamentally flawed, because it completely ignores the strategic role of DARA, which was created by the Government as recently as three years ago. DARA became a full trading agency just a few months ago, on 1 April 2004. Within a few months, the role of the agency created by the Government is being ignored and Government policy is being completely reversed.

In the past, there have been four lines of support for the British Air Force and our military aircraft: front-line reinforcement, second-line reinforcement at military operational bases, third-line at DARA and fourth-line within industry and the private sector. Quite rightly, a review of logistics needed to take place to ensure a smaller logistic footprint and a tri-service provision for all our forces—Army, Navy and Air Force—for all aircraft, to stop duplication and waste. There has been a post-cold war consensus by Governments of both persuasions that that is necessary. Of course we support that, but nobody expected that during the end-to-end review the new, critical role given to DARA would be ignored in the way that it has been.

The creation of DARA was based on the post-cold war consensus that there is no longer any military case whatever for servicemen and women to carry out factory repair of aircraft. Clearly, there is a military case for carrying out servicing and immediate repairs—kicking tyres, filling up with petrol and keeping the things in the air—but there is no military case for service personnel acting as factory workers and carrying out major overhauls of aircraft. There used to be such a case during the cold war because of the threat of a direct invasion of this country, and the possibility of a long, high-intensity military engagement in the central plains of Europe and of having to move forward deep repair to support our air-to-air fighter aircraft in the sky. That scenario no longer exists and nobody in government, in opposition or in any other NATO country in the alliance believes that that work should be carried out by military personnel.

The move is a disaster for the military, because if they go back—I stress go back—to carrying out deep repair of military aircraft, which they have not carried out since the origins of DARA in 1991, that will have to be paid for, and the only way to pay for it is to take away capability from the front line.

Everybody knows that the military are not cut out for that sort of work. That is another fundamental mistake made by the review: it makes no proper distinction between military personnel—I speak as an ex-serviceman and member of the Royal Air Force—carrying out their work in the committed and loyal way that they do, under a military code and Queen's regulations, and skilled factory workers, who are civilians operating in a commercial environment, which is what we have at DARA. That is why it took more than 4,000 military personnel just five years ago to undertake the work currently done by 1,450 civilians. Is the Minister honestly suggesting that it makes economic sense to move that work back to the military? Of course it does not. It is the economics of the madhouse if we are to expect military personnel to do that work either efficiently or cost-effectively. It will undermine military front-line capability. Members of the services will not be able to carry out the work, which is already happening with the Harriers that have been moved to Cottesmore, where there is a reliance on private contractors being brought in to bail them out. Six aircraft have already been returned to DARA St. Athan, which has been asked to bail out the Royal Air Force. In the past, the RAF has had to turn to the private sector to bail it out with blank cheques, and it will have to do that again in the future.

I recently met representatives of a major defence contractor—I am sure that my right hon. Friend will not have difficulty working out which one—and their smiles went from ear to ear because they knew the consequences of this decision, if implemented: a reliance on contractors to help out the RAF with all its work at military operational bases, or to act as a semi-permanent support. The policy is wrong for the RAF, and in its heart of hearts, the RAF knows that it is wrong. It marks a step change in the strategic defence review, which until now has attempted to introduce smart procurement in many fields. One element of that is the outsourcing of unnecessary tasks that the military has no need to carry out on either economic or military grounds.

The policy is a complete reversal: it is a form of renationalisation through the back door. We have not seen such nationalisation since the Government of Ted Heath and the overnight nationalisation of Rolls-Royce. The previous Conservative Government were going to privatise part of the work—the part of the agency made up by Magda—through "Competing for Quality". The Labour Government said that the work should be outsourced because there is no military case for keeping it, but privatising it carries security risks—there may be no surge capacity in a crisis—so they created DARA at RAF St. Athan to operate in a purely commercial environment for profit, showing a return on investment and with flexibility of labour practices. In the Minister's own words, it was to become a "world-beating centre of excellence" in military aviation.

The policy will be a disaster for the taxpayer, because I confidently predict that he or she will pay through the nose for the work to be undertaken initially by the RAF, and when it fails, through a partnership with the private sector, but with the RAF dependent on the private sector for support. There is no competitive element whatever in the formula—it is a recipe for disaster. That is very sad, because other strategic defence reviews in other NATO countries, and even statements by the former Supreme Allied Commander Europe, General Wesley Clark, used the British example for other countries to follow in relation to outsourcing non-essential work. We did that, and we have done it successfully, and now those countries are contemplating introducing it.

During the past year, £18 million of taxpayers' money has been invested to build a state-of-the-art military hangar at RAF St. Athan. It is the size of six football pitches and is purpose-built to repair 47 fast jets at any time—the entire fleet. We have massive capacity, a work force who have broken all the records for productivity and efficiency gains, and a brand new hangar. Before the hangar was finished, and on the spurious notion that the RAF had all of a sudden invented a need for a deep repair capability in their services to move forward—God knows in what scenario—at times of crisis, the Minister announced that he would split up all the work. The work will now be handed back.

The Minister and the Department are in danger of making the biggest mistake they have made since this Government took on responsibility for defence. Until now, they have been more or less on the right course. I asked the Auditor General to investigate the expenditure, as I believed that it was my duty as a Member of this House to do so, and I am delighted that the Defence Committee will investigate the matter as a result of the letter that I wrote to it.

The decision is bad news for the south Wales economy. It will devastate our aerospace industry for the reasons that I have already given, and it will destroy the training base. The provision for the training colleges sector to train apprentices at the facility will end, as it is dependent on RAF St. Athan and DARA to supply the mainstay of apprentices, and companies such as British Airways Maintenance Cardiff, which carries out major repair and overhaul of private wide-bodied jets for British Airways, the British Airways avionics centre, and General Electric, which repairs engines in south Wales, will all be affected by the decision.

The chances are slim indeed that Red Dragon, which is a joint project of the Ministry and the Welsh Development Agency, will be a success. Red Dragon is in grave danger of becoming a white elephant. We could well see in the six football pitches inside the new hangar just one Hawk training jet. God knows how that can be considered an efficient use of defence expenditure.

I have not had much time to develop many of the arguments, but I hope that I have been able to give hon. Members a flavour of the grave mistake that the Government are about to make. Such a mistake could rub off on other services and provision in the military. Traditionally, the mistakes made in strategic defence reviews have not been the big visions. By and large, "Options for Change", "Front Line First", the strategic defence review and "A New Chapter" have been good visions and have garnered a consensus on where we ought to be going vis-à-vis our defence policy. Where they have fallen down is in the detail, the application and the failure to implement reconfiguration of regiments, organisations and resources. The resulting horse-trading ends up in death by a thousand cuts and huge gaps in military capability.

The decision smacks exactly of horse-trading. I know that my right hon. Friend has had a difficult job persuading the RAF to rationalise, given its new front-line objectives. We will have fewer aircrew and fast jets. We hope that we will have a bigger capability. I must tell him that this is not the way to go about delivering the capability. People in blue uniform would never have joined the RAF if they had known that they would become factory workers. Speak to the workers—the civilians—at St. Athan, almost half of whom are ex-RAF. They did not join the RAF to become garage mechanics permanently based in factories. They will not operate in a commercial environment, and we will pay dearly for this decision.

The trade unions know that the decision is wrong. I understand that for the first time the national unions have come out and failed to agree with the policy. Under the partnership, the Ministry has previously had the support of the unions on every DARA proposition. The local work force and other NATO countries know that the decision is wrong. Deep down, the RAF knows that it is a mistake. I ask my right hon. Friend to think again, and if he is unable in principle to change his preferred option, for goodness' sake, if he intends to implement this strategy he should do it gradually, step by step, and ensure that at each step we see it working, with capability being maintained. We do not want another Airworks debacle—he will be familiar with that because it affected the Tornado.

I hope that I have been able to put some of my arguments across.

11.20 am

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I shall try to answer a 20-minute speech in 10 minutes, and I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) for his wholehearted advocacy on his constituents' behalf. He is to be congratulated on that, but I do not agree with the fundamental thrust of his arguments, although I recognise some of the graphic scenarios that he painted.

The background to the issue is straightforward. In 2002–03 we undertook a comprehensive end-to-end review of how logistic support was provided to our air and land forces. It looked across the whole logistics process to maximise the opportunities for improving logistic support to our forces. Its clear, fundamental aim was to achieve our target of reducing the £15.4 billion cost of logistics support by £1.4 billion by 2008 so that those savings could be invested directly in the front line. That was the overriding driver.

On support for military aircraft, the review concluded that there was both need and substantial scope for improvement in all areas: in industry, in the Defence Logistics Organisation and in all three services. That reflected the duplication of facilities across the services and in other parts of the MOD such as the Defence Aviation Repair Agency. It also reflected the fact that, with some notable exceptions, the Department and the services were not using industry modern best practice—a given fact—to drive down the cost of supporting military aircraft. The case for significant change was unarguable. It is wrong to ignore those essential features.

The review concluded that aircraft support, which comprises deep repair, scheduled maintenance and modification of aircraft—not garage work, as my hon. Friend suggested, but important technical work, whoever carries it out—could best be rationalised by concentrating facilities at existing military main operating bases.

My hon. Friend set out the background and asked whether the programme should roll forward or back, or whether a hybrid solution can be found. We tested that by having an investment appraisal. There was no predetermined outcome; we decided to examine the matter in the cold light of the information and facts in front of us. We put in place a demonstration phase, launched in September 2003, to test the end-to-end review principles and reduce risk. We also put in place at that time a formal, transparent process to evaluate the options for support infrastructure in the air environment. That was not under the counter; it was all up-front, open examination.

The investment appraisal was led and overseen by head office at the Ministry of Defence, and was conducted under the direction of the Department's senior economic adviser. All interested parties, including DARA and the services, were engaged in the investment appraisal, and there was trade union consultation throughout. As I have said, there was no predetermined outcome. The process was designed to establish the best result for defence in terms of operational effectiveness—that is what the RAF is for, not saving jobs or economic regeneration. The key platforms of Tornado GR4 and F3, Harrier GR9, and the Lynx and Sea King helicopters were addressed in detail in that examination. As my hon. Friend said, it came out with three options: forward, back or the hybrid solution.

That investment appraisal was supplemented by a subsequent affordability analysis, which identified the investment needed for each of the three options. There is no point in conceiving a new way forward if we cannot afford it. However, in order not to prejudice the required in-service date of 2006 for the upgraded Harrier GR9, the investment appraisal focused first on the options for its future depth support. I announced in March that Harrier support will concentrate forward to RAF Cottesmore. My hon. Friend is wrong about the work that is being carried out there. The first Harrier major maintenance there was completed in June 2004. No unexpected issues were experienced and the turn-round time was as planned. It was similar to a minor maintenance undertaken at the base and shorter than that experienced at DARA.

We had budgeted for the major repair to require an additional 500 man hours compared with a minor repair, but in the event only 340 additional man hours were required. No additional skills were needed, so we did not have to undertake any additional training and the Harrier pulse line team and a new joint repair organisation based at Cottesmore undertook all the necessary structural repair work. If my hon. Friend has different information—he keeps raising the matter—I need to see the facts, because as far as I am concerned, they are not as he presented them.

The completed investment appraisal and affordability analysis demonstrated that concentrating support of the Tornado GR4 aircraft forward at RAF Marham would provide best value for money compared with the alternative of concentrating backward at DARA St. Athan. In essence, the choice was either to move the aircraft to an existing main operating base for depth support or to move RAF personnel to DARA St. Athan. The latter would have meant significant up-front infrastructure costs, but either option would have meant a significant reduction in civilian posts. That was the reality. The investment appraisal and affordability analysis also showed that it would not be cost-effective to concentrate the Tornado F3 aircraft either forward or back, given that it will soon be replaced by the Typhoon.

For rotary wing aircraft, helicopters, the investment appraisal and analysis demonstrated that it would provide better value for money to concentrate depth support for the Lynx, Sea King and Chinook back to DARA Fleetlands, a civilian base, not a military base.

On 16 September, I announced my preferred way ahead, which was subject to full trade union consultation. The consultation period ended on 27 October, and I have received a formal response from the trade unions which is now under consideration. I hope to make a final decision shortly and am only a matter of days away from doing so.

I am well aware that my preferred way ahead has substantial adverse implications for DARA St. Athan and its work force, and it would be wrong to pretend otherwise. However, my hon. Friend should be in no doubt that the streamlining of our support functions is not simply an option for defence. We must move forward to streamline that support because transforming logistics through more efficient ways of working is vital if the Ministry of Defence is to make the best use of its resources.

The impact of what we are doing goes wider than DARA St. Athan. We are not sacrificing civilian jobs to protect RAF personnel. Implementation of the end-to-end review will lead to a reduction of some 1,600 RAF personnel, which forms part of the overall reduction of 7,500 set out by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 21 July when he announced force structure changes and defence change programmes. We are not protecting the light blue at the cost of civilian workers. We are making a complete examination of the way in which we deliver that support.

I am conscious that that is a hard message, and of the fact that when my father joined the RAF in 1938 the first place he went to was DARA St. Athan, because he wanted a trade and that was the best way to obtain one. He would not like to have been called a garage hand, because of the technical work that he did, although the aircraft were much simpler in those days.

To mitigate the effect, we are working with the Wales Office and the Welsh Assembly Government to consider all the options for sustaining DARA St. Athan after 2009. The Department of Trade and Industry, the Department for Transport and other Departments are working alongside us.

I am sure that my hon. Friend understands that the Ministry of Defence is obliged to deliver maximum front-line capability and to make best use of taxpayers' money. Those have been the key drivers in my preferred way ahead for air depth support. I do not believe that we have achieved one at the expense of the other. Instead, we have achieved the right balance, which will deliver the right outcome and maximum front-line capability for the RAF, the Royal Navy and the Army.

Anti-retroviral Drugs (Africa)

2 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I warmly welcome the Secretary of State for International Development to Westminster Hall. It is not often that we benefit from the highest Minister in a Department, and I think that this indicates the seriousness with which he takes his job and this subject.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): I am very grateful to the House for this opportunity to highlight an appalling situation, particularly in the presence of the Secretary of State, and to highlight again—I think for the second time in as many months—Africa's difficulties in its struggle to combat AIDS. The horrors that this relentless disease inflicts on Africa's people in so many ways—socially, demographically, economically, politically and culturally—are well known, and I do not wish to dwell on that aspect of the crisis just now.

I should like to point out recent figures provided by a 2004 United Nations AIDS report that show the scale of the crisis that Africa still faces. Many people are by now aware that AIDS has been acknowledged as the biggest threat to Africa's development and the No. 1 overall cause of death in Africa, but fewer realise that, on top of that, rates of HIV infection continue to rise in sub-Saharan Africa. Last year alone, an estimated 3 million people in the region became newly infected. The figures are worrying, and all the more so since they come after a decade of international efforts to highlight the devastating effect of AIDS, particularly in Africa.

We must ask ourselves why, after 10 years of campaigning and effort to focus world attention on the issue, only 50,000 of the 4.1 million Africans suffering from AIDS are currently receiving any treatment. That figure is so minimal that it cannot but call into question the entire premise on which the international community's efforts have hitherto been based. Worldwide efforts to generate more publicity for the AIDS pandemic have sadly failed to translate into increased drugs availability for those who need it most: those on the African continent. I want to focus on the best way of tackling that problem to ensure that victims of this terrible disease are provided with the best possible treatment in the 21st century.

The importance of anti-retroviral therapy cannot be stressed enough. Of course, that treatment is not a cure, and it presents new challenges with side effects and drug resistance, but it has dramatically reduced rates of mortality, revitalised communities and significantly improved the quality of life of people with AIDS. Most importantly, because of those drugs, AIDS is now perceived as a manageable chronic illness, rather than as a plague. Sadly, very few African countries can share in that vastly improved prognosis. Currently, the number of people receiving anti-retroviral treatment is minimal. The World Health Organisation estimates that nine out of 10 people who urgently need HIV treatment are simply not being reached. Around 5 million to 6 million people in developing countries will die in the next two years if they do not receive anti-retroviral drugs.

The greatest examples of the production of generic anti-retroviral drugs are in India and Brazil, where the cost of drugs has been successfully reduced. Mumbai in India launched the first generic anti-retroviral drug in 1994 and since then, India has had great success in developing combinations of that original drug. Brazil, meanwhile, is now home to up to a third of all people being treated for AIDS and has successfully reduced its HIV/AIDS related deaths by more than 85 per cent.—a laudable figure.

Furthermore, the Brazilian Government have estimated that anti-retroviral drugs have made savings of about $2.2 billion in hospital care that would otherwise have been needed by people living with HIV. The other major advantage of that treatment is the opportunity it creates to help prevent HIV transmission by encouraging many more people to learn their HIV status. Those countries with success stories are proof that many more people are willing to learn their HIV status when there is the promise of treatment at the end of it.

Above all, the abiding lesson to take away from countries such as Brazil is the vital importance of the production of generic drugs. It lowers the cost of anti-retroviral therapy and, in doing so, increases the numbers of people able to participate in treatment. I concede that there has been movement in the right direction. However, sadly, the prices that multinational pharmaceutical companies charge for those drugs remains way beyond the affordability of those in developing countries. Africa is all too familiar with that situation, and it must change.

A non-profitable drugs solution to the AIDS crisis in Africa is urgently needed—a solution that has nothing to do with self-interest and everything to do with improving the lives of Africa's AIDS victims. The three-by-five initiative, which was launched by the World Health Organisation and UNAIDS in September 2003, is a perfect example of that. The aim is to provide anti-retrovirals to 3 million people in developing countries by the end of 2005, and the initiative is part of a global movement to mobilise support for AIDS treatment. It is crucial that Africa is made a primary focus of such campaigns, and I would welcome the Secretary of State's support for and comments on that.

With the help of non-governmental organisations, such as the World Health Organisation, African nations can really start to advance their management of the disease. One hopeful advantage for Africa, arising from the successful use of generic drugs in Brazil, is the big advance in co-operation between continents. The 2004 UNAIDS report states:

> "Co-operation continues to increase between those countries with anti-retroviral manufacturing capacity and those in Africa wishing to set up local production facilities."

It is vital to exploit that attitude of preparedness among Africans, to allow them to move on to the next phase in tackling AIDS.

Some African countries have already made significant advances in tackling AIDS—for example, Uganda. The success of that nation highlights the crucial importance of generic competition. In that country, despite the fact that the big five pharmaceutical companies had agreed under the accelerated access initiative to reduce the price of anti-retrovirals, the introduction of generic equivalents from India in October 2000 led to a dramatic fall in the price of the brand-name medicines.

The conclusions of an Oxfam survey report reinforce the need for generic competition. The report discovered that, when generic medicines entered the market, the price of patented medicines fell dramatically. Competition will therefore provide an enormous boost to the accessibility of anti-retrovirals. The report also drew attention to the urgent need to fund health services to deliver treatment. The Secretary of State is nodding—I hope in agreement—because that is an absolutely key part of the argument. The funding of those essential services should go hand-in-hand with massive cuts in prices. The Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria provides opportunities for countries such as Uganda to deliver comprehensive programmes, which include treatments using anti-retrovirals. Those health services must be introduced into many more African nations if progress is really to take place.

Naturally, it would be naive to imagine that every African nation is at the same stage of readiness to begin drug production. Some face huge internal obstacles, as one New Scientist report pointed out:

> "Some developing countries do not even have the commitment to mobilise national funds to fight the problem."

The South African political system is an example of exactly that kind of difficulty. We all know that, largely because of the personal effects of AIDS on close members of his family, Chief Buthelezi is much more open than President Mbeki, who seems to live in a world of his own on the question of AIDS. Some of his pronouncements on South Africa's AIDS problem beggar belief.

Such political reticence to stand up and confront the truth about AIDS too often translates into a lack of practical support to put in place vital infrastructure components. Unless Governments are committed to providing efficient distribution systems, the benefits of increased drug production will be unattainable to those most in need in isolated communities. The international community and the WHO must therefore remember the need to focus on a political evolution in some places, as well as on a technological one. Attitudes must change before the advances of drug production can begin to take real effect.

My final thought is an extension of that last point. In a speech to the Commission for Africa on 7 October 2004, Bob Geldof spoke about the importance of addressing local cultures. While that may seem unconnected, there is a valuable point to make. Whereas westerners are more likely to seek a medical or a biological explanation of a problem, Africans tend to seek one that is spiritual or politically related. Strategies that do not address local culture will fail. For example, one large AIDS-testing scheme among pregnant women found that only 30 per cent. returned after the birth of their child to get the results. The test did not seem relevant to their needs, nor did it offer sufficient incentive to return, in the form of treatment, to those who tested positive. The answer to that is, naturally, to provide people with an incentive to return through proper drug production and availability. Alongside that, we must ensure that people want to receive treatment. Otherwise, all our efforts will be in vain.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) on securing this debate on a critical issue. I am pleased that we have the opportunity to return to the issue of HIV/AIDS in Africa on so many occasions.

[Tom Brake]

I shall focus on the report produced by African AIDS Action, with which I know the Secretary of State is familiar. I commend African AIDS Action for the persistence—in a positive sense—with which it has pushed the idea and for obtaining responses from the Government, including a clear statement of where they stand on the issue.

African AIDS Action helpfully set out at the beginning of its report some of the statistics, which it is worth repeating to remind us of the scale of the problem. Last year, AIDS killed 10 times more Africans than did all the armed conflicts in Africa combined. It is now the leading cause of death among Africans of all ages. Africa is home to 70 per cent. of adults and 80 per cent. of children living with HIV worldwide. In African countries, between one fifth and one third of children have already lost one or both parents to AIDS.

Some 40 million children in Africa are expected to be orphaned by the disease. In 2001, 3.4 million new infections occurred in sub-Saharan Africa. A total of 28.5 million Africans are living with HIV/AIDS in the region. Fewer than 30,000 of them—0.1 per cent. or one in a thousand—are getting treated with anti-retroviral drugs. Those statistics clearly illustrate why African AIDS Action and other organisations are pressing as hard as they can to ensure that a much larger volume of ARVs is made available in Africa for HIV/AIDS sufferers.

African AIDS Action—I shall call it AAA from now on, to avoid repeating myself—aims to produce large quantities of essential anti-AIDS drugs and to price them at an affordable level so that Africans, assisted by the international community, can have universal free access to HIV treatment. It considers itself an humanitarian, not-for-profit mission. It has no intention of seeking profits as conventional pharmaceutical manufacturers do, and it believes that it will be able to make significant cuts to the price and to reduce it to an historical low. We can all agree with those objectives. I thank the Secretary of State for his very detailed reply to my letter to him on this subject. I accept that there may be questions about whether AAA's aims can be achieved on this scale and within the proposed time frame, but I think that the objectives are sound.

The AAA document clearly sets out where it sees its target market, which it has identified in theory as the 28.5 million HIV-positive Africans. Given the number of countries that AAA believes to be in a position to acquire the drugs, however, the scale will be much smaller. It will initially focus its efforts on a core group of countries that it has identified as having a very high level of political commitment to tackling the HIV/AIDS problem, without which there is no point in trying to get drugs to those markets, but it will also focus on countries where the per capita income is more than $500 a year and there is therefore the potential to pay for the drugs.

Clearly, there are doubts, which I am sure the Secretary of State will set out when he responds. To a certain extent, however, AAA's aims have already been achieved, although perhaps not on the same scale, in Thailand and Brazil. In Thailand, the Government Pharmaceutical Organisation produces seven ARV preparations that are two to 25 times cheaper than the cheapest brand equivalents. The use of generic drugs has also allowed the treatment programme to expand more than eightfold in the past three years, with only a 40 per cent. increase in the budget.

Médecins sans Frontières has identified several assets that Thailand has in its favour: a public health system that works well and that has trained doctors—an area that the Government and other organisations believe to be a priority; strong political resolve to combat the AIDS problem; and capability of producing its own ARV medication at a reasonable cost.

Similar things have been achieved in Brazil, where manufacturing laboratories have developed generic ARV drugs. Incidentally, Brazil is promoting the transfer of technology, and I will be interested to hear from the Secretary of State whether he has had any contact with Brazil about the offer that it has made; I understand that it has signed undertakings or agreements with a number of English-speaking countries in Africa, such as Namibia, Zimbabwe, South Africa and Kenya. Brazil has seen one of the most significant drops in the price of drugs produced domestically by private national companies and especially by public manufacturing bodies, and elements of its success story may be relevant to producing drugs in Africa.

I wrote to the Secretary of State about this matter on 8 September and received a detailed reply, for which I thank him, on 13 October. I apologise if I have incorrectly given the impression that AAA met a Minister of State. I understand that that is not the case, although it has met officials from the Department for International Development. I thought that I should correct that point on the record. In his letter, the Secretary of State sets out his concerns about the AAA proposal. The Government have concerns about potential intellectual property challenges, the AAA market forecasts and its six-month production target for producing ARVs for 7.7 million people.

A separate study initiated by the Department also identified problems associated with achieving international quality standards, with a dependence on imported active pharmaceutical ingredients and with the manufacturing capacity that exists in most developing countries, although, as I said, in Thailand and Brazil there seems to be an indigenous manufacturing capacity that is delivering a substantial quantity of drugs to their own domestic markets. I would be interested to know whether the Department has been able to analyse whether there are ways in which Brazil and Thailand have gone about the production of ARVs that would be relevant to Africa and might be relevant to AAA's proposal.

The Secretary of State also refers in his letter to AAA being provided with additional information about alternative funding sources. I hope that he will expand a little on what alternative funding sources might be available for such initiatives.

I also received a briefing from GlaxoSmithKline, and I want to highlight something that I anticipate that the Secretary of State will also emphasise: the importance of health care infrastructure and resources. If there are no medical staff on the ground to deliver ARVs, simply producing them will not be of assistance. One would expect GSK to highlight that issue, but surely those two things can be progressed in parallel and we can work with the health care infrastructure in a country at the same time as trying to introduce some locally produced ARVs that could be distributed through that strengthened health care infrastructure. AAA needs to respond to that issue and to say how it sees ARVs being delivered, even in the limited number of countries that have been identified, if the health care infrastructure is not there to support the distribution.

In conclusion, I want to ask the Secretary of State a couple of questions. First, what further dialogue does his Department intend to have with AAA on its proposal? Secondly, will his Department be able to work with AAA to address the genuine concerns that he has set out, such as achieving international quality standards? I am sure that, working with the Department, those are the sort of issues that could be satisfactorily addressed.

The scale of the HIV/AIDS pandemic requires the international community to investigate all possible avenues. The production of ARVs in Africa, as set out by AAA, may have the potential to deliver significant quantities of cheap ARVs. I hope that the Secretary of State will make it clear that he does not consider that option a dead end.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am advised that there may be two Divisions in the House at 2.30. I inform hon. Members so that they can plan accordingly. Clearly, we shall have to wait for two votes—if there are two—but depending on how long the first takes, I suggest that we return to Westminster Hall 10 minutes after the second vote. Given the lack of hon. Members who wish to speak on this important matter, we should be able to complete the debate by the appropriate time of half-past 3. Of course, I do not wish to shorten what the Secretary of State has to say, because of the critical nature of the subject.

2.25 pm

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): Thank you for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It looks as though I shall be cut off in my prime, but the timing may work in such a way that we can all say what we want to say. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) for initiating the debate. The issue is enormously important; it affects tens of millions of people. As you point out, Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is a pity that more hon. Members are not present to discuss it, but what we lack in quantity we certainly have in quality this afternoon.

The issue of AIDS and HIV in sub-Saharan Africa is central to our attempts to lift that continent out of poverty, and it rightly forms a central plank of the millennium development goals. Millennium development goal 6 aims:

> "To combat HIV/AIDS, malaria and other diseases."

Target 7 of that goal is even more explicit:

> "To have halted and begun to reverse the spread of HIV/AIDS by 2015."

That is a sensible and necessary goal, but sadly—let us face the truth—there appears to be no chance of meeting it at the moment on current trends. That shows the scale of the problem that we face.

The worldwide epidemic is worsening. In sub-Saharan Africa, AIDS is the leading cause of death, as my hon. Friend the Member for East Devon said. A total of 25 million people there have it, 2.2 million people died from it last year and a further 3 million became infected with it. By any yardstick those are horrifying figures, but they become even more so when one examines the sort of people affected. They are often the most productive people, the ones who are embarking on their working life or who are already employed and are the breadwinners for their families. The destructive effect of the disease on both family life and the economic life of many African countries is such that it undermines any attempt to build economic growth and to lift those countries out of poverty.

Sadly, while progress is being made in some countries—for example, Uganda—progress in tackling the disease globally is pathetically patchy. Despite the very good intentions of those involved—I fully respect the sincerity of the Secretary of State in all that he is doing—I fear that we are hardly scratching the surface of the problem. Often, at international community level, we are engaging in piecemeal schemes on a scale that is utterly inadequate. Whatever the opposite is of using a sledgehammer to crack a nut, that is it.

I read on page 3 of the Department for International Development factsheet on AIDS that drugs to treat AIDS—they get a one-line mention—are > "far beyond the means of most sufferers".

Although undeniably true, that is a stark statement. I am afraid that the international community will fall woefully short of achieving the target of treating 3 million people by 2005.

Any comprehensive policy will entail education, treatment and cure. Much that has been said and much that I say today will, I hope, enjoy support on both sides of the House. We all recognise the complexity of the problem that we face and its many facets. Today, we are concentrating on treatment, which, in itself, is a hugely complex area of debate with important differences of opinion about patented or generic drug production. It is also true that not all infected people require anti-retroviral drugs, but most do.

Most of those who do need ARVs, if they get them, can convert their death sentence into a lifelong illness. It is probably an exaggeration to say that even 100,000 people in Africa are being treated with ARVs, and most of those are in South Africa, so hardly 0.1 per cent. are receiving treatment. We are not watching failure; we have a ringside seat at an unfolding catastrophe. DFID's factsheet speaks of a > "lack of action and funding" at international level, which is what we are trying to overcome.

The agreement signed in 2001 as part of the Doha round of WTO talks—the declaration on trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights and public health, which is known as TRIPS—stated that public health takes priority over private patents, which is an important landmark in respect of ARV production and the use of generics.

2.30 pm

Sitting suspended for Divisions in the House.

2.54 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Duncan: Since 2001, various countries have taken advantage of the clause that allows Governments to use compulsory licences to override patents on public health grounds.

Both the Government and the EU supported the implementation of the declaration. While I appreciate the sensitivities of this subject and the complexities of the issue, I think it right that we recognise the possibilities offered by the declaration. The key issue remaining, however, was that TRIPS still restricted drug-producing countries from producing and exporting generic medicines to countries that do not have the domestic capacity to produce them, even if their Governments were to make use of compulsory licences. An agreement was reached in 2003, but it is fair to say that it is complex, requiring importing and exporting countries to issue compulsory licences. However, that solution for dealing with the competing rights and arguments is the best that has been reached so far, and it is surely right that we explore how it works in practice and whether it delivers the improvements in public health that we all seek.

Let us first consider the costs. The cost of treatment for AIDS used to be a prohibitive $10,000 a year. It is now anything from $200 to $400. That is only $1 a day, but it is $1 a day for those who have only $1 a day. Various options and theses are advanced about how best to address the issue and overcome the financial constraints under which many African economies labour. For instance, given the background that I have outlined, can they not simply import from existing producers, using the compulsory licensing scheme? It is certainly right to test that option, which may yet work. Simplification of the compulsory licensing rules may offer the best way forward. I would appreciate hearing the Secretary of State's views on that, but perhaps it is also right that we consider some other alternatives.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Devon pointed out that Brazil has achieved an 85 per cent. reduction in AIDS-related deaths by establishing local production of ARV drugs. I do not presume to offer a comprehensive solution today—that has eluded everyone for a long time—but I hope that we can consider some options today and widen the debate on the subject.

One option that was forcefully expressed to me recently was also detailed today by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake). It has been promoted by the charity African AIDS Action, which plans to focus on locally produced ARVs in Africa. The logic of the case, as it was put to me, is to ring-fence a production capability for the area of greatest need, thereby avoiding all the inherent problems of cross-border trade. The plan—the objective—is to make ARVs locally, for local use.

Conventional wisdom says that 50 million people and a gross domestic product of $100 million are necessary for such a production facility to be viable, but I would argue that that is not applicable in this case. We must apply some unconventional wisdom to abnormal economic circumstances. What is needed is not-for-profit production combined with international funding, so that those on $1 a day can win access to the drugs that they so desperately need.

At present, ARVs can be produced at a far lower cost than ever before and there is massive need, but the extreme demand is not accompanied by the necessary purchasing power among the needy. A key policy option would be to bridge that gap by combining the most economic production of ARVs with a dramatic extension of the ability of patients to pay for them.

Like other hon. Members, I find African AIDS Action's case interesting. I look forward to the Secretary of State's response. I fully appreciate the problems inherent in such a proposal; but, equally, I can understand the need for some original thought if we are to address this massive problem. We should explore every option, and that seems a cogent one.

I also fully appreciate that drugs must be distributed once they are made and that patients need proper instruction in how to take them and proper diagnosis in the first place to determine which drugs they need. One of the greatest problems with focusing on generic production in Africa is that not many African countries have the necessary health infrastructure to carry out diagnoses, advise patients and deliver the medicines to the people who need them. However, such problems do not negate the basic concept of producing ARVs locally in Africa. We must be willing to invest, in parallel, in the production of the necessary drugs to treat AIDS and in the infrastructure needed to deliver them to patients.

The call for an African-based production facility puts the spotlight on the efficacy of the Department's entire AIDS assistance strategy. I hope that the Secretary of State will be able to comment not just on the specific suggestions that we have made today, but in broader terms on his Department's strategy for tackling AIDS and the ways in which our forthcoming presidencies of both the EU and the G8 might best be used to drive forward the fight against this dreadful disease.

I well remember that we debated this important subject a little over a month ago, but I am sure that the Secretary of State would agree that we must continue to debate it whenever the opportunity arises and that we must deliver results by taking effective action on the ground. How we approach that dreadful challenge will have a profound effect on how our world develops over the coming decades. The volume production of ARV drugs that can be delivered to the people in the numbers in which they are needed could make an enormous difference to the future health and prosperity of the world.

3 pm

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): I echo the remarks of the hon. Members for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) and for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) in congratulating the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) on having picked this subject and secured this debate. It is his second contribution on this subject in the past month, and I congratulate him also on an extremely clear and cogent speech about what is literally a matter of life and death.

The hon. Member for East Devon asked the right question: why have we not made more progress, given that AIDS is—I agree with him completely on this—the single biggest threat to development? That is certainly true in sub-Saharan Africa, not only because of what AIDS is doing, but because it is the part of the world where we are making least progress towards achieving the millennium development goals. Doing something about AIDS in Africa is essential to enabling that continent to progress.

I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman that a lack of progress calls into question everything that we have done until now, because many of the things that we have done hold true. He is right to say that we must ask ourselves what more we can do and how we can do it better. That is why I welcome the debate, which is a chance for us collectively to explore the nature of the challenges that we face and the most effective measures to take, while acknowledging that the problem is complex and requires action on several fronts.

That is the framework within which I want to set my replies. If it were a question merely of doing one thing, as if development as a whole were just a question of aid, the problem would be very easy to fix if one could raise the cash. It is not just a question doing that; it is about action on a number of fronts.

Like other hon. Members, I do not propose to go over the statistics on the scale of the challenge, because we did so fully in the debate in the main Chamber not that long ago. I begin by reminding Members of the steps that the Government have taken. On World Aids Day—1 December last year—we published the "Call for Action on HIV/AIDS", a deliberate call to us and to others to do more, and an invitation to people who are interested in the subject to send us their views and comments on what we should do.

When we published the UK strategy in July, with its commitment to spend £1.5 billion on the fight against AIDS over the next three years, one commitment was to set aside £150 million to support orphans and vulnerable children. I advance that as an example of the Government listening, because one point that came across very clearly from the consultation was that people did not think that enough was being done for orphans and vulnerable children. I hope that that illustrates the willingness of the Department and myself to listen and to respond.

The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton rightly made a point about our G8 presidency. The UK cannot make Africa one of the two centrepieces of its G8 presidency without putting AIDS at the heart of that effort. We are talking about a human tragedy and the impact on the economy of a whole productive generation being in the process of dying. With the older generation looking after the younger generation, they are deprived twice over.

It is a huge task getting the increased effort, energy, money and willingness from the international community to work together in the way that is most effective. I see that as the biggest single challenge that we have, not just for the G8 presidency, but in the context of what will come out of the Sachs report, the Commission for Africa report and the UN millennium summit, and it will form the main opportunity for making 2005 a development year.

No one will argue with the fact that AIDS is a global emergency that requires an emergency response. At the same time, we have to ensure that our schemes to support developing countries themselves in tackling the epidemic are efficient and sustainable over the long term, and that they manage to combine the effort, interest, enthusiasm and money of the international community with building the structures to make the schemes work. That is why we bat on endlessly about harmonisation. We must find the most effective way of bringing all the effort together, which is why the UK has been such a strong supporter of the "three ones"—one plan, one body with responsibility in any country and one way of monitoring progress.

We offer, and will offer in future, substantial support to the fight against AIDS in Africa, and I now turn specifically to anti-retrovirals. We are committed to increasing access to medicines for people in poor countries. One change that I made shortly after becoming Secretary of State for International Development was to make it absolutely clear that DFID was a strong supporter of treatment. We should acknowledge that there has always been debate about the fact that, although there must be treatment, there must also be a mechanism for delivering it. One will not work without the other, and we must make progress on both fronts.

We have been working with pharmaceutical companies and others to try to make medicines more affordable and accessible. At the end of June, we published our paper, "Increasing Access to Essential Medicines in the Developing World: UK Government Policy and Plans", which hon. Members will no doubt have seen. Several hon. Members have referred to the decisions taken through TRIPS, and in particular the agreement last August to allow countries with no capacity or insufficient capacity in their own pharmaceutical industry to import copies of patented medicines. The European Union has now published the draft regulation needed to take that forward. The TRIPS agreements are important in saying that there should not be an intellectual property bar on enabling countries that have their own production capacity and those that do not—this is what the second agreement was about—to import from elsewhere to deal with this public health emergency.

We have seen some progress on the price of drugs, and I agree with the figures given by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton. I was going to give a figure of about $300 for generic drugs, and he gave a figure of between $200 and $400. That is the average cost that we are talking about for generic medicines, but the cost remains higher for patented medicines: more like $700. However, we still see only a very small number of people having treatment, and I acknowledge the figures that the hon. Member for East Devon gave in that regard.

I turn now to local production of ARVs. Let us be straight: I welcome any steps to increase production of ARVs from all sources, including domestic companies in Africa. As has been said, competition will help to bring down the price of ARVs further, and together with others in the international community, we will then be better placed to work with developing countries to ensure that there is enough financing to support countries in buying medicines. It might be helpful for me to draw hon. Members' attention to some of the activities that are already under way or being planned, although I recognise that the process is quite complex. I shall come to that point when I talk about the specific proposal that we have received from African AIDS Action, to which the hon. Members for Carshalton and Wallington and for Rutland and Melton referred.

[Hilary Benn]

In South Africa, Aspen Pharmacare is already producing under voluntary licences from GlaxoSmithKline and Bristol Myers Squibb. In Ethiopia, Bethlehem Pharmaceuticals is preparing production under licence, working with an African NGO, the Initiative for Pharmaceutical Technology Transfer. The current state of play is that it has submitted all the necessary applications and is awaiting authorisations. Another company, Addis Pharmaceuticals, is trying to do the same in Ethiopia. In Kenya, the company Cosmos now has a voluntary licence and is looking to produce, and there are other examples in countries such as Tanzania and Nigeria. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, there is a public-private partnership between Pharmakina, a German-French company, and the German technical development agency GTZ. In Ghana, Zimbabwe and Zambia, there is a partnership with the Thai Government pharmaceutical organisation, to which reference has been made. I understand that in the case of Zambia, it is hoping eventually to sell to 13 neighbouring countries.

There are also the partnerships with the Brazilian Government to which the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington referred. My understanding is that Brazil is giving $100,000 in technology transfer grants to countries in Africa to help them to develop that generic capacity. It is important to acknowledge that there are several examples on the stocks of people trying to do exactly what the hon. Member for East Devon asked for when raising these issues for debate. Reference has also been made to the substantial generic production taking place in other parts of the world. India and Brazil were mentioned, and there are also China and Thailand. In some of those cases, work is being done with pharmaceutical companies based in Europe, the United States and Japan to try to make sure that the medicines have greater availability worldwide.

On the African AIDS Action proposal, I congratulate the organisation on its enthusiasm and ambition, but as I said in my letter to the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington, ambition needs to be achievable and practical. My first point, which is very frank, is that DFID is not in the business of pharmaceutical manufacture. Although we have done our best with our expertise and with what we have been able to call upon to offer an opinion to AAA about the proposals that it has put forward, this is not a field of particular speciality.

I make that point before I refer to what needs to happen, because we have reservations about the credibility of the proposal that has been made. Any proposal has to have a credible business plan, and pharmaceutical production is a complex business that takes quite some time. It has been suggested that the proposal can take place very quickly, and I raise this question: is it achievable in the time suggested? How quickly could production be up and running, given all the other projects that are in train, involving organisations that are trying to achieve exactly the same objectives of increasing production, helping to increase competition and helping to bring down the price to ensure that ARVs are made available much more widely than currently?

We have pointed out that there are several other sources of funding for a credible plan that is likely to work. They include national Governments. To what extent has AAA been able to talk to national Governments and to some of the big pharmaceutical and generic producers? There are also social investors, the European Community's accelerated action programme on AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria, the World Bank, the African Development Bank and the Initiative for Pharmaceutical Technology Transfer, which is an African-owned initiative under the New Partnership for Africa's Development. Our officials have asked African AIDS Action about those potential alternative sources of finance.

Mr. Alan Duncan: On the crucial point of the concept that is being proposed, what would happen if we were to set ourselves the objective, unrealistic though it may be at the moment, of getting treatment to every sufferer of HIV who needs it? Is the global problem at the moment a limit on the productive capacity of the pharmaceutical companies or the absence of funding to pay for people to get the drugs, or both?

Hilary Benn: The hon. Gentleman asks an important question. It anticipates neatly the question that I was coming to: what are the obstacles to making further progress on treatment? In part, they are the two things to which he alluded in his question. I shall put them in the following order, which is not an order of priority.

First, we need more nurses, more doctors and more of a health care service that has the capacity to administer the drugs. As part of that, we need testing. That point was acknowledged earlier. Unless there is testing and people know their HIV status, we will not be in a position to make an effective decision about whether they need treatment. Treatment must also be available. If it is available, people are more likely to come forward to be tested, because there is the possibility of getting something as a result, as opposed to knowing that they are HIV-positive but not being able to do much about it. That is not a great incentive to come forward.

Secondly, the capacity to monitor people's CD4 status is also needed. There are two ways of approaching that issue. In making this point, I hasten to point out that I am not a medical expert. I understand that syndromic management means looking at the patient and saying, "You look pretty ill. We think this is what you've got, but we'll give you some anti-retrovirals." There is also management based on CD4 monitoring, which makes a medical assessment of whether somebody is at the point in their illness where ARVs would be appropriate. That looks at the effective operation or otherwise of the immune system. The danger of the first approach is that it may involve giving drugs to people at a point when they do not need them. There is also always concern about drug resistance developing. In other words, even if we had all the drugs that we needed tomorrow, we would need doctors, nurses, testing and monitoring to make sure that those drugs were used effectively to manage the disease in individuals. There is a need to ensure that people adhere to the drug regime.

Much progress has been made in producing combined therapies. There has been real progress on that front to make things easier for people. One combined pill that people take once a day is much better than many different pills that they must take at different times of day, which was the treatment regime when anti-retroviral treatment was first developed. We have come a long way in that respect.

Mr. Swire: The Secretary of State cites the example of people not being in a regime in which they take the drug every day as part of their treatment. Is he not also concerned at reports that some people who have been put on a course of drugs suddenly have them withdrawn because the drugs simply do not exist?

Hilary Benn: Of course I am concerned about that problem, which undermines the purpose of identifying that people have a need and of ensuring continuity of supply. A break in supply recently occurred in Nigeria, for example. Such a problem is extremely dangerous and damaging. That is why there has been movement in bringing prices down. I congratulate those who have worked hard to make that happen, including those in the pharmaceutical companies who have given a lead—we encourage as many others to follow that lead as possible—and the Global Fund, the Clinton Foundation, the Gates Foundation and others.

We need a system to ensure that, even if all the drugs were available, they could go to people where they live, at the time that they need them, with continuity of supply. That is the very point that the hon. Member for East Devon made. A system must be in place to make that work. Otherwise, drugs might sit in a warehouse, people might pinch them from the warehouse or other practical difficulties might arise. That is the difficulty that we face.

I want to deal with two other points. First, I agree completely with the point that the hon. Gentleman made about local culture in the conclusion of his speech. That is an important point. It is the reason why we are and should collectively be strong advocates of the development of policies and approaches that countries and communities themselves design for dealing with the situation. To use the terrible jargon, I am talking about country ownership. But what is country ownership about? I try hard to avoid terrible jargon wherever possible, and I am sure that the Opposition spokespeople who are present will make common cause with me on that subject, because the problem is to explain these issues in ways that people can understand.

When we say that we want to support developing countries in developing their own plans it is precisely because that is one of the ways in which we can respond to the point that the hon. Gentleman made—the fact that, in the end, the countries themselves have to deal with the epidemic. They have to design their solutions, and we have a responsibility to support them.

The first African country that I ever visited was Malawi; I did so in 2001, when I was first a junior Minister in DFID. Malawi was a desperately poor country and Justin Malewezi, the then vice-president, who had responsibility for dealing with the AIDS crisis, was debating with his advisers at that point how they might use anti-retrovirals to keep some of their population alive. Those involved were faced with an impossible choice: to whom would they give the anti-retrovirals if they did not have enough drugs and enough capacity in the system to provide them to everyone? That experience had a profound effect on me, and it is why I changed and made clear DFID's approach to treatment. It seemed odd that there was a perception that, in dealing with the crisis, we were somehow behind developing countries in Africa themselves. It is now clear that we support prevention, treatment and care in those circumstances.

My final point is that we must continue to support African countries in finding solutions and to work with them. We are giving substantial funding to the Global Fund, as well as through our own bilateral programmes. We are the second largest provider of funding over a period of long-term commitment: the figure is £250 million up to 2008. We are supporting national Governments in building capacity so that they can scale up the treatment that they are offering, for example in Ethiopia and Malawi. We will continue to work with pharmaceutical supply and distribution companies on the issues that have been raised in this extremely important debate. We will increase our AIDS spending, as we have committed ourselves to do, and we will continue to support the Global Fund and to work to ensure that the new TRIPS agreement is effectively implemented.

I give one other assurance: we will continue to reflect on what we do and how we do it, because we have one common interest in this debate. We need to ensure that the resources, effort, capacity and will of this country are put to best effect in fighting the AIDS crisis, and we have a moral obligation across the world to ensure that the collective will, money, resources and effort are used to best effect to help the largest number of people in tackling this dreadful epidemic.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the House thanks the Secretary of State for that very considered and full reply. I congratulate all those who have contributed to this excellent debate, and particularly its initiator, on what has been a positive and helpful contribution to a world problem.

James Miller

3.30 pm

Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): My constituent, James Miller, was 34 when he was killed. During a 14-year career, he had already achieved more than many film-makers would achieve in a lifetime. Documentaries that he had shot had won three Emmys, a BAFTA, five Royal Television Society awards and a Golden Nymph. Had he lived, there is no doubt that he would have gone on to be one of the pre-eminent directors of his generation. He worked in some of the world's most hostile environments, including Algeria, Bosnia, Lebanon, Sierra Leone, Sudan and Iraq. In 2001, he shot "Beneath the Veil" about the repression, terror and war of Taliban-controlled Afghanistan. That film received an Emmy, and he has just won another award at the international film festival in Los Angeles for filming and directing "Armenia: the Betrayed", with Fergal Keane, about the Armenian genocide in 1915. It was screened by the BBC last year. "Death in Gaza", the film he was making when he was killed, has been seen on Channel 4, in the USA and at film festivals around the world, where it has collected several awards and is a candidate for more.

James Miller was shot by the Israel Defence Forces in Rafah, Gaza in the occupied territories on Friday 2 May 2003, exactly 18 months ago today. To date, no one has been charged with his killing and no admissions have been made as to civil liability.

James Miller arrived in Rafah on 16 April 2003. His crew included Saira Shah, his producer, Dan Edge, and others who had worked with him before. They were making a film about the lives of children in the occupied territories. Those who worked with James, often in very dangerous conditions, can testify that he always took a precautionary approach to the crew's security. Given his background and his experience on the ground during the three weeks before his death, the team, although they were working in dangerous territory, approached security in their customary manner. They spent the evening of 2 May 2003 filming in the home of the Al Shaer family. The area where the house is located had been largely bulldozed by the Israeli army during the previous months to clear a security zone between the Palestinian houses and the Egyptian border.

During the evening of 2 May, the crew were recording the response of Najla Al Shaer to the bulldozing of neighbouring houses by the IDF. In front of the house, two bulldozers were operating with two armoured personnel carriers providing security cover for the work. During the evening, the APC soldiers were well aware that the crew were filming at the house. The soldiers shouted over to them, often in a jocular fashion, on a number of occasions. Throughout the evening a light on the veranda of the Al Shaer house remained on, so that those observing could see a film crew there. At about 9 pm, the crew were joined by a cameraman from Associated Press Television News. Not far away, a group of peace activists had been shouting at the bulldozers through a megaphone. At around 9 pm, shots were fired in the direction of the activists, and at around 10 pm there was a small explosion in a nearby building and one of the armoured personnel carriers went briefly to investigate. Thereafter, both of them switched their lights off.

By 11 pm, there having been no activity for an hour, the crew made plans to leave. They ruled out retracing their steps across the road, knowing of the danger of being shot at from an Israeli watchtower. Attracting the attention of the APCs was judged to be the safest way to leave, given that the APC crew knew that the television crew were there and had previously allowed the family to move around as long as they displayed a white flag.

James, with a torch, his colleague, Saira, and interpreter, Aboud, stepped off the veranda wearing press flak jackets and helmets with "TV" emblazoned on the front in fluorescent strips. They held a white flag with James's torch shining on it. The group was entirely visible to onlookers because of the light on the veranda behind them, and they shouted out to the APC soldiers that they were the British journalists. There were no other sounds at the time to drown their words. As they approached the APC, a single shot was fired. The crew froze so that they could be clearly identified, and continued to shout that they were British journalists.

The second, fatal shot was fired a full 13 seconds later. The pinpoint shot struck James in the only vulnerable area of his neck, between his helmet and his flak jacket. It is vital to stress that there was no fighting with Palestinians, no commotion, no noise, and really very little scope for confusion. As James Miller's mother described it to me last night:

> "This was in no sense the heat of a battle. It took the soldier 13 seconds to decide to kill James."

He was pronounced dead at some point shortly after arrival at a military hospital, and according to Saira Shah, pressure was put on her to say, falsely, that at the time of the shooting there had been Palestinian gunfire.

The subsequent sequence of events is important. The next day, 3 May, the army issued a statement that they had been dealing with an arms smuggling ring in the locality, that they had come under fire, and that James had probably been shot by Palestinians. On 4 May 2003, the army issued a further statement that James had been hit in the back of the right shoulder when he was facing an Israeli tank. However, the pathologist, Yehuda Hiss, who conducted the post mortem a few days later, concluded that James had been shot in the front of his neck.

In the days that followed, a British expert, Chris Cobb Smith, flew to Gaza and conducted a preliminary forensic investigation on behalf of the family. This included, as far as he was able to do so, gathering photographic, ballistic and diagrammatic evidence, and staging a reconstruction of events. He passed the material to the Israeli authorities. However, the investigations carried out by the Israeli military had grave shortcomings. Not only was no forensic scene analysis conducted but the area in question was shortly afterwards reduced to rubble.

It is not known when and in what circumstances soldiers from the APCs were interviewed, if at all. The rifles used by the relevant soldiers were not immediately impounded for analysis. As a result of a ballistics examination, conducted on behalf of the family on 2 June 2003, it was established that the bullet came from an M-16 rifle of the kind issued to Israeli army personnel. Under pressure from the family, the Israeli authorities were forced to take steps to secure the rifles for analysis, but this was nine weeks after the killing and it took a further two weeks for the rifles to be produced. The family were informed that 15 rifles were to be produced, but only nine were.

It is worth noting that when a soldier joins the Israel Defence Forces, he is issued with a rifle that he retains throughout his service, but the butts of the nine rifles bore consecutive serial numbers. It seems inconceivable that nine soldiers who joined the army at exactly the same time were on duty in the same unit on the night in question. As a consequence, there is a real likelihood that the military investigation into the use of firearms on 2 May will not identify who was responsible for the fatal shot.

In November 2003, the Israeli authorities completed a general command inquiry report. Although the family were led to believe that they might be given disclosure of at least some of this document, none has been forthcoming. Somewhat inexplicably, the Israelis said that the various investigation materials previously compiled by the family's experts were not used by the army investigators.

By December 2003, the family were informed that a full conclusion would be sent imminently to the judge advocate, and that he would consider possible prosecutions. In April they were told that the investigation was near completion, and in July they were told by Baroness Symons that a General Eiland had suggested a new line of inquiry which would take a few months. It is now November, but the family have still not been given an indication of the conclusions of the military police investigation, let alone access to it or to its underlying documentation. The Israeli Advocate-General has not so far co-operated with the British coroner, who is also investigating the incident.

James Miller's family have never sought to politicise the issues relating to his death, but we must understand the context. A month or so before, in much the same area, an unarmed British peace activist, Tom Hurndall, was shot by members of an IDF unit operating a security watchtower. It is to the credit of the Israeli authorities that the officer responsible for Mr. Hurndall's death has been charged with the equivalent of manslaughter. Perhaps the charge should have been murder, but charging him is, at least, progress. He and other officers have been charged with perverting the course of justice, having initially claimed that they were fighting with Palestinians.

In the view of many observers, the Israeli military is overstretched, has morale and discipline problems and is in some respects out of control. Some of the biggest problems are with Bedouin soldiers, who were those involved in James Miller's case. They are sometimes the least disciplined and some say that they are not infrequent users of hashish.

As recently as 21 October 2004, The Guardian reported that a 13-year-old schoolgirl wearing her school uniform while walking into Israel's forbidden zone at the bottom of her street carrying her satchel was shot. The schoolgirl was several hundred metres from the Israeli watchtower. Two shots caught her in the leg. She dropped her bag, tried to hobble away and fell. Even some Israeli soldiers described the platoon commander moving in closer to put two bullets in the child's head. An Israeli soldier told the newspaper:

> "The company commander approached her, shot two bullets into her, walked back towards the force, turned back to her, switched his weapon to automatic and emptied his entire magazine into her. We were in shock. We couldn't believe what he was doing. Our hearts ached for her. Just a girl of 13".

Other soldiers said that they would not serve unless the officer was dismissed. That shows that, in some units, Israeli army commanders are out of control.

In May 2003, our Foreign Secretary pledged to push the Israelis for a full, thorough and transparent investigation. What progress can the Government report into the investigation of the murder of James Miller? Has the Foreign and Commonwealth Office been given any tangible assurance from the Israelis that a full, thorough and transparent investigation is under way? Are the Government committed to assisting the Miller family and the coroner in achieving a thorough and exhaustive inquiry into the murder of James Miller?

We understand that the Israeli authorities have a prime suspect, whom they have interviewed six times. Does the Minister know whether that suspect and the other soldiers under suspicion are still serving in that troublesome area of Gaza or are suspended from duty? Can he give us any indication of when that investigation will be concluded and, specifically, whether it will be concluded within the two-year limit in which the Miller family must institute private legal proceedings, if that is the only course left to them?

It is 18 months to the day since the killing of this fine young journalist. The initial response of the Israeli authorities—first issuing misleading accounts of the cause of James's death, then failing to collect or secure evidence while it still existed—left the family, me and many others in a state of deep despair. Since then, one must acknowledge that some progress has been made. At least investigations of some sort have taken place.

This has gone on for too long. The findings of the investigations have not been disclosed and time is running out. The prosecution in Tom Hurndall's case has given hope—in my case, at least, unexpected hope—and a renewed belief that Israel listens to international opinion. However, for more than 18 months, James Miller's family have put their faith in Israel to pursue justice on their behalf. They continue to do so. Justice needs to be done and it needs to be seen to be done. Time is ticking on—particularly, as I said, in terms of that two-year deadline for a private prosecution. We all understand the difficulties and the horror of the situation in Gaza and understand that there are two sides to that question, but if Israel is to maintain any sort of international reputation or any credibility, it simply must investigate and deal with these issues of grave misconduct. I look to the Minister for an assurance that the Foreign Office, having entered into dialogue with the family over a considerable period, continues to do all that it possibly can to ensure that the Israelis come to a conclusion in a timely fashion.

3.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): I am grateful to the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey) for securing this debate. James Miller's death was a terrible tragedy, not least because, as the hon. Gentleman said, he was a brave and talented journalist.

The hon. Gentleman graphically described the events surrounding the shooting on 2 May last year, so I shall not go over them again. I share his view that justice must not only be done but be seen to be done, and I know how important it is to Mr. Miller's family and friends that the Israeli authorities carry out a full and transparent investigation into the shooting, and that the family be given access to the evidence in that investigation.

The Government have repeatedly made it clear to the Israelis that we expect them to conduct a full inquiry into the events surrounding Mr. Miller's death and to share the results with the family and us. We continue to press them on that. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary, and other Foreign Office Ministers have raised the case on numerous occasions with senior Israeli Ministers, officials and members of the Israel Defence Forces. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General is currently visiting Israel. Earlier today, he raised the cases of James Miller and Tom Hurndall in detail with the Israeli military Advocate-General. He pressed for a rapid and thorough conclusion and stressed the need for accountability and co-operation with the British coroner.

Our ambassador in Tel Aviv and other Foreign Office officials have also continued to put pressure on the Israeli authorities. I will send the hon. Gentleman a summary of all those contacts, and place copies in the Libraries of both Houses. I hope that he will agree that we have left no stone unturned in this unhappy case. By my reckoning, the matter has been raised with the Israelis on more than 25 occasions, the latest occasion being today, and at all levels in the Government from the Prime Minister downwards.

The Israeli Government have assured us that they take seriously the investigation into the shooting. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the military general command inquiry into the tragedy was completed in autumn last year, but the Israel Defence Forces have authorised a fuller, more detailed investigation by the military police. That investigation is still under way, and we are pressing for an indication of when it might be concluded.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the Miller family have made available to the Israeli authorities all the evidence that they themselves have collected, including ballistics and pathology reports. The Government have continued to press the Israeli authorities to ensure that the military police investigation is full and thorough, and we also continue to press for access by the Miller family to the evidence considered by the inquiry.

The Government have striven at every stage to keep James Miller's family fully informed of our efforts. Our embassy in Tel Aviv facilitated two visits by family members to Israel. During their most recent visit this April, officials from our embassy joined them in meetings with an adviser to the Israeli Prime Minister and with officials from the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Israel Defence Forces. The family have used their visits to press the Israeli authorities again for a full investigation.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary met the Miller family in June last year to discuss the Israeli investigation and followed up that meeting with a letter to his Israeli counterpart urging further progress. My colleague Baroness Symons has also spoken regularly to the family to update them on progress and to discuss other possible avenues for urging the Israelis to bring the investigation to a proper conclusion. I discussed the case with her last night, and she asked me to pass on her assurance that she will not let the matter drop.

The hon. Gentleman raised several points. On the Israeli soldiers who have been interviewed in the course of the investigation, the conduct of the investigation is a matter for the Israeli authorities and they remain unwilling to divulge details until it is concluded. We have not had any recent indication of when the investigation will be concluded. Last autumn, the Israelis said that the investigation would be concluded by the end of 2003. Nearly a year on, we share the hon. Gentleman's disappointment at the apparent lack of progress.

I appreciate the Miller family's concern that they are running out of time to bring a private prosecution under Israeli law. I know that the family have taken Israeli and UK legal advice on the matter. We shall continue to press the Israeli Government at every opportunity and at the most senior levels for an early conclusion. I am not in a position to comment on the coroner's process, but I understand that the coroner will likely want to wait for the outcome of the military police investigation.

Nick Harvey: The coroner in this country has been somewhat frustrated in his efforts to conduct any investigation on his own account, because inquiries that he has made of the authorities in Israel have not been answered, and indeed have been given short shrift. Is there anything that the Government can do, perhaps through the Minister's office or any other office, to encourage the Israeli authorities to co-operate with him? He has every right, and indeed a duty in international law, to conduct an investigation into the death of a British subject, and it would be wrong for the Israelis to stand in the way of such an investigation and not afford him full co-operation.

Mr. Mullin: I certainly accept that. It is likely that the coroner will be able to proceed once the results of the inquiry are available. I am sure that he would want to wait for the results of the inquiry, frustrating though that is. I understand that Lord Goldsmith, who, as I mentioned, is in Israel today, raised precisely that question of co-operation with the UK coroner with his Israeli opposite number. It remains to be seen, of course, with what result.

Let me conclude by paying tribute to the dignified way in which the Miller family have coped with James's tragic death. I appreciate that this has been a most difficult 18 months for them. Despite their loss, they have worked with courage and determination to secure from the Israeli authorities a full and transparent investigation, and access to the evidence. The Government will continue to work with them to that end.

Child Care (London)

4.10 pm

On resuming—

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): I am grateful to have the opportunity to begin to make a contribution on this important subject.

It is important to start by paying tribute to the national child care strategy and what has been achieved since 1997 with its contribution to the improvement of educational attainment and the reduction of child poverty. Those achievements are visible in my constituency, where we have four Sure Start programmes, several children's centres moving forward with the first approval of their implementation plans, two new neighbourhood nurseries opening in March next year and a number of neighbourhood nurseries initiative-funded places.

Those developments did not happen by accident, and we have had to confront Conservative-controlled councils and, in other areas, Liberal Democrat-controlled councils, which, by attempting to close nurseries, cutting voluntary service provision and reducing subsidies, have undermined what we have tried to do with Government money. It has left the Government, the London Development Agency and the Greater London authority having to plug gaps in local authority provision, and we have not been able to concentrate on building additional services.

Despite those hindrances, we stand on the brink of a new era for child care. The Government are doing nothing less than constructing a new plank of the welfare state, and we are doing so with hard evidence to support the value of the investment, whether in educational terms, as set out in the effectiveness of pre-school education study, or in economic terms, as costed by the latest PricewaterhouseCoopers study.

As well as Government investment, we are fortunate, too, in having the solid support of the Mayor of London and the Greater London authority, the London Development Agency and Association of London Government, for which child care is a priority. However, despite the achievements, vision and investment, very welcome though they are, we must recognise that the whole child care strategy is not delivering in London to the same extent as in other parts of the country. Unless we make some fundamental variations in the 10-year strategy, we will continue to lag behind in the delivery of all the benefits that child care investment can bring.

The key points are in the figures. London has the highest rate of child poverty in the country, with 38 per cent. of children living in poverty; and the figure is 53 per cent., after housing costs, in inner London. Women with children in London face a more severe employment penalty than those elsewhere. The employment rate for women without children is only slightly lower in London than elsewhere in the United Kingdom, but for women with dependent children, employment rates are substantially different. There is a 12 per cent. difference, with 53 per cent. in employment outside London, compared with 65 per cent. in London.

Many parents would prefer to work part-time while their children are very young, but opportunities for this are more limited in London than elsewhere. Nationally, 37 per cent. of women with children are working part-time; in London the figure is only 26 per cent. Parents in London are paying more for child care and they need to pay for more hours of child care, because part-time provision is less likely to be available. The average cost of a full-time day nursery place in London for a child over two years old is £148 a week—20 per cent. higher than the English average. Less than half of London's nurseries have fees for children aged two or over that fit in with the £135 ceiling for the child care element of working tax credit.

The Government explicitly recognise that problem in the Cabinet Office strategy unit report on London. The report, published in July, says that:

> "a lack of accessible and affordable childcare is an important barrier to work" in London, with the higher cost of child care not being reflected in the tax credit system. The report calculates that a London parent with full tax credit entitlement would have to meet £73 a week of their child care costs.

4.15 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.25 pm

On resuming—

Ms Buck: I was referring to the Government's Cabinet Office strategy unit report on London and the fact that it had made it clear that the higher costs of child care in the capital are not reflected in the tax credit system. It calculates that a London parent with full tax credit entitlement would have to meet £73 a week of their child care needs themselves, compared with £36 a week elsewhere in the country.

The report also acknowledges that tax credits do not provide support for more than two children and that that disproportionately affects some minority ethnic groups, along with others who have larger families. Figures cited in the report show that 28 per cent. of lone parents in London declare themselves unable to afford child care at all and a further 13 per cent. are unable to find suitable child care.

Research by a new deal for lone parents pilot identified what it called the added logistics problem of organising child care. The report stated that > "the biggest issue for working mothers was planning and organising the triangular journey involved in leaving home, dropping off children at childcare providers and travelling to work at another location".

It added that that was

> "even more difficult in areas like London".

Underpinning those conclusions is the reality of unmet need for child care provision. The latest Ofsted figures appear to show child care provision in London falling behind the national average in terms of new places. The number of child minders is lower in London: 8.6 per cent. of under-fives have access to a child minder compared with 11.2 per cent. across England.

The problem of sustainability emerges in London in particular. The issue is at the heart of the affordability and cost dilemma and has been raised by people ranging from those involved with the neighbourhood nurseries initiative right through to those involved with voluntary organisations such as the Pre-School Learning Alliance.

The 10-year child care plan provides an opportunity to develop a vision of what we would like to see in London in 2015 in the key areas of child care and early years, and the related areas of employment and child poverty. We can and should congratulate the Government on what has been achieved so far, but it is precisely because of those achievements that we should not be afraid to look afresh at the scale of the challenge. The strategy must deal with the on-the-ground realities of London, offer a vision of the future and set out the steps that must be taken to turn the vision into reality.

First, the 10-year strategy needs to accommodate the reality of what will happen whatever we do. The most important example is population increase. The Greater London authority population projections show that London will have 87,000 more children under the age of five by 2015, compared with a 2001 base. London will account for the great bulk of growth in that age group at national level. We are therefore in real danger of being behind the curve in such areas as housing provision and pre-school place development. That must not be allowed to happen when it comes to working out the investment for additional child care places. In addition, London's child population will continue to become even more diverse over the period. Diversity need not correlate with poverty and unemployment, but it can easily do so if the right policy responses are not made.

Secondly, the strategy needs to accommodate our aspirations. Clearly, we hope that in 2015 London will be a much less unequal city for children, as the Government's child poverty strategy reduces income disparities. Child poverty in London will probably remain above the national average, but the national average could be far lower and the gaps could have narrowed considerably. Part of the process will involve a significant reduction in the scale of economic disparities between ethnic groups. Female employment rates in London will be far closer to the national average, if we get things right, as the employment outcomes of women with dependent children improve. The gender pay gap in London will have begun to reduce as women with children find it easier to maintain their career paths.

On the pressures that mobility and diversity can put on a city's social fabric, if we are ambitious and imaginative, it will be through children and parents, who all have in common a desire for the best for their children, that we can strengthen neighbourhoods and build social cohesion. However, for that vision to become reality we will need more parents in London to be in employment and the number of children in workless households to have fallen significantly. That will mean that the choices available to parents of young children will need to have improved. There will need to be greater flexibility in employment, improved parental leave and expanded child care and early-years provision. Benefits for those unable to work will also need to increase faster than median incomes, but increased employment will continue to be the main driver of poverty reduction.

Children's centres will also need to be sufficiently real and comprehensive to provide a focus for neighbourhoods. The specific development in child care from the 10-year strategy for which we will be looking in London to help us to ensure that vision becomes reality are that every child under school age will have access to a children's centre, providing high-quality, flexible care and early-years education, and acting as a hub for high-quality child-minding services. The existing universal entitlement is 12 and a half hours' nursery education a week for three and four-year-olds. One option for children's centres will be to expand that universal entitlement and extend it to other age groups under five, to provide at least 20 hours of free care a week for all children, regardless of whether their parents are working. Parents who are working would then be able to purchase additional hours of care with fees based on ability to pay, meaning that parents could purchase the package of care that best suits their requirements in terms of hours and mix of provision in their area of residence.

The cost of providing child care services will have increased by 2015, but quality improvements will mean that that represents an improvement in value for money. However, the funding system will have to be reformed to ensure that large families are no longer penalised in terms of child care support. Funding should increasingly shift towards a subsidy to providers, given the inherent difficulties of varying a national flat-rate tax credit scheme to accommodate sharp regional variation. Alternatively, an expanded and more generous child care tax credit would ensure access for those on all income levels. There are various options for refining the tax credit, which I shall not go into in detail; they are thoroughly developed in representations that the Association of London Government, the Greater London authority and I have previously made to the Government. We have never been able to convince the Government of the need for a regional variation in the tax credit as a fundamental principle, so we will almost certainly need to focus predominantly on increasing the supply side for affordability.

We will expect providers to be part-funded to offer flexible services for younger children. Funding will be required to support the work force model, as labour costs will otherwise push costs above affordability thresholds. We look for funding recognition to be given to support providers, so that affordable options can be given to parents of under-threes who, whether through choice or as a result of unemployment, are out of the work force. Although it is reasonable not to provide full-time day care for such groups, it is not in the interests of the parent or the child, especially among more vulnerable parents and communities such as black and minority ethnic communities, to make child care so dependent on entry into the labour market that it is, to all intents and purposes, a cliff edge, and those not in work are unable to access any meaningful provision until their child turns three.

We will expect child care and early-years education increasingly to be delivered by highly qualified staff. The introduction of stable career progression will lead to far lower rates of staff turnover, and those entering the profession with no qualifications should have access to clear career progression paths. Rates of pay will increase in recognition of the improved skills base, and a London weighting system will ensure that children's centres are a viable career option for parents in the capital.

The expansion of the child care and early years work force will itself lead to a step change in the availability of flexible, locally based employment in London. If we get that right, the knock-on effect will be the gradual emergence of improvements in local economies, especially in some of our more deprived communities. A comprehensive programme of training provision through the learning and skills councils and the London Development Agency, coupled with an active local recruitment policy on the part of providers, will ensure that new opportunities are overwhelmingly taken up by local residents, many of whom will have previously been out of the labour market. New residential developments in London will incorporate child care and early-years facilities as essential social infrastructure as a matter of course.

There should be no embarrassment, and no defensiveness, on the part of the Departments—the Department for Education and Skills or the Treasury—as they have achieved so much, starting from such a low base in 1997. However, I fear that defensiveness might prevent us from accepting the fact that there is a substantial regional shortfall in the provision, and the scale of affordability, of child care. That is having a distinct effect in holding back employment opportunities for parents as a whole, and for lone parents and the most deprived in particular.

I hope that the 10-year strategy will not disappoint Londoners. Although we face a real challenge, if we do not meet it we will not meet our lone parent employment targets or our child poverty reduction targets across the country as a whole. Much will ride on the strategy. I hope that the Minister will respond as far as he can this afternoon, but I hope primarily for an assurance that my points will be taken seriously and that the 10-year strategy will give us a chance to deliver on some of them.

4.35 pm

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck), not just on securing the debate but on the one-woman campaign that she has waged during the past seven years to ensure that the needs of Londoners in respect of child care, housing and employment are recognised in a suitable way. I congratulate her on the passion with which she addresses the issues and the facts and research that she uses to back up many of her arguments.

I hope that, on one score, I can disabuse my hon. Friend and the watching millions of the notion that there is any defensiveness on the part of the Government. My appearance testifies to the confidence with which the whole Department wants to address the issues. She will know that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children, Young People and Families would have been here but for the fact that, as we speak, she is appearing on the Floor of the House. I hope that my hon. Friend does not take the presence of such a junior Minister as myself as a reflection of the issue's not being made a priority. Instead, I hope that she sees it as an example of joined-up government that the Minister for School Standards takes the issue seriously.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the progress that has been made in developing a serious child care offer for children and parents is significant. I was struck, when examining the extensive research that was carried out for this debate, to see the investment that has gone on in London. To consider just one aspect of the child care offer, of 524 Sure Start programmes throughout the country, 96 are in London boroughs, with more than half of all London boroughs having more than three programmes.

The revenue grant for local programmes working with children under four and their families in the most disadvantaged areas in London alone totals nearly £150 million between 2004 and 2006. London Sure Start local programmes have been allocated higher levels of capital, perhaps reflecting some of the costing issues alluded to by my hon. Friend. More than £165 million of capital has been allocated through local programmes in children's centres, with a further £22.5 million allocated to neighbourhood nurseries in London. I agree with her that such investment, and the seriousness with which staffing and related issues have been taken in respect of under-fives and child care for youngsters over five but not yet independent adults is really significant.

My hon. Friend said that this is a new frontier for the welfare state, which is a good way of considering the challenge that faces us. The relationship between local and central Government, and our interventions to support families and the choices that they make about how to bring up their children, is an issue that has not been addressed in a holistic and serious way by the welfare state since 1945. She is right to say that that challenges the ingenuity and innovation of central and local government. If we are to extend security and opportunity, the child care offer should be at the heart of the welfare state.

In that context, the Chancellor's announcements in the Budget concerning the long-term commitment to funding for Sure Start—an extra £769 million between now and 2007–08—is significant and is a demonstration of the commitment the Government have and the voices we have listened to. Before I deal with my hon. Friend's point about the importance of recognising the regional dimension to the child care strategy, it is worth dwelling for a moment on two aspects of the 10-year strategy that she highlighted. First, there is a need to balance choice and investment—without investment, there is no choice. Although we have been proud of the fact that the pledge to deliver a nursery place for all three and four-year-olds has been delivered, it is up to parents whether they take account of that. She made the point that we have to deliver a range of provision in a range of settings if we are to meet the aspirations of all families. That is an important starting point.

My hon. Friend stressed the need to balance the demand and supply sides of the equation. Our investment has to go in on both sides. We must ensure that the investment is in the hands of families so that they are able to make their choices. That is the purpose of the tax credit system. Equally, we must ensure that the supply side—the range of provision and the staffing of that provision—is of sufficient quality that parents have the confidence to proceed.

[Mr. David Miliband]

The whole Government are working on the 10-year child care strategy that provides the focus for this debate, and it might help my hon. Friend if I make a couple of points about how we are proceeding. We see four key principles at the heart of the strategy. First, the principle of early intervention is essential if we are to obtain the sort of change that we need—a radically improving universal and specialist service for those at risk. Secondly, parenting support needs to be allied to statutory services if we are to obtain the necessary provision. Thirdly, schools should be resources for a child care strategy, not somehow enemies of the strategy, operating separately from it. Fourthly, the range of professional expertise that exists in local government and in the voluntary sector needs to be deployed in the sort of multidisciplinary teams that my hon. Friend referred to. Those four principles will underlie the 10-year strategy as it is developed.

I do not want to repeat what some of my right hon. and hon. Friends have said about the development of the strategy, the commitment to use primary schools for 8 am to 6 pm child care, and the use of secondary schools as the basis for study support activities, because my hon. Friend will know about all that. However, she stressed the need to take account of regional and local variation in the development of the strategy. The important point that I want to make to her is that we are absolutely committed to doing that, and her contribution today will help us to do so. I hope that she takes some confidence—I was going to say solace, but confidence is more appropriate—from the fact that the Government have recognised the need to address some of the specific issues in London by setting up a specific project via the Prime Minister's strategy unit, which has tried to look at some of the issues.

We recognise that there are arguments about a "London effect" in a range of employment and other issues—notably cost, but also in other areas. It would be wrong for me to say that there is an easy answer, but the Government are clear that children and parents in London have as much right as children and parents anywhere else to a child care offer that lives up to their aspirations. The debate that my hon. Friend has helped to promote is certainly one that we want to engage in. On a previous occasion, she talked about the power of Sure Start in her constituency. I know of the North West Kensington and Golborne Sure Start programmes, and I am sure there are others. She has talked powerfully about the impact of those programmes on the life chances of young people, not just before the age of five but as they go through primary and secondary school.

The Government are as inspired as my hon. Friend about the progress that can be made by such strategic investment. We recognise that some of the challenges in London represent a significant hurdle for statutory and voluntary services and we want to deal with them. I assure her that I shall take the message of this debate to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children, Young People and Families.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes to Five o'clock.

UK-US Relations

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watson.]

9.30 am

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): In light of the events of the past 24 hours, this debate is nothing if not topical. I have been up for most of the night, as I imagine have other hon. Members, so I assure the Minister that if I nod off during his reply it will not be a reflection on his speech. The most important thing is that I do not nod off during my own speech. Given the potential result of the election, I am suffering from not only sleep deprivation but a hangover. I do not know whether Ohio has been declared formally, but it seems as though President Bush has won a second term.

On the positive side, the elections were an important victory for democracy. There was a very good turnout; there seem to have been no allegations of corrupt practices or glitches in the procedures; and, given the popular vote, President Bush seems to have won a clear mandate. It must be good for America and, indeed, for the world that there is clarity in the result and that there has been no dispute as there was last time. However, the victory is not greatly welcomed outside the United States. When I was at the United States embassy last night with other hon. Members, I found it interesting that there were loud cheers and applause when Kerry won a state but stony silence when George Bush did so—among not only the Britons but many Americans.

On 15 October, The Guardian published a poll that showed that the 10 or 15 countries that had been canvassed throughout the world wanted John Kerry to win, not George Bush. The only exception was Israel, perhaps for obvious reasons. Of those polled in the United Kingdom, 22 per cent. wanted a President Bush victory and 50 per cent. wanted a John Kerry victory. Among those countries that are physically closest to the United States, including Canada and Mexico, even fewer wanted a President Bush victory than the 22 per cent. in the UK. The figure in Canada was 20 per cent., but I think that it was even less in Mexico, so there will not be wild celebrations throughout the world as a result of last night's victory for President Bush. It is incumbent on the American Administration to reflect on that and to consider how they wish to engage with the world. It is also incumbent on us in this country and on other allies of the United States to consider how we should now engage with the US.

Undoubtedly, damage has been done to the traditionally good relations between the UK and the US as a consequence of the policies pursued by the Bush Administration. It is clear from the information to which I have referred that Bush is not well regarded, but when people were asked in the same poll whether they had a favourable or unfavourable opinion of Americans, it emerged that each country polled had a favourable opinion. People can clearly distinguish between their view of their relations with the United States and Americans in general, and their view of the Administration who have been in office for the past four years, and who now look like being in power for a further four years. The poll showed that 62 per cent. of UK residents were favourable towards the Americans, while 21 per cent. had an unfavourable opinion. It is interesting that the UK had one of the lowest positive percentages, although 62 per cent. is still a significant figure.

Before I come to where that result leaves US-UK relations, it is worth my referring to a further question asked in the poll in The Guardian. Individuals in different countries were asked:

> "Does the US wield excessive influence on international affairs?"

All countries said yes. The percentage of people who agreed was the highest in all the countries polled. In this country, 73 per cent. of people agreed with that statement, while only 17 per cent. dissented from it.

Has the way in which we have developed our relationship with the United States since 1945 been good for this country? Should we have done anything different? Should we do anything different now, particularly in light of the new four-year Bush Administration and the Republican majority in the Senate and in Congress?

I cannot help thinking that the UK may have made a strategic miscalculation immediately after the second world war by appearing to try to retain some sort of superpower status. Still enamoured of Yalta, we thought that we were one of the big three along with Russia and America, rather than recognising that the sands of time were running out for our status as a world power, and that our future lay, as did that of France and Germany, in being a major European power. We still wield considerable influence in the world and are still, I hope, a force for good, but we are not of the same status as the US or Russia. We tried to retain a world status in line with that of those two superpowers for too long; that damaged our relations with Europe and, in some regards, with the US.

We have been hesitant about our European role since the second world war. This country is still more hostile to the concept of the European Union than other European countries are. That is a failure of successive Governments to explain to the British people the realpolitik of where we are and what our role might sensibly be in the real world. A consequence for UK-US relations is that the policy of successive Governments has been to try to be best buddy to the US, not only to shore up our global position but potentially to give us advantages. That policy is followed by this Government, too.

As the United States has grown in its size, global influence, gross domestic product and what it can deliver in the world, it has lost competitors, most notably the Soviet Union. The United Kingdom, however, has diminished in relative importance since 1945. Obviously, the empire has gone, and so have other things. The so-called special relationship seems to have become less and less important to the United States, but paradoxically it is in some ways more and more important to the United Kingdom. We seem to have to give more and more to keep the US interested. That is a cul-de-sac that it would be dangerous to go down. It is time to review our relations with the US in light of the balance of power in the world and the relative strengths of individual countries.

We have an unequal relationship, made even less equal by the fact that the US is now the sole superpower, and by the philosophy and approach of President Bush and his Administration. Unlike previous US Administrations, the Bush Administration have been openly dismissive of the need for consensus in the world and of the views of the rest of the world. By implication, they are also more dismissive of the views of the United Kingdom. That manifests itself in several ways.

I was sorry to hear of the situation that arose at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, which was clearly a flouting of accepted international behaviour. That was regrettable, and in my view the US has not been sufficiently apologetic for that. There is also the issue of Guantanamo Bay, a no-man's land deliberately set up to hold people without fair trial and without recourse to the normal avenues of justice. People there are not prisoners of war or charged with criminal offences, but are held indefinitely. Of course, to this day there are four Britons held at Guantanamo Bay. Five have been released, it is true, but when they were eventually released it seemed that the reasons why they were held in the first place were less than clear. Certainly, there was no clamour on this side of the Atlantic to press charges against those individuals.

As I say, four UK citizens are still being held, so I welcome the fact that the US Supreme Court recently issued a judgment criticising that situation. Still, we seem to make little progress on the matter. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) said on 25 June:

> "The British government should now consider taking legal action in the United States to compel the return of its citizens."

I have seen no evidence that that is happening.

The line from the Foreign Office appears to have been unchanged for some time. In June, I asked the Foreign Secretary what steps he intended to take to ensure that British nationals held at Guantanamo Bay were subject to a fair trial or released, and what time scale he had set. The answer given by the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), on 5 July was:

> "Discussions between the British and US Governments on the situation of the four British detainees at Guantanamo Bay are continuing. The Government will continue to seek to resolve their position. No timescale has been set for this."—[Official Report, 5 July 2004; Vol. 423, c. 549W.]

That seems an extraordinarily weak response to a serious situation involving British citizens. I doubt whether the British Government would have been so laid back and relaxed had those British nationals been held by another state.

I do not understand why the British Government have not been more forceful in demanding a regularisation of that position. The answer, I think, is that they do not want to upset the Americans, with whom relations are very important, and that they are not prepared to push the case, even when they have a clearly legitimate case and there is a disagreement on philosophy between them and the US. I happen to think that the Government's response on many such issues is inherently sound; the trouble is that they will not press them, and give way time and again. That is why I say that we need to examine the so-called special relationship and why I think that we are now paying too high a price to stay best buddy of President George W. Bush.

There is also the issue of the prisoners held on death row. I refer particularly to the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) on behalf of Kenny Richey. It is intolerable that such a situation should be allowed to drag on indefinitely. I should like to have seen the British Government make a greater effort to resolve that and other similar situations. We have not done ourselves or the US any favours by keeping quiet in public about such matters. The US is now showing a disregard—I do not want to say contempt; that may be a bit strong—for the international rule of law, which it did so much to establish in the post-war era. It was instrumental in creating the international institutions and has done a lot of good for the world as a consequence. It is now dismissing or ignoring those institutions, including on many occasions, I am sorry to say, the United Nations.

We do not seem to have a special relationship when it comes to our prisoners on death row or our people at Guantanamo Bay. The operation of the Extradition Act 2003 is similar in that it gives the United States the power to extradite UK citizens to the US, but does not reciprocate that right to the UK. I am honestly baffled: why are we signing one-sided treaties with the United States that disadvantage us? I hope that the Minister will respond to that. It does not make any sense. We have never had a clear answer to that question, and I hope that we will get one today.

One consequence of the treaty—I have to be very careful about what I say, because I am aware of the legal situation—is that three individuals face extradition to Texas for alleged fraud, involving activities that allegedly took place in London against a British bank. That is of particular concern to me, because one of the individuals, Gary Mulgrew, owns a business—the Allen and Joy building company—which is based in my constituency in Lewes. There is genuine concern among the company's employees that if the extradition goes ahead, Mr. Mulgrew, who is key to the business, will be perforce out of the country for at least two years, even if charges are subsequently dropped or he is found innocent of them—if they are laid against him in that way. As a consequence, the jobs of 21 people and 40 to 50 subcontractors in my constituency will be at risk.

As I understand it, the Extradition Act was meant to be about not fraud but terrorism. If the allegation involves fraud, a British bank and something that allegedly happened in London, why, if there is evidence to justify the charges, cannot a trial take place in the UK? Why might there be an extradition to Texas? That is another example of the British Government responding weakly to an important matter involving UK citizens.

The Government's stance on the middle east is entirely right. The Prime Minister has recognised the need not only for Israel to be secure in its own boundaries but for a viable Palestinian state. Both those things are correct. To his credit, he also recognised very early on that to deal with terrorism and the instability in the middle east it was necessary to make important progress on the Israel-Palestine situation. He understands that and has said so, as has the Foreign Secretary. I do not doubt that the Foreign Office is quite sound on that matter. However, when President Bush suddenly changes policy, having been lobbied by Ariel Sharon, the Prime Minister, rather than saying, "I'm sorry, I don't agree with that", goes meekly along with the new arrangements and the tearing up of US foreign policy after 20 or 30 years' history. The Prime Minister, who was not consulted on that change, simply goes along with it.

It is important that we stand up for what we believe in, and being good friends to a country does not mean always agreeing with them; it can mean being critical friends. The rest of the world expects us to be critical friends. We are led to believe that behind the scenes the Prime Minister influences the United States, talks to President Bush and, by being supportive in public, can achieve progress in private. I am prepared to accept that that is a possible way forward and might, in some ways, be a sensible diplomatic strategy, but it is not without risk—for example, if we end up tied into Iraq, contrary to public opinion and, possibly, international law.

I would be happier with that strategy if clear benefits could be demonstrated, but I have yet to see any. We have ended up in Iraq in an unfavourable situation, the middle east peace plan is falling apart, and in the examples I have given involving British citizens we have not seen the British Government making substantial progress—not even on the release of prisoners from Guantanamo Bay. There is now something coming down the track to do with missile defence.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): Here in the 51st state of the United States of America, many of us are surprised that the Bush campaign refrain, "Four more years", is missing the preface, "Can we cope with another?" Does my hon. Friend agree that four more years of this rather simplistic cowboys versus Indians and good guys versus bad guys foreign policy will act as an effective recruiting sergeant for psychopathic terrorist organisations? If we have four more years of "God bless America to do what the hell it likes" policy, we will have four more years of global warming, four more years of US corporate supremacy over hopes of finding a resolution to world poverty—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Edward O'Hara): Order. The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to catch my eye for a speech.

Norman Baker: I know where my hon. Friend was going and I agree with him to this extent: I do not think that it is possible to defeat terrorism solely by military means. Terrorism has to be dealt with as a battle for hearts and minds, by persuading friendly nations to come on board in that fight, by respecting international law and conventions and by isolating those who wish to challenge those laws and conventions. The present policy will not achieve the outcome that President Bush wishes. He needs to change policy to bring on board other countries which would be and are sympathetic to his aims, and certainly were so after 9/11.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's speech. Does he think that President Bush picked a fight with global terrorists and invited 9/11 to happen, and does he think that we can negotiate with these people peacefully and reach some kind of settlement? Is not the war against global terror a particularly unusual war, in that it must be won by military means ?

Norman Baker: Of course President Bush did not invite 9/11. The terrorists operating in al-Qaeda seem to be a different sort and not open to negotiation. However, President Bush can and should persuade others who are not so fanatical to understand the need to challenge al-Qaeda. He can do far more, for example, to bring Arab countries on board and involve them in the fight against terrorism, but at the moment he is alienating them by his treatment of the Palestinians. The Prime Minister understands that, and that is why he is trying to get the middle east peace process back on the road and why President Bush is wrong not to do so. He can do a lot more to isolate the terrorists than he is doing already.

Andrew George: Does my hon. Friend agree that one failing of the United States is its inability to establish a proper international accord? Does he share my concern that the United Nations has had its priorities and agenda deflected by the United States wishing effectively to go it alone if it cannot get its own way?

Norman Baker: The United Nations is a very important part of the international jigsaw, which all of us would do well to respect and enhance. After asking several times when vetoes had been exercised by permanent members of the Security Council, I received a parliamentary answer. The last time that we exercised our veto alone was against Rhodesia, as it was then known, in the early 1970s. France and China have hardly ever exercised their vetoes, and Russia's veto has petered out over the past 10 years. Nearly every single veto—and there have been about 100—has been exercised by the United States. If I can find the relevant parliamentary question in the notes in front of me, I will refer to the exact figures later.

We have a close defence relationship with the United States, and I am not one who says that we should not have that. However, given the apparent weakness of the British Government when dealing with the US, questions naturally arise about the purpose of our engagement with the US, the use of Royal Air Force bases, and whether what is proposed openly or behind the scenes for missile defence is in this country's interest.

We have a series of RAF bases that are RAF in name only. On 13 June 2000, I asked the Defence Secretary

"for what reason there are no RAF personnel at RAF Feltwell."

The rather curious answer was:

> "There is no operational requirement for RAF personnel to be based at RAF Feltwell."—[Official Report, 13 June 2000; Vol. 351, c. 559W.]

[Norman Baker]

We have RAF bases that are simply US bases. We ought to be more open and honest with the British people about the engagement process with the United States and the use of the bases, and we should provide an explanation of how that process is in the British national interest.

Rather than the Government smuggling through the possible deployment of missiles, whether at Menwith Hill, Fylingdales or anywhere else in the United Kingdom, with little debate and no opportunity for comment in Parliament, let alone the wider world, why do they not explain their intentions, thinking and long-term strategy and sell the idea? By behaving surreptitiously and not being up front about those matters, I am afraid that the conclusion is that there is something to hide. That is a matter for the British Government, but it is also a sign of their weakness when dealing with the United States Government.

I have mentioned that the present US Government show a disregard for world opinion, which is regrettable. Nowhere is that stronger than on environmental matters. The Minister will be aware that in a statement earlier this year, the Government's chief scientific adviser, Sir David King, mentioned that in his view climate change represents the biggest threat to the planet, and that it was—to paraphrase him—bigger even than terrorism.

The Prime Minister has said that he recognises the great need to deal with climate change. He has said how important it is and that he intends to make climate change and Africa the centrepiece of his work during the European Union and G8 presidencies. I will welcome that if he carries it through. I hope that he does so, but he weakened his case by applying to the EU last week for increases in carbon emissions under the emissions trading scheme.

Be that as it may, the Prime Minister says that he wants to raise the issue in the EU and the G8. If he thinks that it is an important issue and he agrees with his chief scientific adviser that it is more important than terrorism—let us say for the sake of argument that it is as important as terrorism—I presume that he has raised it with President Bush. He has met him many times, he presumably has his ear and he has certainly been to summits with him, but nothing has happened in America with the President and his Administration. The only conclusions are that either the Prime Minister is being disingenuous and telling us that he has raised the matter with the United States when he has not done so, or—this is much more likely—he has raised the issue with the United States and it has paid no attention whatever to his views. That underlines how weak the Government's influence is over the American Administration. The Prime Minister has given the Americans what they want in Iraq. He has gone along with things and been their best buddy, but he has not got much in return. That is my criticism of UK foreign policy with the United States.

The Prime Minister has got nothing on climate change. Just about the first thing that President Bush did on coming to office was to abrogate President Clinton's wish to adhere to the Kyoto treaty. President Bush even suggests that climate change is not happening. He must be one of the few people in the world still to hold that view. In the meantime, the United States, which accounts for 4 per cent. of the world's population, is responsible for 25 per cent. of carbon emissions. That is an intolerable position and it is consistently getting worse.

There is no evidence that President Bush or the American Administration are going to do very much to tackle the situation, but they need to do so. That is not a criticism of the United States, because many states are taking action. In California, both Republicans and Democrats are doing good work—including Arnold Schwarzenegger, who has converted to green politics. A lot of good work is going on and there is investment—some of which President Bush has started, to be fair to him—in the hydrogen economy. However, while the US Administration are in denial about climate change, progress will not be made. The way things are going on climate change, we cannot afford another four years not simply of inactivity but of increasing US emissions. We need to act.

I am bound to say that President Bush has displayed a total disregard for the environment in any case. He has repealed several hundred laws and regulations protecting clean air and water, wilderness, and national parks and wetlands, as well as walking away from Kyoto. He has reneged on a pledge to cut power plant carbon dioxide emissions. He has launched his so-called clear skies initiative, under which 48 million extra tonnes of air pollutants will be released each year over US communities. He has also launched a so-called healthy forests initiative, which will increase logging—that is Newspeak if ever I heard it.

President Bush has modified the Clean Air Act to allow power plants to upgrade without installing new anti-pollution equipment. Thankfully, the Appeal Court blocked that. He has announced logging plans for the rainforest in Alaska. He has postponed by several years the deadline by which coal-burning power plants must cut mercury emissions. He has proposed amendments to the Endangered Species Act 1973 to allow wildlife collectors to import endangered species. President Bush is by all measurements—this is recognised independently in the US, as well—the worst US President in living memory in terms of protecting the environment.

It is not America generally; it is President Bush and his Administration. For example, Bill Ford, the chairman and chief executive of the second biggest US car maker, says that he would support higher fuel taxes in exchange for incentives to promote energy-efficient vehicles. So, there is some movement in the US, even in the car industry, but it is not reflected in the Administration, which is a great pity.

President Bush said in New Jersey in September 2002 that he wanted

> "an energy bill that encourages consumption."

He is so far away from tackling climate change and behaving in an environmentally responsible manner that it is frightening. For me, the test of whether the UK has any influence at all with the US Administration on key issues is whether we are able to influence a new Bush Administration to tackle climate change and put their environmental house in order. What the Americans do is key for the rest of us, because they are such big polluters and America is such a big country with such a large population. I hope that the Prime Minister will take that forward and that his first action this morning will be to ring up President Bush and say, "George, congratulations on winning the election. Now, can we talk about climate change?" It would be great if that were the first thing that he said, but I doubt very much that it will be.

One of the reasons why the Americans and President Bush objected to Kyoto—in addition to the potential impact on the US domestic economy—was that 80 per cent. of the world was exempted from compliance. I understand why the Americans object on the basis of exemptions and I suggest that the Prime Minister consider the Liberal Democrat policy of contraction and convergence, which seeks global agreement on reducing carbon emissions and recognises that that reduction must be spread fairly across all countries, including developing countries. If we pursued that line, which is not only environmentally sensible but might be of interest to the United States, it might overcome one of their two objections.

Such one-sidedness leads me to question the relationship between the UK and the US. We have much in common and have good relations. Many of us, including me, have spent time in the US and enjoyed and learned from it. I was in New York when I was 24. I think that anyone who is 23 or 24 should spend some time in New York. Being in the US is an important part of individual development. We learn much from the US and take a great deal from it. Nothing that I have said is a criticism of the United States as a country. [Laughter.] No, it is a criticism of the US Administration. It is important that that point is made.

I also criticise successive British Governments for pretending that there is a special relationship; that relationship has withered away. The Prime Minister has tried to be a bridge between the United States and the European Union, but because of the weakness of our position with the US, he has concentrated on one end of the bridge to the exclusion of the other. There is not much evidence of the pursuance of the EU end, and the danger is that the bridge will fall into the water and that the Prime Minister will end up drowning as a consequence. That is not something that I want to happen—it is not in the interests of this country.

I shall finish by quoting the former Minister, David Clark. He was a very good Minister and the only one to have been sacked for trying to implement the Government's manifesto, by introducing what the Government thought was a too radical right to freedom of information. In an article in The Guardian earlier this month, he said:

> "By putting fidelity to the 'special relationship' first, we can only weaken Europe's collective voice and encourage America's unilateralist impulse, further souring transatlantic relations and leaving us exposed—the choice we have always attempted to avoid. The truth is that if we want a durable transatlantic partnership that works in the common interests of Europe and America, it will only become possible if Britain is prepared to abandon the illusion of 'specialness' in relations with America and give priority to the objective of forging a common European approach. This is not primarily a matter of treaties and institutions; it is much more a question of mindset."

Reinforcing the point that I made about our weak position with the US and the tendency to offer more than we ought, David Clark also said:

> "It is entirely likely that Blair, in moments of private reflection, understands that he made an enormous mistake in selling his support to George Bush so cheaply."

I hope that the Prime Minister has realised that that was a mistake and that he will take corrective action in the second Bush term. Our present method of engagement with the US does not help the US or the world, and most of all it does not help us. There is a way forward, but it requires a change of policy from the Government.

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) on securing the debate and on the typically forthright manner in which he put his case. Under normal circumstances, one might say that it was uncanny timing to secure the debate this morning. Unfortunately, the lack of other participants makes it appear that right hon. and hon. Members prefer to celebrate or commiserate about the election, rather than come here to pontificate on it. Perhaps we will have another opportunity, when more of our colleagues will contribute to what is one of the most important foreign policy issues that faces us.

There is still some uncertainty about the outcome of the US election, although that may end while we are here. Clearly, the protagonists in the presidential election have different world views, but they will undoubtedly face the same challenges. If Mr. Kerry were to win—I appreciate that that now seems unlikely—we might look forward to a more internationalist approach to foreign policy, but he would face serious constraints, some of America's making and others that reflect the challenges in this new world order. If, as is now almost certain, President Bush wins a second term, we must hope that, in the tradition of second-term presidents, he will focus on solutions to some of the most pressing international problems. Regardless of the outcome, we must do our best to be optimistic that the new American presidential term will offer us an opportunity to develop our relationship with the United States and tackle the fearsome difficulties that face us all.

We regularly debate in the House and elsewhere the nature of our relationship with the United States, and how special it is or is not. Whatever one's opinion, the relationship is undeniably unique and strong, but it is not without strains. Its strength is founded on our economic and trading relationship, which is one of the most important that the UK enjoys. There are still extremely close defensive and security ties between the two countries, and underpinning the relationship are the historic links of families, the shared experiences of the world wars and much else besides, which keep the two countries close.

Undoubtedly the balance has shifted with the end of the cold war and more recently with the new realities after 9/11. In the absence of the Soviet Union and the communist threat that went with it, the glue that bound us together has loosened. The US has parallel interests in the Americas and Asia that alter the balance of its outlook. The United Kingdom and Europe are less dependent on the United States for security, and increasingly are its competitors in the new globalised economy. In the aftermath of 9/11, we all have a new perspective on what has become a fractured world of new, complex threats with which we are only just getting to grips.

Whatever the strains, the world needs the United States and Europe to bind together. I strongly believe that the UK has the most important role in facilitating that. As my hon. Friend has remarked, the Prime Minister has often characterised Britain's position as the bridge between Europe and America. I join my hon. Friend in urging that the Prime Minister and Foreign Office Ministers pay as much attention to both ends of that, so that we can make the most of our unique position in the world. That will be at its height in 2005, with the G8 and European Union presidencies, which will give our position added strength. Britain should be positioned as a committed European country, able to bring together the different parties and not necessarily having to make a choice between Europe and America.

My hon. Friend has raised some important issues such as Guantanamo Bay, missile defence and the extradition treaty between the UK and the United States, on which I hope that the Minister will have the chance to respond in detail in due course. Those are hugely significant issues that sour our relationship with the United States, and I hope that we will have a constructive reply on them.

One of the most significant issues on which my hon. Friend touched was the environment. As his analysis set out, perhaps on that we have an awful lot more work to do in recognising the scale of the issue facing the whole world and in persuading the Americans, particularly if we are to have President Bush again, that they must play a part. We are pleased that the Kyoto protocol is now to be implemented—it has been long overdue—but, without American participation, there is a huge gap in its effectiveness. We must ensure that we engage with America in that process as a matter of urgency. Whether or not it is the first remark that the Prime Minister makes to the President when they call each other—I suspect that if he calls him this morning, he will get a rather short answer—I hope that it is one of the first issues that the Prime Minister will seek to raise with him.

My hon. Friend touched only briefly on the situation in Iraq, which is one of the most sensitive issues between our two countries. Sadly, that has become more and more precarious, and we wait with some trepidation to see what might happen in Falluja in the coming days and weeks. Whatever one's view, it is increasingly obvious that the safety of everyone in that country is more and more at risk.

I do not want to rehearse all the issues in the Chamber again, but the Liberal Democrats remain deeply concerned about this country's engagement in Iraq and the prospects of developing a realistic and early exit strategy. We all want the elections next January and the year after to succeed, but we must be realistic about the difficulties, which seem to be intensifying rather than ebbing away.

The latest deployment of United Kingdom troops offers us the prospect of mission creep in Britain's contribution to the coalition efforts, and it is still uncertain what will happen once the Black Watch return and other British troops have to be deployed in their place. I hope that the Minister will expand further on explanations given to the House about the long-term exit strategy. We believe that, unless we make it clear to those in Iraq, whether they are terrorists, or the ordinary people of Iraq seeking democratically to go about their business and to make their life, that there is the prospect of a phased withdrawal of coalition forces that is tied to key events such as the elections, there is little prospect of genuine Iraqi sovereignty being passed to the people of Iraq.

My hon. Friend spent some time discussing the difficulties in the middle east, which must also be an early priority for the new presidential term. The quartet's activities in the past year have been subsumed into the American election timetable. That is a basic reflection of the realities. The United States is by far the most important of the parties in the quartet, but it is important that Britain, in its role in the European Union and as a key member of the United Nations Security Council, ensures that the road map is given new impetus and offers the Palestinians a realistic prospect of realising their dream of a viable separate state. We all want Israel and Palestine to live in peace and side by side in viable separate states. We now need the international political will to achieve that.

International terrorism, whether or not the middle east and Iraq are the key drivers of its growth, is one of the most worrying and misunderstood threats to the world as a whole. None of us can be experts on it and offer a simple solution. I accept what the Conservative spokesman, the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter), said in an intervention about our being duty-bound to tackle international terrorism militarily where necessary, but we must recognise the need to tackle the underlying causes that give rise to it, which either President Kerry or President Bush will be uniquely placed to do.

We should not, however, lose sight of nuclear proliferation, which is a separate issue that has sometimes been lost in the grander debates. In the aftermath of the cold war, there is a danger of becoming increasingly complacent about the threat of nuclear weapons proliferation. We are acutely aware of the situation in North Korea, we are all very anxious about what is happening in Iran, and it goes without saying that we do not want international terrorists to obtain nuclear weapons. However, we in the international community must sharpen up our act on that score. In a recent debate in this Chamber, I characterised the situation with regard to Iran as the Europeans having too many carrots and not enough sticks and the Americans operating in the opposite way. We must bring about convergence between the American and European approaches to tackling Iran and we must hope that, by succeeding there, we will offer the prospect of a reduced risk of proliferation in other parts of the world.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West) (Lab): I am slightly surprised by what the hon. Gentleman has said. Is he suggesting that we are not being tough enough on Iran? One of the things that differentiates our policy from that of the US is our position on Iran, but he has said that we should be tougher, which is what the US is currently implying.

Mr. Moore: I spoke in shorthand to a degree. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the debate that we had on Iran in this very Room a couple of weeks ago. He may have been present at it in a silent capacity.

My criticism is that, although the European Union has offered the prospect of alternatives for Iran to supply a civil nuclear programme, it has not been clear-cut enough about the economic sanctions that would kick in were Iran not to proceed with that programme. My view of the American position is that it has been too willing to see an early reference to the Security Council on Iran without offering the country a way out through developments. The EU and the Government are to be commended for working with France and Germany to develop our position on Iran. However, Europe has offered too many carrots and not enough sticks, and the United States vice versa. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman and I will continue to have a difference of opinion on the matter, but I hope that I have been able to clarify what I think.

Many of the different problems come together in the United Nations. In recent times, that has been the location of fraught battles involving the United States, Britain and other allies. Not least because of Britain's role in the G8, I hope that we will have an opportunity to revisit the way in which America relates to other countries within the UN. We will have a crucial test in a few weeks when the Secretary-General's high-level panel produces its report on the development of reform in the UN. That will go to the heart of the debate about what legitimises interventions in other countries. It is important that our Government and the Americans engage in the debate that comes out of that report at the earliest opportunity and at the most senior levels. We must recognise that in this fraught world the strength of the UN is a key to maintaining peace.

The United Kingdom's historic ties with America—our shared interests and the common threats we face—make the relationship between the two countries strong and unique. Irrespective of the outcome of the presidential contest, we have new opportunities to work with the United States to tackle the serious challenges facing the world. Instinctively, we always seek to stand shoulder to shoulder with our allies, but we must not lose our ability to be constructively critical or to strike out in a different direction when our interests diverge. The biggest challenge facing our Government is to persuade the American Administration to re-engage with Europe and to broaden the base of its international diplomacy and engagement. With the imminent presidency of the G8 and the later presidency of the EU, the timing has rarely been better.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore). As always, he has been a voice of reason and moderation. I congratulate the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) on securing the debate and getting his timing right.

I think that we can now say that President Bush will win the election. I may be the only person in the Chamber today to do so, but I welcome that. It is a good result and I welcome the fact that the Republican party—our sister party—has strengthened its position in the Senate and Congress. I imagine that the Minister has mixed feelings about the outcome, but I believe that it is strong and positive. I welcome the fact that President Bush seems to have won the popular vote by more than 3 million and that there was a high turnout. Let us hope that we have a high turnout here on 5 May 2005, which we all know will be the date of the next general election in this country, despite the smokescreens last weekend. It is good news for America that it has apparently delivered a decisive outcome.

I recognise that the BBC will be in mourning about the result, as will many colleagues. Some people love to criticise America. The hon. Member for Lewes did so—although he made some important points about the environment and other issues—in the general thrust of his comments about the Bush Administration and, by implication, America and its role in the world in recent years. I caution those who love to criticise America—I shall make some specific criticisms in a moment. The world would be a very different and much more dangerous place if America's present President or a future President decided to take their bat and ball home and to exercise a more isolationist policy. I do not think that that would be in the interests of the world. It would be an alarming state of affairs, so let us be more positive in welcoming America's contribution to the world.

When we were approaching the run-up to the most recent war in Iraq, the Prime Minister said in the House of Commons—it must be true, because he said it—that the military might of the USA was the equivalent of the combined military might of the next 27 strongest countries in the world put together. I sometimes reflect on that. It is no wonder that America is the world's only hyperpower. Never before has one country dominated global events in such a way. I believe that 25 per cent. of the global economy is generated in the United States; it is truly a hyperpower and we must work with it.

I admire George Bush and believe that he has strong values. I prefer political leaders to have a strong sense of direction and values rather than to be all men for all seasons. I admire his leadership, but there is one reason in particular for celebrating his victory: a second-term US President has a much stronger chance of effective intervention in the middle east peace process than a first-term President, whether Democrat or Republican. If there is just one matter on which we need to see progress in the next few months it is the middle east peace process. We need to bring the parties together, to get them talking again and to reach some sort of settlement.

The middle east peace process is unusual because the contours of a settlement are clear to all sides. It is important to get the parties together, to make them talk and to thrash out the detail. I welcome the commitment that the Prime Minister expressed at the Labour party conference to re-engage with the issue after the presidential election. A second-term American President and a re-engaged British Prime Minister are a welcome recipe, because there are no issues more important in the world today than resolving that conflict. If we are to resolve or diminish the underlying causes of the war against terror, the most important thing that we can do, apart from taking a gradual approach and attacking global poverty, is to resolve the running sore of the middle east conflict.

It seems that everyone in this country loves to attack America, and I have done my share of that in the past. I often think of a conversation that I had with a Syrian business man in Syria when sitting under a star-filled sky in a beautiful part of the world enjoying a wonderful meal together. I asked the sort of question one asks at about 11 o'clock at night when the conversation is beginning to dry up. I asked him what he thought was the best country in the world. He was a widely travelled man and I thought that he might say Syria or Lebanon or another country in that region. He thought for a while and then said, "Without a shadow of a doubt, the United States of America." That answer surprised me somewhat and I asked him why he had said that. He said, "Because the one thing about the US of A is that people there have freedom, and what I would give for that sort of freedom in this country and throughout many parts of the middle east and the rest of the world."

When we attack the United States, we should sometimes remind ourselves that the US is the land of the free. In many other parts of the world—in most African countries, in China, in many central Asian countries and in Latin American countries—people would be very pleased to swap living standards and their level of freedom for those enjoyed by Americans. We must not lose sight of that important point.

If one considers the role that America has played in global events in the past 50 years, one must admit that, although many mistakes have been made, America has largely been a force for good. The American intervention in world war two helped us to win the war on tyranny. The cold war was a long and difficult process, but in the end, the war against communism was won. I wonder where we would be today if the war against communism had been lost and Russia and the Soviet Union, not the west, had become the dominant world power. Where would this country be today? Would we be having this debate? Would we be having any debates at all?

We are now engaged in a war against terror, and we want to ensure that that war is won. I absolutely agree with the hon. Members for Lewes and for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale that the war against terror cannot be won by military means alone and that we must deal with the underlying causes. I accept that we must engage in the middle east peace process and tackle global poverty and the alienation felt by many, but we seem to be dealing with a group of people who do not have a political agenda and whose intentions are to create terror and chaos in the west and to bring it down. That must be dealt with militarily.

I am unashamedly pro-American. I am an Atlanticist, and I rejoice in the special relationship. How could I not be, when I represent a city from which the Mayflower set out in the 1660s and helped to found the land of the free? I was pleased when the Prime Minister said in the run-up to the Iraq debate that for him our special relationship was an article of faith. I know that that did not go down too well in his own party, but I, too, believe in the special relationship. One of the most important planks of UK foreign policy is that we stand shoulder to shoulder with our American cousins and friends.

That policy does not, however, mean that we are the poodle of Bush or of any other President. It does not mean that when the American President says, "Jump," we say, "How high?" It does mean that we should be a candid friend. During those 18 glorious years of Conservative rule in this country recently, when we enjoyed a special relationship with American Presidents of different colours, there were many times when we were critical of them and influenced American opinion. I could go into detail, but I do not want to do that now. I want to give the Minister plenty of time to respond to this debate.

I sometimes think that our special relationship may have become a little lop-sided. Our support for the Iraqi war was very welcome indeed, bearing in mind that British involvement took engagement in the war from being solely American to one involving a coalition. Other countries were involved, but without us, one could not claim that there was a coalition. It is therefore important to President Bush that we were there alongside him. The deal appears to have been that we would have a new initiative on the middle east peace process—a fair exchange. The road map was announced, which was very welcome, but there was not the follow-through that we would have liked. We should have insisted that a special envoy be put in place in Jerusalem to see that matter through, with the full authority of the American President. That did not happen. We have a second chance now, and I very much hope that it will be taken.

There may well be a surge of confidence among Republicans, having won the popular vote fairly decisively—at least, there may be when we finally add up all the numbers. In the next few weeks, we must think through some very sensitive global issues, not least Iran and North Korea, which need to be resolved. We do not, however, want any American President, especially President Bush, to reach for hobnailed boots in which to stamp all over those situations. The UK can and must be a voice of reason to temper that sort of American confidence. There are some things that America does so well, but cultural sensitivity, peacekeeping and sensitive diplomacy are not necessarily the first things that come to mind when one lists the qualities of our American friends.

I have been critical about other issues in the past. I agree that the Guantanamo Bay policy was bad; there have been human rights abuses and it has been a public relations disaster. I wish it were otherwise, and even now I hope that the American President will change that policy.

Not long ago in this very Chamber we had a debate about the treatment of UK citizens by United States immigration officials. Some UK nationals have been handcuffed and manacled in United States airports simply because, for example, they did not have the right visa. That is an overreaction, and we would do well to ensure that the special relationship is a two-way street. We must ensure that that kind of abuse is ended. The Minister might want to comment on that.

There are important issues that the special relationship must cause us to address with the new—or returned—American President. I agree with the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale that we have to see things through in Iraq; there is no plan B. We must ensure that the January elections take place; we must commit sufficient resources to make that happen. The hon. Gentleman talks about an early disengagement plan; I would like that, too. However, the most important thing is to get the job done. We must see Iraq through to a period of democracy and prosperity. We must face down the insurgents, many of whom have come from other countries. We must also see the war on terror through; there must be no let-up on that. I mentioned Iran and North Korea; these issues need to be grappled with in the coming months.

I had a meeting with the British Council recently, in which I was informed that within a few years the majority of American middle management will be of Hispanic rather than Anglo-Saxon extraction. The gathering momentum of that change in the United States may lead to a change in the nature of our special relationship, which is largely cultural, historical and relational. Therefore, there are issues that we will need to address if we are to manage the relationship well over the coming years. However, I believe that the special relationship is crucial to our country's foreign policy, and that in it we can have the best of both worlds. We can have a close working relationship with our American cousins and full engagement with our EU partners, and we can make our own unique contribution to the world, bearing in mind those two relationships. The United Kingdom's special contribution is to promote democracy and good governance and to be at the forefront of the attack on global poverty. We are no longer a superpower, but we have a unique role and we must play it to the full.

10.32 am

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I join the hon. Members for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) and for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) in congratulating the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) on securing this debate, on this day of all days, on the United Kingdom's relationship with the United States. It is a huge topic, and many Members of Parliament—not just those who are present in this Room—have a view on at least one or two aspects of the special relationship. Although disagreements have emerged, there has also been some common ground, not least between the Front-Bench spokesmen. I welcome the opportunity to present the Government's view on the relationship as a whole, and I will seek to address at least some of the specific issues that have been raised in this wide-ranging debate.

In some parts of the United States, the polls closed only a few hours ago. Tempting though it is to be the first Government voice to speak on the outcome of that election, it would be injudicious of me to do so, not least because I imagine that more senior Government figures than me will be making comments. Therefore, I trust that hon. Members will understand if I resist saying anything about the outcome; it would be speculation at this point—at least it was when we entered the Room. Needless to say, the United Kingdom will work closely with whoever wins, to ensure that our partnership remains a positive influence on the global stage.

Britain's relationship with the United States is, and will remain, the most important of our bilateral ties. We share common values, as the hon. Member for South-West Devon acknowledged, and those values outweigh our differences on particular issues. The United States is crucial to the achievement of the UK's international strategic priorities; I will develop that point in my response to the remarks of the hon. Member for Lewes. Both countries believe in freedom and security for all and will continue to work together to combat global terrorism. We also want the global divisions between the haves and have-nots to be narrowed.

As well as our shared values, we have other close ties. Our two countries are each other's largest foreign investors, supporting millions of jobs on both sides of the Atlantic. Given my ministerial responsibilities for trade, that is a matter of direct concern to me. The US-UK trade relationship is worth £60 billion a year, of which half originates in the UK and half in the US. In areas as diverse as science and technology, health, urban redevelopment and law—issues that we did not cover today—our experts exchange best practice knowledge to improve the quality of life for us all and for future generations.

With the greatest respect, I hope that the hon. Member for Lewes will forgive me for saying that the proposition of being lectured by a Liberal Democrat on what it requires to stand up for what one believes in is at least curious. To balance that, I should say that the Liberal Democrat Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale, made a far more measured and insightful contribution to the debate; there is a fair amount of common ground between us.

If I interpreted the hon. Member for Lewes correctly, his fundamental argument on a range of issues is that the USA's taking a different position to the UK is somehow in and of itself evidence of the failure of British foreign policy. He seemed to be saying that if there is any disagreement, there cannot be any influence on the international stage. I urge him to consider an alternative proposition. Just like the UK, the US develops policies on the basis of its national interest. The challenge for our international relations is to strengthen our influence, recognising that of course there will be disagreements between even the strongest friends. From time to time, all true friends argue and debate with each other the merits of their respective standpoints. It is not always constructive to do so publicly, but it is healthy to admit any differences.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Kyoto. The UK's objective, as regards Kyoto and other issues mentioned, is to work with the United States to find mutually agreeable solutions. We will continue to do so, both bilaterally and by working with the United States in multilateral institutions. Of course, we will encourage the US to play a leading role in strengthening those institutions in years to come, as we share common values on our view of the global community.

The hon. Gentleman's speech ranged widely, from the latest polls in The Guardian to the historic Yalta summit. Personally, I had greater sympathy with the more generous acknowledgement of the hon. Member for South-West Devon of the US's contribution to the cold war and to securing victory in the second world war.

[Mr. Douglas Alexander]

I fear that the hon. Member for Lewes inadvertently made an error by suggesting that the David Clark from The Guardian whom he quoted was the former Cabinet Office Minister, Lord Clark of Windermere. I suspect rather that he is David Clark, former special adviser, who writes somewhat more frequently on foreign affairs than the other. I say that with feeling, because David Clark and I are friends. We were contemporaries at Edinburgh university, and if my memory serves me correctly, notwithstanding his membership of the Edinburgh University Labour club, he had been a member of the Young Liberals in the borders of Scotland, so perhaps he is returning from whence he came.

Let me deal with some of the more substantive points raised. On the Extradition Act 2003, on which the Home Office leads for the Government, I am of course willing to raise the matter identified by the hon. Gentleman with my colleagues in the Home Office. In relation to the death penalty, it might be helpful to set out the position. There are 38 states in the US that still have the death penalty on their statute books, as well as the US federal and military courts. We have repeatedly made clear our opposition to the death penalty, and regularly engage on the subject with US authorities, particularly when a British citizen is involved.

The UK opposes the death penalty in all circumstances. Capital punishment has no place in a modern democratic society in the view of this Government. Along with EU partners, we make regular representations to the United States, urging it to abolish the death penalty. The United States Government are in no doubt about our views, and we shall continue expressing our opposition to that practice at every opportunity.

On Guantanamo Bay and the detainees, we have long expressed our reservations about the military commissions, and the US Government suspended all legal proceedings against them at our request soon after two UK detainees were designated in July 2003. After a lengthy series of discussions with the United States, led by our Attorney-General, the Government concluded that the military commissions process would not provide sufficient guarantee of a fair trial according to international standards, so we requested that the nine detainees be returned to the UK. Further discussions at official level explored whether there was any prospect of providing an alternative trial process to the military commissions envisaged, but it has not proved possible to reach agreement.

Five of the detainees have been returned, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged. Following a visit by officials to Washington in late May, the Prime Minister repeated our request that the remaining four detainees be returned to the United Kingdom. I respectfully suggest that no Government have done as much for their nationals detained at Guantanamo Bay or looked after the welfare of their nationals better than the United Kingdom. We have visited our people more often and have worked harder to resolve the position of the British detainees. We have held more frequent and higher-level talks with the United States Government than any other Government and, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, we have successfully secured the return of five British detainees. We will continue to request at the highest levels the return of the remaining four detainees. Our discussions with the United States continue.

I turn to the broad issue that in many ways underpinned the speeches of the hon. Members for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale and for South-West Devon—the centrality and importance of the middle east peace process, not least in light of the anticipated results that were referred to earlier. The middle east peace process remains one of the UK's highest foreign policy priorities. As was acknowledged by the hon. Member for South-West Devon, the Prime Minister, speaking at the Labour party conference in September, reiterated the depth of his personal commitment to the middle east peace process and pledged to make progress on resolving the conflict a personal priority.

The United States engagement on the middle east peace process remains critical. We continue to work with the United States and other quartet members to find avenues for progress and ways in which to inject new momentum into the peace process, in inevitably difficult and complex circumstances. We remain committed to helping the parties to implement the road map and to achieve a comprehensive and just settlement. The Prime Minister firmly believes that the road map is the right way forward. The US has made it clear that it agrees. We intend to do all that we can to see it implemented in the months and years ahead.

Prime Minister Sharon's plan to withdraw all settlements from Gaza and some from the west bank is a real opportunity for progress given that, frankly, little progress has been made for many months. We hope to see a withdrawal as soon and as fully as possible. On 26 October, the Knesset voted in favour of disengagement and that was a welcome step towards that goal. Over the coming weeks, we hope to see the parties preparing for disengagement and co-ordinating their efforts. The key will be to see the plan implemented with both sides working to make it a success and taking full advantage of the opportunity to inject forward momentum into the road map process.

We and the United States, along with the rest of the international community, have a vital role to play in consultation with the parties, in preparing the ground for withdrawal and in doing all that we can to make it a success, both for Israel and the Palestinians. It is essential that the quartet leads the international community's involvement. At the same time, the quartet and the parties need to keep their eyes on the bigger objective: negotiations on a final settlement to the conflict. The recent quartet statement of 22 September set out a balanced and constructive way forward. We are supporting the Palestinian Authority in their efforts to improve the security situation in the Gaza strip and the west bank. We believe that that will benefit both sides. Candidly, of course much more work still needs to be done, but we have been encouraged by the possibility of making further progress in the months ahead.

Norman Baker: Will the Minister confirm that the British Government remain opposed to the construction of the wall on Palestinian territory? Will he also confirm that the Government are asking the United States to put pressure on Israel to discontinue its construction?

Mr. Alexander: The position of the British Government remains unchanged in respect of the barrier, not least in respect of its location on what has previously been Palestinian territory. We have made clear our views directly to the Israelis about that. The matter has formed the basis of discussions between ourselves, the Americans and the other quartet partners, as part of the much wider discussions to which I have referred.

The issue of climate change is close to the heart of the hon. Member for Lewes and he has much expertise on it. As he acknowledged, the United States is the world's biggest contributor to climate change. It is therefore essential that, as a country, it is involved fully in global efforts. We remain confident that future international action will include the United States.

From the Prime Minister down—he has particular views on what should be at least the second few words that he says to the President, if the situation turns out as he envisages—and through the work of Ministers and officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Office of Science and Technology, the United Kingdom is working hard to convince policy makers in the United States that their main fear that reducing emissions will harm economic growth is groundless. The United Kingdom has shown that. The UK economy grew by 36 per cent. between 1990 and 2002, while greenhouse gas emissions fell by about 15 per cent.; but some still clearly need persuading of that.

The United States Government's position against Kyoto is a matter of record. In 1997, the US Senate—notwithstanding the changes to the Senate that seem to be emerging this morning—voted 95 to zero in favour of a resolution that stated that it would refuse to ratify such a treaty. I doubt that time has shifted the numbers radically, and in light of the observations on the composition of the new Senate, there may not have been significant change overnight on that matter.

It is essential to ensure that the United States is fully engaged in international discussions on how to advance beyond Kyoto. Of course, the United States remains a signatory to the United Nations convention on climate change, and regardless of the outcome of the elections we will continue to press the United States to re-engage with international efforts to tackle the matter. After all, a change in the Administration will not cause an overnight change on emissions policy.

The hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale raised specifically the matter of Iraq, and I will seek to respond to his question on withdrawal. As the Foreign Secretary made clear in the House on 10 September 2003:

> "We do not want to stay, nor will we stay, in Iraq for a moment longer than is necessary."—[Official Report, 10 September 2003; Vol. 410, c. 403.]

Our task is to help the Iraqi people rapidly build a nation from the ashes of Saddam's dictatorship. We are doing all we can to help that happen, together with the United States and our allies in the coalition, and the process is well under way. The Iraqi Interim Government are committed to holding elections in January, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, and they are on track to meet that deadline.

Iraqis want elections. The hon. Member for South-West Devon spoke eloquently of the importance of freedom, and we are convinced that the Iraqi people share the ambition for free, democratic elections. That is borne out by all the recent opinion polls and discussion in Iraq. We believe that we are working towards that January deadline for elections.

This debate could go on for a long time. It not only underlines the breadth and depth of our relationship with the United States but frankly acknowledges that we disagree on certain issues, notwithstanding the enduring strength of that relationship. Today's debate—given its timing—will not be the last word on the issues raised, and I suspect that it will not be the last word spoken in the House today on the subject. However, I assure the Chamber that we in the Government will seek to work with the next Administration, of whatever hue, as we advance together our national interests on the international stage.

Rural Schools

11 am

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): I am grateful to be able to speak on rural schools. I do not want to change the heading, but "Rural Schools (Somerset)" might be the more obvious title.

Today is not the first time that I have been fortunate enough to secure a debate on this important subject. The Minister and I have faced each other in this Chamber on rather too many occasions. It is almost becoming a habit, but I do not make any apology for that.

The vast majority of my constituency is incredibly rural. Some of those areas have enormous rural deprivation, far beyond that in Scotland and probably in most of Wales. Unfortunately, because trade is seasonal, unemployment rates are high. Rural poverty, which is not the same as what is understood more generally by poverty, is more commonplace than most people realise. Unfortunately, crime in rural areas is slowly but inexorably creeping up. That is not because there are not the police; it is because people realise that it is easy to come out of Bristol, commit a crime and go back up the M5 to Bristol. It is a problem that the chief constable, Mr. Steve Pilkington, has endeavoured to resolve over the past few years.

I fear that the business of educating young people in such places is often overlooked at the top. It is terribly easy to see just the pretty side of school life. We have an idyllic view of school. Perhaps we are thinking back to when we were young. We imagine the little villages, the quaint old school buildings, the magnificent surrounding countryside and, as we work in London, the fresh air—unless anyone was at the American embassy last night, where there was more fresh air than could be believed.

The problem of education in rural areas such as Exmoor and West Somerset runs incredibly deep and has done for 20 to 30 years. It often seems to be bypassed by policy makers of all persuasions—it does not matter of which Government or party. That is why I am raising the subject again. Unfortunately, nothing has materially changed since I held my previous debate on the subject. Indeed, there is a danger that some of the problems that we are facing may be getting worse.

I would like to cover three specific concerns. The first is the recruitment and retention of teachers in rural areas—the Minister is well aware of that. The second is the enormous financial burden of school transport. I suspect that that is a problem faced by every rural county, or any urban authority that has to bus children in. I would loosely say that the third is the role of the education authority, but what I am trying to narrow it down to is the way in which the authority deals with special needs and statementing.

I want to paint a picture of a school career from a child's perspective—I seem to have to go back a long time to remember that. It is rather a frightening journey to contemplate. It starts with the friendly local first school, which sometimes has fewer than 30 pupils. We know the problems that that can cause. A few years down the line, the child goes to one of the three middle schools, which are much bigger and, unfortunately, by virtue of that, much further away.

Alternatively, there are two—or in my case, five—excellent community colleges, which are miles apart and have upwards of 1,200 young pupils each. There is only one community college in the whole of West Somerset. I am told—the Minister will probably bear this out—that you can fit London into that area. There are four community colleges in Bridgwater.

In a few years, a child in West Somerset will become, dare I say it, in London terms, a baggy-eyed commuter. They will be plucked from a tiny village school and bunged on a bus. Sometimes, the daily journey equals the amount of time spent studying. A child from Dulverton, which is not in my constituency but in that of my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Flook), who unfortunately cannot be present, will be on a bus for over an hour to get to the community college. An enormous distance is involved.

For a Member of Parliament who represents an urban area, such as the Minister, the situation is sometimes difficult to comprehend, because urban seats are much smaller. At the end of a typical week of schooling, I look at the eyes of some of the children in my constituency: they look tired and I believe that they are tired. Apart from the first few happy years, when the school is just down the road, children leave home early to catch a bus that meanders along winding roads for mile after trying mile. If a person lives in a hamlet on Exmoor, in the Somerset Levels or in the Quantocks and their destination is the West Somerset community schools—Blake, Haygrove, East Bridgwater or Chilton Trinity technology college—they have to be out of bed by half-past six and on the bus by just after seven o'clock in the morning. They will probably not get home until after five.

The cost of daily transportation beggars belief. It always staggers me. I will come on to the details of that later. By the time that the Minister gets to his desk each morning, many of the children in my constituency will have been on the road for two hours. While he sips his steamy latte, although I do not know whether he drinks latte, they get bounced and swung through the lanes of Bridgwater in West Somerset; I suppose that a latte would have become a cappuccino by then. The school day in London lasts five hours. The school day in West Somerset and Bridgwater can last nine hours, simply because of distance. Children going to the two specialist schools in my constituency, Elmwood and Penrose, need a lot of care, but may be travelling for longer because they may be brought from without the county. As the Minister has kindly said, those two schools are marvellous.

The Minister may care to think back to the much trumpeted launch of the Government rural White Paper, which set out to fix the standards of life in rural constituencies such as mine. The idea was to have rural proofing in every aspect of Government business, and that included education. The Minister will not be able to answer this, but what happened to that White Paper, its ideas and ideals? Come to think of it, what happened to the money that we thought was going to come with it? I cannot answer that question. We have a problem, because one cannot expect local education authorities in rural areas to meet the idealistic aspirations of rural proofing without a great big fat wad of the folding stuff to make it happen.

Money, or the lack of it, is one of the abiding problems for teacher recruitment and retention in areas such as mine. There is an excellent TV advert campaign for teacher recruitment. I do not know who did it, but it is very good. It shows the rest of us leaving our heads at home when we go to work. The people shown who use their heads are those who teach.

That is the ideal, but I am afraid that the truth is different. Sometimes, teachers who use their heads think long and hard before coming to work in very rural areas such as Sedgemoor in West Somerset. It is a beautiful place. I recommend it to the Minister if he has not been. As he knows, it has excellent schools. However, housing and transport are a problem. Very big money is needed to buy anything but the humblest home on Exmoor and in the Quantocks. On the level of pay, it is more expensive to live in West Somerset than in London. That is a frightening statistic on what it costs to live in my area. Prices are slowing—the economy is changing a little—but they are still too high for almost everybody, including teachers.

In many cases, that means that teachers, like children, end up clocking more and more hours every day getting to school because they cannot afford to live near the schools where they teach. That is simply because of the price. They may have to commute from Bridgwater to West Somerset or from Taunton. They are forced to live where they can, and the one abiding thing is that that is always miles away.

There are three vacancies at the West Somerset community college. It is looking for a top-notch music and art teacher, a lunchtime supervisor and a very good technician to keep its IT equipment in order. The Minister will remember that the college got technology status through the Government's kindness. Such jobs are very worth while, but the people best qualified to apply may be based on the other side of the county, or possibly beyond it.

I hope that those vacancies and all others will be filled—and quickly. However, I am disturbed by the rapid turnover of teachers in our schools. I do not have a ready answer to the fundamental problems and I am not sure that the Minister has. We as a nation need to address that fundamental question. I know one thing—money talks. I also know that without money there will always be recruitment and retention problems. The Minister will realise that the national figure underlines that point. For every 100 students who complete their courses and become teachers, 68 drop out of the profession for ever within three years. That is not a good statistic—two thirds gone. I do not know what can be done about it. Those figures are from the Minister's Department.

If rural proofing means anything, it should mean financing a palpably higher level of education. There should be an allowance to help to attract the best teachers. That is a difficult concept. There should be more generous financial arrangements to help to pay for those long grim bus journeys to school.

A few weeks ago, the Minister announced that the Government's proposal for a new, green, safe, healthy school transport policy—after being at the American embassy all night, that is a tongue-twister—would become legislation as soon as time allowed, despite severe criticism of the Government's ideas from the Select Committee on Education and Skills. I suggest that the Committee keeps pushing.

The proposal involves, for the first time, means-testing. There would be no guarantee of a free bus ride if someone lives far from school. Under the Government's plans, it will be a question of how much mum and dad own. When suggesting means-testing, will the Minister please bear in mind the rural areas where we do not have that level of support? However, I am less concerned with means-testing than I am with the ethos of the School Transport Bill.

In a press statement a couple of weeks ago, the Minister admitted that the Government spend £500 million on school transport every year. I get the impression that he would prefer to spend a lot less. I expect that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would prefer to spend a lot less. I get the distinct impression that the Bill is being drawn up from an urban perspective rather than a rural one. I am happy to take the Minister's views on that.

The Minister claimed that 40 per cent. of primary school pupils and 20 per cent. of secondary school pupils are driven to school by car and that most of those journeys are less than two miles. The implication is that those journeys are unnecessary. In urban areas, I could not agree more.

I wonder whether the Minister would like to come to West Somerset to see some of the problems that we face in rural areas. I am sure that he would be welcomed. For us, the school bus run is not a luxury but a necessity. We have no choice but to take the bus—the distances are long and the journey is difficult. If the Bill includes a threat to the essential financing of school transport, the Minister will realise that people such as me who represent rural constituencies will have to oppose the Bill. We cannot see the benefits for rural areas.

I will try to persuade the Minister to treat Somerset and other rural areas more generously with a view to the problems that we face. That leads me to the role of the education authority and Somerset county council. There are several issues on which I invite the Minister to comment if he can. The first is potentially controversial. I refer to the needs of children with special needs. For those children, statements are made in order to trigger a statutory protest and to obtain classroom help. There is a widespread feeling in my constituency that the county issues statements on children too late. Learning and behavioural problems are identified early, but those children are only officially statemented after much of the damage has been done to the children's well-being, growth and inclusion in the class.

I will not identify specific schools, although I have had incidents in which head teachers and parents have come to me. I ask the Minister whether he will, through his Department, inquire whether that is a problem in the county. Somerset county council will obviously deny that there is a problem and I understand why, because statementing is always difficult. It costs a lot of money and one is never sure that one has done the right thing.

[Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger]

Yet again, the problem boils down to money. Special needs children cost money and Somerset just does not have that money. In February, as part of the national report of Somerset's lifelong learning portfolio holder, the following statement was made:

> "Unfortunately we are still not receiving even the national average of funding for our pupils, this year being undervalued by some £19 million".

It seems that Somerset has lost out in the horse-trading between the Minister's Department and the local authorities. I suspect that we were all too naive to realise that arguing for money was all about horse-trading. We come from a rural area. That is why I am in the Chamber again, badgering the Minister, banging the drum for action, blowing the trumpet for rural schools and boasting about the place in which I live, work and was educated. Somerset needs the help of the Minister, and I hope that he can reply to that.

11.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) on securing this debate. It enables us to continue our public discussion of some of the important issues that relate to education in rural areas, rural schools in general and schools in his Somerset constituency in particular.

It is timely that we meet today, because this afternoon I will have a regular meeting with the rural schools group. I meet a group of head teachers and people from relevant Government agencies and Departments to discuss some of the challenges that face schools in rural areas. I concur with what the hon. Gentleman says about those challenges and some of the differences between a constituency such as his and one such as mine. Some of the challenges that he faces, in the recruitment and retention of high-quality staff, for example, are in some ways similar to those faced in an urban constituency, but, as he clearly set out, some challenges are different and very particular. He is right to say that important work must be done to deal with them.

I will comment on the substantive item on which the hon. Gentleman closed—special educational needs. I agree with what he said about the special schools in his constituency, Penrose school and Elmwood school. I understand that they are working towards possible amalgamation, that that issue will be addressed locally and that Somerset more broadly is conducting a review of its special educational needs provision. Special educational needs is an important area. In our emphasis on high educational standards and inclusion, schools, whether rural or urban, must personalise their teaching and learning to the needs of the individual child.

Special schools will continue to play an important role in promoting high standards, personalised learning and inclusion. It is difficult to go beyond that statement with respect to Somerset's own review of special educational needs provision, other than to say that it is important that any review engages local people, including parents, pupils, Members of Parliament and the wider community.

The hon. Gentleman perfectly reasonably quoted some local authority statistics about local authority funding and the implications for special educational needs, and he related them to the challenge of recruitment and retention. We have touched on that in previous debates, initiated both by him and by other hon. Members representing constituencies in his county. He knows that we encountered some difficulties last year when we made fundamental changes to the school funding system. For this year and the coming three years, we have sought to bring about stability in the funding system, which has been generally welcomed.

The rural schools group has had many discussions about the new system. As the hon. Gentleman set out, one senses that rural schools feel it is not right for them, that they welcome the extra stability that we have brought in, but that they want us to return to the debate for the longer term. In the five-year strategy for children and learners that the Secretary of State for Education and Skills published shortly before the summer recess, we made it clear that, although in the short to medium term our priority was to provide schools with the stability and predictability that they had not had in recent years, particularly via three-year budgets, we accepted that there was still a debate about the formula, to which we shall return.

The purpose of the changes made to the funding formula is to have a system whereby children in identical circumstances in any part of the country are treated identically. That is what we sought to achieve with that basic level of funding per pupil, wherever the pupil might be.

We then have a number of factors for additional costs. As the hon. Gentleman and I discussed before coming into the Chamber, for a large county, the additional costs will vary between different parts of the county and I recognise that that is part of the picture for Exmoor and West Somerset. That puts a duty on us to get the national formula right, but also on the local authority to look at its local funding formula for schools. If the costs of recruitment and retention in one part of the county are significantly higher than in another part, it is the local education authority's responsibility, when it devises its local funding formula, to ensure that it is flexible enough for school budgets to meet the higher costs. The responsibility is shared. The school has its budget and must use it to great effect, the local authority has a responsibility to divide the money in a way that is equitable and meets the different needs of schools and communities, and we have a responsibility to ensure that the overall capital pot of money that is available to schools is right.

The hon. Gentleman will not be surprised if I use this opportunity to refer to some of the increases in spending that have occurred since 1997. In Somerset, the real-terms increase in expenditure on recurrent funding is £840 per pupil and there has been a significant increase in capital investment in schools. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that there is a decades-long need to improve buildings and equipment in schools. That improvement for Somerset local education authority has been an increase from just below £4 million in 1997–98 to an allocation last year of just below £20 million. That is a significant improvement and the money is desperately needed to ensure that children in the different communities in Somerset have the opportunities that, as he rightly reminded the Chamber, they have the right to receive from their schools.

The broad issue of the financial context clearly underpins many of the questions raised by the hon. Gentleman today about special educational needs, as well as the recruitment and retention of high-quality staff. He said that he did not have all the answers on recruitment and retention and I am happy to say that I do not have all the answers either. We need to learn from what works in different parts of the country. Schools have some flexibility, for example, to attract teachers into shortage subjects, and we will look at some of the possibilities. I undertake to write to him on that specific aspect to set out some of the options that might be available to schools that are suffering some of the recruitment and retention dilemmas and challenges that he set out clearly in his speech.

School transport is a fundamental challenge in all schools and, for obvious reasons, it is a particularly significant challenge in sparsely populated rural areas. Last week, the School Transport Bill had its Second Reading and it goes into Committee next week, when we shall have the opportunity to explore some of the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised, as well as some of the issues that were raised on Second Reading.

The hon. Gentleman correctly said that expenditure on school transport was around £500 million, which is a significant amount. I want to put it on record that I certainly do not come to the School Transport Bill with an agenda of seeking to cut that spending. My agenda is to try use that money more effectively to ensure that school transport is more widely available for students from all backgrounds. That is the central purpose of the Bill. It is an enabling Bill, which will enable a local authority, if it wishes, to pilot an alternative method of providing school transport. An authority that does not want to introduce a pilot will not be made to do so and will be able to remain within the terms of existing legislation, which goes back to the Education Act 1944.

It struck me during the debate last week that for some authorities the flexibility and options provided in the Bill may not be that helpful because, typically, students who use the school bus travel distances that are substantially longer than the two or three miles that are provided as the statutory walking distance in existing legislation. I am aware of that, and the School Transport Bill is only one aspect of a broader approach to promoting sustainable travel to school.

We certainly want a reduction in car use generally. Clearly, the better the quality and reliability of school buses, the less likely it is that parents in rural, semi-rural, suburban or urban areas will resort to using their car. The issues around safety and reliability that were explored on Second Reading will be considered in more detail as the Bill goes through Committee stage and on Report.

I emphasise that the School Transport Bill has strong cross-party support in local government. Expressions of interest have come from authorities led by each of the three main political parties, from authorities that have no overall control and from independents in local government. In his speech on Second Reading last week, the Secretary of State for Education and Skills made it clear that we would issue a series of stipulations before we agreed to any proposed measures to change the existing set-up.

I am fully aware that charging and means-testing are contentious. We shall explore those issues in Committee, but I wish to use this opportunity to reaffirm that the Bill is not a cost-cutting measure but a measure to promote more effective spending of what is presently spent and to promote sustainable travel from home to school.

It is important to note that the Bill does not redistribute money from rural to urban areas. I recognise that the transport requirements of rural areas and schools are different from and typically greater than those of suburban or urban areas. There is no suggestion that a predominantly rural authority will have any less money to spend on school transport as a consequence of the Bill, or that an urban or suburban authority will have any more. The Bill is about how authorities allocate and spend money in their own school budgets.

In my remaining two minutes, I wish to discuss an issue that the hon. Gentleman did not raise but which I know is of concern to him and to colleagues of all parties. Falling primary school roll numbers are a particular challenge in rural areas. Clearly, it is important that local government gets that right. Closing schools is only one option if primary school roll numbers are falling. Wherever practicable—I accept that it is not always practicable—we must consider other options as well, such as whether, instead of closing, smaller schools might become extended schools and use their spare capacity for other purposes. The five-year strategy sets out some options.

Federations are groups of schools that work together in formal and structured ways, sometimes under the provisions of the Education Act 2002. Federations are being considered in the discussions in Somerset, including for Penrose school and Elmwood school, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I encourage the innovation that the governors and heads of those schools are demonstrating by considering federations. The children's trusts that form part of the Children Bill that received Third Reading this week also offer potential to explore options for different uses of existing school buildings.

I am resolute in my support for rural schools. The Government recognise the differences between the type of school in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and the type of school in urban constituencies such as mine. I am confident that he and others will continue this important dialogue and ensure that we have further opportunities for such debates.

Department for Work and Pensions Services (North Staffordshire)

2 pm

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): I am pleased to have secured this most important debate on the services of the Department for Work and Pensions throughout Staffordshire and in north Staffordshire in particular.

I am a little disappointed, although I understand entirely, that the Minister for Work, who has direct responsibility for these services, cannot be with us today, but I should say from the outset how important it is that the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond) is in the Chamber. I know of his longstanding involvement with the Low Pay Unit and how much he has been concerned with combating poverty throughout his working life. I also know that he has worked very closely with Mr. Hugh Edwards, who is now the chairman of the Burslem Regeneration Company, which is tasked with regeneration of the Burslem area. I am sure that the Minister will be conversant with the issues that we will discuss this afternoon.

I ask the Minister to listen to our concerns and to take genuine account of them. I do not suggest for a moment that he has a script from his Department this afternoon, but if he does, I ask him not to stick to it entirely but to understand that north Staffordshire MPs care passionately about the area that they represent. We want the Government to modernise and to hold every penny to account, but by the same token we want to hold the Government to account in the way in which they administer their services on our behalf.

We should consider the matter in the round. I hope that the Minister will arrange a follow-up meeting to today's debate in Westminster Hall to address in some detail the particular concerns surrounding Burslem jobcentre, and that in the light of that careful reconsideration, we might find a more appropriate way of delivering the Department for Work and Pensions services that are so important to my constituents and people in the Burslem area in particular.

I am aware that this is a very broad issue, which relates to the services provided by the Department throughout north Staffordshire, and that other colleagues wish to pursue the matter in more detail. It is important that the targets set for the Department are met and that services are delivered so that work is promoted as the best form of welfare for people of working age while the position of those in greatest need is protected. It is also important that the Government require the Department to combat poverty and to promote security and independence in retirement for today's and tomorrow's pensioners. That, of course, involves customers receiving a high quality service in every region. All I am asking is that we receive that high quality service in north Staffordshire and in Burslem in particular.

I shall talk briefly about pension services, which are part of the wider agenda.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): I am listening carefully to the hon. Lady. Does she accept that the closure of the Stone and Cheadle jobcentres has caused immense damage to my constituency, and that the idea that they could be substituted by telephone lines or internet websites is simply absurd? I protest vigorously against this.

Ms Walley: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern, and I hope that he will have an opportunity in this debate or in further consultations with the Department to set out in more detail the effects that these changes are already having in that part of north Staffordshire.

We have been offered service improvements such as pensioners' surgeries, which have been a closely guarded secret in my area. Not many people know how to access them. Insufficient thought has been given to the front-line services that pensioners in north Staffordshire will require. Will the Minister examine how, under the new order that has been proposed, people will be best served by a processing centre in Wolverhampton. Some of us in north Staffordshire have a sense of déjà vu about such matters. Some years back, I remember arguing strongly that the Post Office should not relocate its sorting office in north Staffordshire to Wolverhampton. That caused us enormous difficulties and I should hate the so-called current rationalisation to result in a similar service, with no easy front-line service and people having to rely on call centres and telephones, not face-to-face contact with a trained and dedicated staff, which often makes the world of difference between receiving the service and not receiving it.

Telephone lines are not necessarily the best way in which to deal with people. They have a part to play, but they are not the only way in which to deliver the service. It bothers me that, in the Department's new vision, there will be less provision for face-to-face contact.The take-up of benefits is complex. To provide that service requires trained, experienced and dedicated front-line staff. Unless great care is taken in how the changes are brought about in north Staffordshire, we will lose an effective service.

I wish now to concentrate on the Burslem jobcentre. It is run by highly trained and committed staff and it is very much appreciated by people in the Burslem area. I pay tribute to the Department for Work and Pensions and its civil servants who look after the 34,000 or so people whom the office serves. The area has seen more job losses than most other areas in north Staffordshire, in the west midlands and in the country as a whole. The last remaining Royal Doulton factory is to close with a loss of 500 jobs. There have been job losses at Wedgwood and throughout the Potteries. Yes, we must bring in new jobs—that is part of our common task—but let us not escape the reality that those job losses are affecting people's lives now.

Set against that, there are new business developments, but in my area they are about 24 per thousand of population compared with the national average of 40. The area is identified as one of the five areas of deprivation by the Government office for the west midlands, and that is why we have such a proactive agenda for regeneration. On the specific instructions of the Secretary of State, the Department of Trade and Industry is making sure that the regional development agency, Advantage West Midlands, is looking at prioritising regeneration, new jobs and new training in the area.

A similar priority is being given to the agenda by the learning and skills council. Within Advantage West Midlands' remit is the North Staffordshire Regeneration Zone and, within that, is the Burslem Regeneration Company, chaired by Hugh Edwards, to which I referred in my opening comments. All such initiatives are in place to deal with people who have lost their jobs and to make sure that investment is made in the area, that we have training and that people are moving from sickness and incapacity into work. It is vital that the Department for Work and Pensions is integrated in all such services.

We also have Renew North Staffordshire, the housing market renewal pathfinder scheme, and Middleport and Burslem are the top priorities in that initiative. In his visit to Stoke-on-Trent, the Minister for Regeneration and the Regions, my noble Friend Lord Rooker, stressed that, whatever else the housing renewal programme does, it must link to the current economic regeneration in Burslem under the Burslem Regeneration Company project. Given that statement from my noble Friend, I should have thought that, at the least, civil servants at the Department for Work and Pensions would want to work with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Market renewal means that communities are in a fragile state because they are in transition, as a result of which they will need more support, not less. Surely that should have guided and informed the Department for Work and Pensions in its reconfiguration of services as a result of the modernisation programme. Such support needs to be maintained until such time as the housing renewal programme has been completed. I have other examples of Government support for what we are doing, and when I say "we" I mean all the partners across north Staffordshire who are working together against all the odds to build a better future for Burslem.

Just in case the Minister doubts the work that we are doing, I refer him to letters that I have had from the Department for Work and Pensions and to correspondence that I have received from the Treasury. The most recent letter, dated 3 September, sets out all that the Government are doing to support regeneration in Burslem, and ends with the comment:

> "The 2004 spending review revised the Department of Work and Pensions' public service agreement target in order to focus help more effectively on disadvantaged groups and areas"

That is what the Minister's Department should be doing for Burslem.

The crux of the problem is that we have effectively been given a fait accompli: that the Burslem jobcentre is to close. I want to know why, and why we have not been given the opportunity for real consultation on that.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Does the hon. Lady agree that in the letter on this subject in September—certainly the one that I received—the statement from the district manager that the > "new services represent a positive development for all of our customers and the long term improvements to our services will significantly outweigh any short-term deficiencies during the preparation", is absolutely appalling, and gives us no satisfaction whatever?

Ms Walley: I must say that it is rather strange to find myself agreeing so much with the hon. Gentleman. I received two letters, one of them early in the summer, that set out the thinking behind the long-term programme. I checked very carefully, as hon. Members would expect, whether Burslem was affected, and the original letter made no mention whatever of Burslem jobcentre closing. Somehow, between that original letter and the final letter that announced that the decision had been made, the fact that the Burslem jobcentre was to close crept in, with no reasoning given and no clear vision of why or how. It is that which I want to highlight today.

I state categorically that I have not been consulted on the 7 September letter's proposal to include Burslem, and I do not think that other partners delivering the regeneration agenda in north Staffordshire have been consulted either. That might rest on what is meant by "consultation". It might be that if other partners have had letters telling them that the Burslem office is to close, that is classed as consultation; but I do not count that as consultation, particularly given all the bodies that have been set up by the Government to deliver the most effective agenda.

I have looked very carefully at the 1999 White Paper "Modernising Government", and I cannot quarrel with any of its objectives. It mentions better provision and better services, including better services in jobcentres. It talks about the need for joined-up government and integrated government, commits us all to putting pressure on the obstacles to joined-up working through local partnerships, one-stop shops and other means, and commits the Government to area-based programmes. I go along with all those 1999 objectives, and I am sure that the Government are delivering them all in other parts of the country, but it does not seem as if they are in north Staffordshire.

I also go along with the objectives set out in Sir Peter Gershon's report. When he was addressing an all-party group in the House last night, I made it my business to go along and hear what he had to say on his report, which Ministers are taking very seriously. In that talk, just last night, he said clearly that the objectives of the modernisation programme were to release major resources to front-line services for the period 2005–06 to 2007–08. If that is the objective, it is hard to see how it is to be done in Burslem when the jobcentre there is to be closed. I sincerely bring that to the attention of the Minister.

There is also an issue, which I will come to later, about time scales. If we are meant to be saving money for the period 2005–06 to 2007–08, is the Minister really sure that that time scale is workable in terms of what is happening in Burslem? I am committed to the Lyons review and, along with my north Staffordshire colleagues, I have met local partners to see how we can make a sound business case for the relocation of civil service and private sector jobs from the south-east to north Staffordshire—an area in which there are issues because of the number of jobs that we have lost.

At a constituency meeting only four or five months ago, I remember talking about the importance of the Lyons review and trying to encourage Departments to relocate. Somebody said to me, "Joan, how can you talk about that when at the same time there is going to be an issue about closing local jobcentres?" We need to consider the matter in a joined-up way and I hope that today's debate will be an opportunity to do that.

The real problem for us in Burslem is that all the Government's objectives sound fine, but the reality of the way in which they are being implemented by the Department for Work and Pensions is completely different. It just does not match the vision. I have a series of questions. I hope that the Minister will consider them and that he and his colleagues will get back to me in the coming weeks.

How can the closure of the Burslem jobcentre office be presented as a done deal? The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) has already raised the issue of consultation. I just do not accept that it should be a done deal. Even at this 11th hour, is there an opportunity for the Minister to look again at what is being proposed? Why was there no mention of the closure in the original paper that went out under the original service delivery plan? If that had flagged up the possibility of closing Burslem jobcentre, I would have wanted early discussions with all the partners to see what could be done and whether, with the knowledge of those of us who are on the ground, rather than civil servants from elsewhere in the west midlands, we could not have come up with a more workable solution. We want the very best service.

As I have said, according to the original plans the Burslem jobcentre was to stay open. What changed between that service delivery plan and the fait accompli letter of 7 September? Why was there not proper consultation? The Minister will see from dispatches that I was not told about this matter, but nor were those involved with the north Staffordshire regeneration zone or the housing renewal pathfinder given an opportunity to consider the issues raised.

Given that the Minister is answerable to Parliament for the service delivery, how can he be satisfied that the so-called estates challenge, which relates to the White Paper, is anything other than a pure cost-cutting exercise with regard to the way in which it has been implemented in north Staffordshire? I understand that a service administered by civil servants in Staffordshire is under pressure to get rid of uneconomic buildings and floor space, and that the state of buildings and access for disabled people may need to be considered and re-examined. If there are opportunities for shared buildings, of course we should go down that route. Those are all material considerations that should have been taken into account.

However, I wonder just how much of the rationale for the closure of the Burslem jobcentre relates to the rents charged by Land Securities Trillium. Should not the driving factors be about the level of need in the Burslem area? Given that level of need, it makes no sense to have proposals to close the office serving the area. If we look at the figures, it is the area of greatest need. What account has been taken of that? Will the Minister look at the figures? I do not know whether I have the most up-to-date figures. I am sure that he will correct me if I am wrong, but it seems to me that we are talking about an area with an overall population of about 36,000. In the Burslem area, something like 4,730 people are on incapacity benefit. Surely those people should be our priority group. Surely they are the people who need front-line face-to-face interviews with trained, dedicated staff to get them into work and to help us create the new investment that we need for the area.

If the Government are as serious as I am about meeting their public service agreement targets, they should be concentrating on the number of people on incapacity benefits. It is difficult enough for constituents to claim and to go through the process of getting into work following incapacity. Some of my constituents find that path so painful and difficult that they prefer staying in poverty to trying to find a way out. It can be difficult from here in Westminster to understand the levels of poverty and need that exist.

How will the Government deliver their improved services to lone parents, those on new deal, the 18 to 24-year-olds and the over-50s, when they have closed the Burslem jobcentre and people are asked to change the habits of a lifetime by travelling elsewhere? If the Minister has time to visit Stoke-on-Trent, it would be helpful if he did so. We could show him that Stoke-on-Trent is not like most other cities where there is one dedicated city centre; it is a collection of six towns, where people still do not venture outside the area they live in, even if they can afford the bus fares.

The incapacity benefit load is a big issue in Stoke-on-Trent, and particularly in Burslem. I do not see how the Government can meet their targets for getting people from benefit into work without the specialist help of the jobcentre advisers or the support of the local community. This is not the right way to go about getting its support.

The Minister should look at the time scale of all the work that is under way as a consequence of the North Staffordshire Regeneration Zone's initiatives. Had that body been properly consulted about the Burslem closure rather than told about it, I suspect that it could have got all the many partners together around the table and looked closely at what has been proposed within the context of the time scales that it is working to.

There is a need for more support for Burslem, not for less. I will be reminding the Minister for Work at every opportunity that she is responsible for the delivery of the wider objective of full employment in every region over the three years to 2008. I want her to make a good job of that in Burslem. I hope that as a result of this debate we can proceed with a follow-up meeting to look in detail at how we can achieve it collaboratively.

The modernisation agenda is all very well and good, but I owe it to my constituents to put their needs at the heart of an integrated policy. That has not been done, but there is still time to revisit the matter.

2.23 pm

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): I am grateful for this opportunity to contribute to the debate, and I congratulate my constituency neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley), on securing it. I am surprised that the issues we are discussing have not received greater prominence both in the press and the House. My hon. Friend has done the House in general a service in raising them, because these problems are not confined to north Staffordshire or to her constituency—or even to that of the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash); they affect the whole country, as I am sure other contributors to this debate will emphasise.

My hon. Friend admirably spelled out the particular problems that her constituents will face with the closure of the Burslem jobcentre. Towards the end of her remarks she touched on the strange geography of our city. It is the only non-radial city in the country. It stretches for 13 miles along a valley, and there is no contact into the city centre. Therefore, closures of services in the outlying—the constituent—towns of Stoke-on-Trent always cause problems. We do not have an easily accessible city centre of the kind that on paper perhaps makes sense of closures of commercial or government branch offices because people can get their services by going into that city centre.

We have particular geographical problems, and my hon. Friend described them very well. She was also particularly impressive when dealing with the inconsistent impact of what the Government and we are trying to do in terms of regeneration in north Staffordshire, so I will not return to those matters. I will not even labour the case that has been put to me by staff working in the Hanley jobcentre about the job losses. They made a powerful, moving case and I was impressed by their dedication. For many staff, working in jobcentres is not simply a way to earn a living; they become involved in the delivery of services and with their clients. For front-line staff in the benefits agencies, there is a large element of vocational work involved, with satisfaction gained from helping vulnerable people get what is rightly theirs. However, although that dedication impressed me, that is not why I want to contribute to this debate.

I am concerned about the services that those people provide to my constituents and benefits claimants generally throughout the country, because the changes that the Government are implementing in north Staffordshire and all over the United Kingdom will severely undermine them. The hon. Member for Stone quoted from the letter from a district manager of the Department for Work and Pensions, saying: "This was a positive development." That is incomprehensible. It is difficult to see how this is a positive development for my constituents, or makes better provision or a better service. My constituents, and claimants all over the country, will find it more difficult to get what is rightfully theirs. They need help and advice.

The Minister had an admirable record in the Low Pay Unit, working with people in poverty, before he was elected to the House. He, of all members of this Government, knows the reality of life for people on low incomes—they have never found the details of the welfare state easy to grasp and are particularly vulnerable to the complexities. Given the many passionate speeches he made to conferences on poverty, he must know why such a large proportion of benefits are unclaimed each year from time immemorial. That problem has been inherent in the welfare state over the past 50 years, and it has nothing to do with this Government or the previous one.

The complexity of the system means that there is a relatively low take-up and so much unclaimed by the people who need it most, and to whom it would make the greatest difference to the quality of their life. People in desperate need of benefit—lone parents, unemployed people and those with disabilities, as my hon. Friend said—are vulnerable and do not have first-class degrees and the ability to understand the fine print of documents. That is why they get ripped off by loan sharks and are vulnerable to almost all problems in life that involve bureaucracy. They, of all people, need help when filling in forms. People working in the Benefits Agency and jobcentres have been providing just that. They hold the hands of people as they go in and they sit down with them, giving advice and ensuring that the form is understandable and correctly filled in. That is essential for the claimant and good for the system, because the form is properly completed and is not returned or junked. That makes for a more efficient delivery of the service, but it is not why it is important; it is important because it is often the only way a person can get what they are rightfully entitled to.

All Members of Parliament know about such problems from constituents who attend our surgeries. They have probably seen a counsellor and asked for advice first, after which they see us and ask for our advice. They often bring forms to our surgeries to be completed, but I often find that I do not trust myself to help fill them in because I do not understand them. I am the worst person to give advice and would hate to see my constituents leave with their form wrongly completed. I usually say, "Please don't take it from me. We haven't got time"—it takes 20 minutes or half an hour to go through a form properly, and many other problems in their lives may be uncovered, revealing their entitlement to other benefits—"and I am not the person to do it. I am just an MP—a generalist and non-expert. Please go to your citizens advice bureau, talk to your social worker, if you have one, and go to the benefits agencies, which will help." I have been saying that to my constituents for the past 21 years, and I think it is good and sensible advice.

If we Members of Parliament—who have nice degrees and lots of experience, and who are quite articulate and confident with forms—do not trust ourselves to fill in forms for our constituents, how on earth can many of them fill them in? Some deal with the forms amazingly and admirably, but others have always gone into benefits agencies and said, "Please help me fill in this form." We cannot help them; how on earth will it help when they are told, under the changes, "Get on the phone, or online, and sort it out"? We know from our work as MPs that it is much less satisfactory, both for our constituents and for us, when people ring in with problems than when they sit down with us at our surgeries. Some people are not very confident on the phone, and one cannot pick up on nuances and see where the problems are. If we are trying to help someone with a form that we cannot see, and which is front of him and he is not reading it correctly, we are absolutely lost.

The idea that the most vulnerable people in desperate need are to be told to ring someone in Birmingham, whom they do not know and who does not know what sort of estate they live on, who will help them through their claim for entitlement is frankly extraordinary. There is no way that can be described as an improvement in service, a modernisation or a positive development. For my constituents, it will be a disaster. They may try that system once or twice, but it is unlikely to lead to a satisfactory outcome, and they will give up.

[Mr. Mark Fisher]

As for telling them to get online, many of my constituents do not have telephones; they certainly do not have computers.

I am hopelessly computer-illiterate. I tried to fill in an application form online, but I kept going round in circles and gave up after a bit. Perhaps I am particularly crass, stupid and old; I have just had my 60th birthday, and by God I felt it when I filled in the form. I wanted to join eBay, and it is apparently simple. Everyone says, "Oh, it's easy; it'll take you 10 minutes, and they'll hold your hand throughout the process," but after some 25 minutes I gave up and did not join because I could not work out the system. If I cannot work out something as simple as eBay, which just involves filling in the right details, God help my constituents—forgive my language, Mr. Deputy Speaker—when they fill in their forms, which are about matters of central importance to them and their income for life.

I beg the Minister to look into the system again, because it is not right, although it may look fine. As my hon. Friend said, we all want the Government not to be wasteful, and we all want them to modernise where it is sensible, and so on. We have all signed up to that, and it is not a problem, but when it comes to how we help the poorest members of our society obtain access to the benefits that are rightfully theirs, that desire for efficiency and modernisation must surely be tempered with some human understanding of where those people are coming from and what it is realistic to expect from them, in both the short and medium term.

I fear that the system will lead to considerable poverty and reduction in access. Even if we are talking about only a few tens of thousands of cases a year, it is tens of thousands of the very poorest people in our constituencies who will suffer. I am most upset, as hon. Members can see; I am as upset as my constituents are. I am sure that the scheme makes sense to the Department, which will be able to tell the Treasury that it is using public money very efficiently.

The idea looks good on paper, and for some people who are more confident than I am about filling in online forms it will undoubtedly work in theory, too. Obviously, some people will make the system work. If they do, and it saves the Government money and is not inconvenient for those people, great; that will perhaps speed things up. But to go over so wholeheartedly to a new system with so few and so basic safety nets is bitterly regrettable. I fear that it is too late for a pilot study, but I ask the Minister to consider quickly conducting some study of how the system will work in practice, whether there will be a fall-off in applications and correctly filled-in applications, how many people will use the internet generally and in particular areas, and what successful conclusions can be drawn from those cases that go online. I would be amazed if such a study did not confirm at least some of the fears that I have tried to express this afternoon.

Perhaps I am underestimating the online skills of my constituents and they would in fact be quite happy to stay at home or try to find somebody online on their estate and not flock to Hanley on expensive buses. If I am patronising them by saying that they will have difficulty with online services, I would be very pleased to be proved wrong. I do not know how much consultation there was in advance, but it is not too late for the Minister to conduct a study of how the service is working in practice, talking to those people delivering and receiving it. Perhaps the study will lead to ways of putting in more safety nets to ensure that when people need and want personal services that they have had ever since the welfare state began, those services will continue to be available.

2.46 pm

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) on securing the debate. I also congratulate the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) on his able contribution.

The hon. Gentleman said in his opening comments that he was sure that subsequent speakers would point out that the problems relating to the closure of the Burslem centre are not unique, and indeed they are widespread and national. Through my regular contact with the unemployed workers centre in Chesterfield and its network of smaller offices, particularly in the Derbyshire coalfield, I hear of those problems. In 2003, there were three such closures that mirror exactly the problems in Burslem that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North described in such detail. Offices were closed in New Mills, which is in the High Peak area in the north of Derbyshire, in Bakewell, a west Derbyshire area, and in Eckington, a north-east Derbyshire community, just to the north of my constituency. All closed in 2003 as part of the general centralisation and cost-cutting process.

The example of the Eckington centre particularly mirrors that of Burslem, because it is in a deprived coalfield area that suffered tremendous job losses when the pits were closed down overnight 10 to 12 years ago. It suffered particularly from the closure of the local Renishaw foundry, an issue that the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) has raised on several occasions in the House.

Eckington is a regeneration area. As with Burslem and north Staffordshire, it is supposed to receive regeneration support precisely because of the deprivation concentrated there. Yet the local jobcentre that provides such support to people in that area is closed. That means, for example, that residents of Eckington and of the Killamarsh area who went to Eckington, must either go to Sheffield to access services or visit the Chesterfield or Staveley offices in my constituency, the latter being nearer. They have to travel some distance to other areas to access the services that were once provided on their doorstep in the middle of deprived communities.

Colin Hampton, the organiser at the unemployed workers centre in Chesterfield, has done a certain amount of outreach work and campaigning, and when he has been at the Staveley jobcentre on the edge of my constituency, next to North-East Derbyshire, he has talked to some of the people who must visit it because of the closure of the Eckington office. They have said that they have to walk several miles from Eckington to the jobcentre because they cannot afford the bus fare. The people who are being hit by those closures are among the poorest in society. They are most in need of those services, but have to walk a number of miles to the nearest office to get them.

There is some confusion on this issue. When I visited the Chesterfield Jobcentre Plus office, one member of staff told me, off the record, that staff were allowed to tell claimants in that situation that they could be provided with bus fares, but were not supposed to volunteer the information. Staff could tell the claimant only if they were asked. I am sure that the Minister will reassure me and say that that is not the case and that staff are advised to be proactive.

There is another possible area of confusion, about which Colin Hampton talked. Perhaps such fares apply not to new claimants but only to existing claimants whose jobcentre has closed and who have had to move further afield, to Sheffield or Staveley, to access services. There is some uncertainty among the people who work at the jobcentre and on the part of someone who works full time at the unemployed workers centre in Chesterfield. Hopefully, the Minister will be able to clarify that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Edward O'Hara): Order. As has been said, there is a general point to be made, which the hon. Gentleman illustrated by reference to his constituency, but I remind him that the debate is mainly about Department for Work and Pensions services in north Staffordshire.

Paul Holmes: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that I explained why I was making such comparisons. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central said that he was sure that subsequent speakers would point out that the problem was nationwide. It is not an isolated one-off. I do not think that the Minister will be able to address the problem completely by talking about one isolated instance, given that the programme is nationwide, with a nationwide pattern.

The general context for the closure of Burslem jobcentre and others, touched on by the two previous speakers, is the modernisation process, the Gershon efficiency review and the 100,000 civil service job cuts, which heavily hit the Department for Work and Pensions. What is the rationale for such closures? One argument is that they will bring the benefits of centralisation and that technology means that we do not need so many outreach stations. As we heard from the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, provision of electronic and internet services will solve some of the problems. Human beings will not be on the doorstep, but people will be able to access electronic machinery, perhaps through local libraries.

So one argument is that centralisation brings more efficiency and allows money to go into better services, and another relates to the use of electronic processes. There is also the argument that the introduction of better computer services into jobcentres means that a more efficient service can be provided—fewer staff are needed because the computer takes a lot of the strain—and that not so many staff are needed in the central building because more centres are scattered around the country, have economies of scale and do everything electronically.

However, all that is based on a myth. We have heard a lot of detail, ably explained, about the fact that many people—especially the unemployed, people on benefits and the elderly in Burslem—do not have an easy familiarity with modern technology or easy access to the hardware and software that facilitates it. In jobcentres, the problem is that a lot of the technology on which the streamlining and rationalisation are based has not worked effectively. Not long ago, the Department for Work and Pensions Committee issued a scathing report on the failures of the IT systems that were supposed to introduce more efficiency and that predicated the closure of small centres such as Burslem.

People have to be slightly sceptical and ask whether the 100,000 job cuts—Burslem is just one small cog in that machine—are based on efficiency and the better delivery of services or whether that figure has been chosen because it is nice and round? If the efficiency cuts are based on a proper, rational assessment of where services are overprovided or no longer needed, why does the figure come out at a nice, round 100,000 rather than at 63,000 or 106,000? Is it just a nice, round figure that is good for headlines, like the target of 50 per cent. entry into higher education? That was plucked out of the air as a nice, round figure that is good for media journalists. There seems to be no proper analysis of where the efficiency savings and closures of small, inefficient units in favour of more efficient units elsewhere should take place. If there has been a proper, rational analysis of where such cuts should take place, why is it that some time after announcing 100,000 job cuts the Government still cannot say specifically where many of the closures and job cuts will occur?

We would not argue that taxpayers' money should be spent on a job that does not actually exist. If the work of the Burslem jobcentre was unnecessary, it would obviously be a gross misuse of taxpayers' money to keep it open. If there were more efficient ways of providing the service, one could not argue against closure, as long as there were not strong downsides resulting from the loss of service. If there is waste of taxpayers' money, fine, that should be reversed and the money should be spent better.

However, if anything, the Department for Work and Pensions staff provide services to the most vulnerable and needy members of society, as we heard in the Burslem example. Centres such as Burslem serve people on benefits or pensions. They include jobseekers, particularly jobseekers in the most hard-to-place categories and people who need the most help from a personal service rather than a distant, impersonal service over a computer line; disabled people, 1 million of whom say that they want to get into work but have numerous problems to overcome before they can access such a service; older people over 50 who have particular problems getting back into work; and people who are less qualified. If anything, a rational analysis would suggest that, rather than cutting a centre such as Burslem and saving money on staff, more staff with better pay, and more, not fewer, outreach centres are needed.

A parallel is the question about the Pension Service that I asked the Minister in oral questions some time ago. In September, the local Pension Service staff were praised in Parliament for going into the community to visit pensioners at home who were not claiming pension credit, and helping them to access pension credit and many other benefits that they may have been missing out on. Yet some of those staff may lose their jobs in the modernisation and efficiency job cuts. If people who deliver front-line services lose their jobs, the vulnerable people who benefit from their work will lose out on access to services.

The Department is one of the lowest payers among Government Departments, if not the lowest. I visited a job brokering service in London that is run by Working Links. It pays its personal advisers £21,000, whereas the Department starts their staff on £12,000 to £14,000. Far from cutting a centre such as Burslem and removing the staff completely, such local centres should be kept, and the pay, training and conditions of staff who work under great pressure in delivering key services should be improved.

We must consider the aggressive management style of the Department and the introduction in the centres of performance pay, which has been controversial because of the artificial quotas that determine who qualifies for different levels of pay. We must also consider whether staff training is adequate. A comparable example—again, this is not Burslem—would be some of the unemployed workers centres around the Chesterfield coalfield area. It is reported that, because the small local jobcentres do not have enough staff or their staff are not adequately trained, claimants are sent to unemployed workers centres to ask simple, basic questions about, for example, the new minimum wage or how to access such and such a service.

To conclude, rational analysis of the Burslem centre and other examples nationwide would show that, far from removing such services, we should be increasing the number of small outreach centres and improving the pay, training and facilities for the staff who work in them. I hope that the Minister will respond to many of those specific points about the loss of services to vulnerable, needy people and to a regeneration area into which the Government are putting extra resources with one hand while removing resources with the other hand. Whether in Burslem in north Staffordshire or in the Derbyshire coalfield, there is a need to improve Department services in general rather than to slash them.

2.49 pm

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) on securing this debate, which has proved very interesting. When I was preparing for it, I was struck by the similarity between the points that are being made in north Staffordshire and the points that are being made to me in Chichester. I will not linger long in discussing Chichester, save to say that I have a two-page letter from a constituent, Mr. Michael Cameron, which is more or less a summary of the points made in the debate. It is important that the Minister takes on board the fact that the concerns that are being addressed in north Staffordshire are concerns of national significance.

I sympathise with the Minister. In this debate, he is responding at a micro-level to the consequences of the rolling-out of the policy to which the hon. Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes) alluded. That is, of course, the sudden policy completely to reverse the large increase in recruitment into the civil service that has taken place for most of the last seven years and start shedding civil service jobs at a high rate. The figure of 100,000 job losses was mentioned. The Department for Work and Pensions is scheduled to lose 30,000 jobs. In addition, the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North mentioned the Lyons review, which involves the relocation of civil servants and is causing widespread concern in Chichester and many other constituencies.

I referred to the points made by Mr. Cameron. One of them was exactly the same as one of the points made by the hon. Member for Chesterfield. He is understandably concerned about the employment prospects of staff in jobcentres. Will the Minister say how many redundancies there will be in Longton, Staffordshire Moorlands and Leek? He has not yet been asked directly what the number will be, but I am interested to know. How many of those staff will be relocated? Has that been thought through? Are those relocations feasible? While he is at it, perhaps he would send me a letter answering the same questions about Chichester.

What about the people who use jobcentres? The issue has been raised at some length by a number of hon. Members. Let me address a couple of questions. One is: how far will people be expected to travel under the new regime, with far fewer centres available? I note that a Labour local councillor, Paul Robinson, referring to the Leek jobcentre, said:

> "It is not fair to expect people to have to travel to Hanley or Longton, about £3.50 on the bus, just to sign on for benefits. Those people will be struggling for money as it is."

I was particularly struck by the comments made by the hon. Gentleman, who pointed out that some people have been told that money is available, but only if specifically asked for and only if the person is alert enough to realise that that protection is available. Is the figure of £3.50 in the right ballpark? Will the Minister confirm whether travel cost assistance is available? Are we mistaken? What about disabled people? They have not been mentioned so far. They are not in a good position to travel long distances for these interviews.

Will the Minister provide a general clarification on another point? I may be wrong, but as I understand it, the roll-out of Jobcentre Plus is scheduled to be completed by April 2006. Why is Longton jobcentre not scheduled for closure until 2008? Will its service overlap with the new Jobcentre Plus scheme or is the Jobcentre Plus office deemed to provide an insufficient service on its own? Before coming to the debate, I looked at a map and could not understand the logic of what is proposed for the area. Perhaps I do not know enough about the local area, but the Minister should try to respond to the point that I have touched on.

Many of the other points that I might have made were made by other hon. Members and I shall not repeat them. I conclude by making two general points. First, there is undoubtedly a case for rationalisation. That always causes tension and I sympathise with the Minister. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) made a crucial point about the internet, citing himself. Some of the rationalisation that we are seeking to undertake may be premature. In 10 or 20 years, a whole generation of people will have learned elementary techniques in modern communication and will be much more able to cope with the sort of rationalisation that is proposed. Is it right to do it now? I am not convinced that it is.

My second point is even more general. The Minister's difficulty is a subset of deep tension, which we face in many areas of public policy, between the savings from centralisation—for example, bigger hospitals—and the erosion of a sense of locality and local community, with the decline in the number of post offices, the transport system, the number of local shops and so on. That tension will not go away, but will get worse for all of us. I worry that the Government may not have thought through carefully the implications for local communities, particularly in rural areas and areas that are not close to large conurbations. I do not question the Government's intentions. What I am concerned about is whether they have thought through carefully enough what they are applying.

2.57 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) on securing this important debate and on highlighting some important issues about the provision of Jobcentre Plus services to her constituents. She is known in the House as an energetic and effective campaigner on behalf of her constituents, as was well demonstrated today.

My hon. Friend will acknowledge, as she has done previously, that there has been a significant reduction in the overall level of unemployment in her constituency, as elsewhere in the country, as a result of the new deals and stable macro-economic policy. Overall unemployment at 2.1 per cent. is slightly below the national average and long-term unemployment, especially among young people, has fallen by more than three quarters. However, that part of north Staffordshire, as my hon. Friend reminded us this afternoon, has been hit hard by manufacturing losses, especially in the ceramics industry. As she said, one of the people who are closely involved in seeking to stem such losses and to find alternative employment for people is my good friend, the chair of the Burslem Regeneration Company, Hugh Edwards. Perhaps I should declare an interest, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because he was the chair of the Low Pay Unit of which I was once the director.

As a Government, we give all the support we can to manufacturing, as hon. Members appreciate, but we cannot wholly protect people from the winds of economic change, which is often global. What we can do and what we should do is help people to adapt to those changes and build on the new opportunities when they arise from the dynamic economy in which we live. That is where the services of Jobcentre Plus come in. The House will know that it combines the former Employment Service and those parts of the former Benefits Agency responsible for paying benefits to people of working age. Bringing two agencies together means not only that we have a more efficient operation but that we can provide better quality services to the people whom we seek to serve. We have strengthened the link between receiving benefits on the one hand and the world of work opportunity and independence on the other.

I can tell my hon. Friend and others who have contributed to a very useful debate this afternoon that Jobcentre Plus services are not just about office accommodation but about services in the broadest sense, which we can provide in several different and flexible ways. We have heard about service provision by telephone and, in some circumstances, by internet. I take very much to heart the points made in the debate by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) and others that the internet does provide huge opportunities for many people, but that it does not provide access for many others. That is why we also want to ensure that we provide the sort of personal service that people so often need.

The constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North has a high proportion of people on incapacity benefit. She will know that we are considering through the pathways-to-work pilots new and innovative ways of supporting people on incapacity benefit who want to return to work, as the majority do. I appreciate the points that she and others have made about the difficulties sometimes presented by the need to travel albeit a short distance—in this case, to Hanley—but those on incapacity benefit have always reported to Hanley rather than to Burslem, so this will not be a significant change for them, although we do need to ensure that we consider all the time ways of providing more appropriate services to them.

My hon. Friend asked whether the changes that we have been discussing this afternoon are a fait accompli. I assure her that they are not. They are part of an ongoing consultation, which we have not yet completed, on the configuration of Jobcentre Plus services in her part of north Staffordshire. We want to discuss with her and with other hon. Members who are affected, as well as with all the other stakeholders, new and innovative ways in which we can help people to seek work in her constituency. Those ways include the possibility of enhanced outreach facilities, postal signing where appropriate, and even mobile jobcentre services and home visits for those who need them.

The consultation will therefore not only be about whether Burslem jobcentre should continue but about whether there are other ways in which we can provide even better services to the people whom my hon. Friend represents.

Paul Holmes: In the context of the consultation on whether Burslem jobcentre should close, which the Minister reassures us is ongoing, does he have a rough idea of what percentage of local jobcentres throughout the country have been kept open following the consultation in the past year or two? I can think of three examples in Derbyshire.

Mr. Pond: The hon. Gentleman tempts me to stray into a wide range of issues, but given that this is a debate about north Staffordshire, perhaps I should state for the record that when he talked about a reduction of 100,000 members of staff at the Department for Work and Pensions, that was not 100,000 members of staff in north Staffordshire. Some people might believe that it was, given that he raised the issue in this debate.

[Mr. Pond]

Each decision about the closure, merging or improvement of any of the Jobcentre Plus services is a matter for individual consideration. I therefore cannot tell the hon. Gentleman how many jobcentres remained open throughout the country following the consultation. In any case, that figure would be irrelevant, because it would not show that we had a target to close x percent. of jobcentres.

Ms Walley: The Minister's remark that the closure of Burslem jobcentre is not a fait accompli is welcome news. I want to press him a little further about the timetable for the current consultation. I understand that decisions have been reached. As a result of our debate, is my hon. Friend saying that there is an extended period for consultation? Will he confirm that the parties he envisages sitting round the table will include the North Staffordshire Regeneration Zone and the Burslem Regeneration Company?

Mr. Pond: We will be happy to have discussions with all the relevant stakeholders. The process is not yet complete. I cannot give my hon. Friend the assurance that, as a result of those consultations, we will be able to go back on a set of proposals that, from careful consideration, suggest that such action is the way forward. However, we shall be happy to discuss my hon. Friend's concerns with her and others. What has been said in the debate will certainly be part of the discussions.

Ms Walley: In the light of what the Minister has just said and given that the various options will be considered, will he put in the public domain the economic factors that are involved in such matters? Will he explain the cost of the rentals? Can we look at such matters in an open way, so that we can see how the money spent can deliver the service that best meets the needs of my constituents? I do not want the review to be informed by factors such as where most money can be saved, instead of how we can best meet the requirements of people with different benefit needs and who need jobcentre support.

Mr. Pond: Indeed. If I may, I shall say more about the matter in a moment. My hon. Friend has anticipated some of my comments. As for the time scale, the end of the consultation process is discretionary. From our point of view—and, I think, from hers—we want to complete the process by Christmas. I am sure that she will appreciate that.

I will be pleased to meet at the earliest opportunity the manager of the Jobcentre Plus district, who I am sure will pay careful attention to our discussions this afternoon, as will my right hon. Friend the Minister for Work, who is unable to participate in today's debate. As part of our consultation process, we need to examine various alternative flexible ways in which to deliver the service. In some parts of the country, there have been exciting examples of that.

I wish to stray slightly out of north Staffordshire to Hereford and Worcester district, which has been developing flexible services that are designed around customers' needs. It has worked with partners in nine locations to deploy job points and customer access telephones through, for instance, University college in Worcester, three libraries, Bromyard one-stop service centre, Hereford help point, Kington community resource centre and Wychavon district council. We need to consider imaginatively how best we can serve the needs of people in constituencies such as that of my hon. Friend.

As for the Burslem proposal, my hon. Friend will know that it is expected that 80 per cent. of customers will be accessing Hanley jobcentre. It will provide purpose-built premises and excellent transport links, and as it is one of the larger offices it will also provide a wider range of facilities through a larger staff.

Ms Walley: Can the Minister explain the time scale for the proposed Hanley office to be up and running?

Mr. Pond: I will come back to my hon. Friend in a moment on that specific point.

Several hon. Members have referred to the consultation process. My hon. Friend was right to say that, when we first looked at the matter in September 2003, it seemed that Burslem should remain open as part of the service delivery plan. She will know that, when we considered the matter again in September 2004, circumstances had changed. A number of factors emerged from that reconsideration. The reconsideration involved extensive consultation with a number of stakeholder organisations. What had happened between those two dates? We looked at the cost of refurbishing the Burslem jobcentre to bring it up to the sort of standard that my hon. Friend would agree her constituents deserve in terms of space, disability access and general state of repair, and that cost was very considerable.

In the meantime, there was the efficiency challenge that the Department has taken up. That challenge was not about simply making cuts across the board on a proportionate basis, as the hon. Member for Chesterfield suggested; it was about discovering how we could best provide the highest quality of service to our customers within the efficiency constraints with which we are faced.

Ms Walley: May I press the Minister on his undertaking that there was consultation with other stakeholders? Will he make available the full text of that consultation and the responses from those stakeholders?

In respect of the cost of upgrading the Burslem office, I have been pressing previous Ministers for 17 years for the investment in the Burslem office that has been needed for it to meet all the desired standards. I am not saying that the service must be continued in that building for ever, but I am saying that there should be a jobcentre presence in Burslem.

Mr. Pond: I shall write to my hon. Friend about the consultation process. I am told that 196 letters were issued, and I understand that she was one of the recipients of them, along with Hayward hospital, Beat the Cold, the Hibiscus project, the North Staffs Carers Association and 40 Stoke-wide bodies, including disability organisations.

My hon. Friend looks as if she wants to intervene again. If she wants to do so to tell the House that she was not part of that consultation process and that she did not receive notification of it, we should discuss that further when she meets my right hon. Friend the Minister for Work, and I will be happy to discuss it with her myself. Does my hon. Friend wish to intervene again?

Ms Walley: I am loth to do so. I simply want to make the point that the key issue is whether people were told that there would be a proposal to close the jobcentre, and whether they were invited to come up with constructive ideas as to how we could provide the service. I am very grateful for having been allowed to intervene in this way.

Mr. Pond: My hon. Friend asked about the time scale for the new Hanley office; the answer to that is by the end of 2006.

Before the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) sadly had to leave the Room, he made a point about reliance on the telephone and internet services. Unfortunately, he will be unable to hear me say that we are not simply relying on those services. I understand that he has raised that as an issue in his local press in relation to the closure of the Stone and Cheadle jobcentres. He also raised it briefly in the debate, before his departure. However, I have to say that he has not raised it with the Department for Work and Pensions or Jobcentre Plus. We would welcome the opportunity—perhaps it will arise if he reads the Hansard record of this debate—to discuss with him the ways in which we are seeking to meet the needs of his constituents given the reconfiguration of those services, and the way in which people will be able to access face-to-face services in Stafford and Hanley.

I am sure that if the hon. Gentleman were present he would wish to join us in celebrating the fact that as a result of the reduction in unemployment in his constituency the number of people on the jobseeker's allowance register in Stone is now under 200 and in Cheadle it is even smaller, which is why the House will understand that it is not feasible to maintain both or either of those offices.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central made a point about support for the most vulnerable to claim the benefits to which they are entitled. Like him, we are committed to increasing take-up of benefits and ensuring that people receive the help to which they are entitled. Part of that involves making the claims process as simple and straightforward as possible.

My hon. Friend raised concerns about the use of technology and shared with us very honestly his anxieties about the use of the internet. We are ensuring that, while some people can use that process, there are still opportunities for face-to-face contact for those who cannot. I mentioned some of the ideas about mobile Jobcentre Plus services and other ways in which people could access those services on a face-to-face basis, even were the decision to close Burslem jobcentre to go ahead.

My hon. Friend also raised the issue of whether we piloted the process. There was extensive piloting through the 56 pathfinder offices to establish Jobcentre Plus. That taught us a great deal about joining up services and ensuring that we could provide people with a one-stop-shop approach.

The hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) asked how many redundancies we anticipated as a result of the changes in north Staffordshire and Chichester, and whether I would write to him about Chichester. Given that we are currently discussing north Staffordshire, that would be the appropriate way of replying. However, I suspect that the answer in that letter will be very similar to that which I am about to give in relation to north Staffordshire: although it is too early to give specific commitments on redundancies, he will know that we consider redundancy to be only a last resort as part of the process of meeting the efficiency challenge. The process is not about reducing the level of jobs.

The hon. Gentleman will also know that, with Jobcentre Plus, we have been reducing the number of people who fulfil some of the roles that have been sometimes unkindly described as backroom operations. They are fundamental to the work that we do, but many of those tasks can now be carried out with greater efficiency through the use of technology. Having fewer people in that area allows us to put more people on to the front line and to give the face-to-face contact that people really need.

I was also asked how far we expected people to travel. In the case of the Jobcentre Plus that we are talking about, the cost of travel is a £2 return fare from Tunstall to Hanley, from Endon to Hanley, from Brown Edge to Hanley, or from Burslem to Kidsgrove. There is comprehensive guidance on the payment of fares and I am happy to write to the hon. Member for Chesterfield, who raised the issue, to set that out. Essentially, we reimburse fares if a person faces a journey of more than one hour from the office and if we have asked that person to attend for a pre-arranged interview. There are special, more discretionary provisions for people who have particular mobility problems. We do not pay fares for jobseekers to attend their normal fortnightly interviews, but in the case of Burslem we need to discuss, for instance, the possibility of postal signing, where that is appropriate and where it would be difficult for people to make the journey.

In the context of overall regeneration, my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North is quite right to say that a number of Government agencies are putting in a lot of extra resources and energy. We have heard about Advantage West Midlands, the learning and skills council and the housing renewal programme. She asked for reassurance that Jobcentre Plus and DWP were fully linked up to all those developments. I can tell her that they are. However, we need to recognise that the provision of services, to which we are absolutely committed for her constituents and others, is not just about office accommodation. We want to provide the highest quality of service through whatever mechanism is most appropriate. I hope that she will join our discussion on how we can do that. As I have said, both the Jobcentre Plus district manager and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Work will be happy to meet her to discuss that.

My hon. Friend has served her constituents well this afternoon by raising this matter, and has done us all a service by allowing us to have a useful, important debate on how we ensure that we provide the highest quality service to our constituents, albeit in an environment where the Government have made a commitment to provide those services with greater efficiency. I hope that she and other hon. Members will feel that, as part of the consultation process, we can ensure that we continue to drive forward our agendas of giving people opportunities for employment, building a better life for themselves and building on their ambitions and abilities, while doing that in the most efficient and effective way possible.

Famagusta (Cyprus)

3.30 pm

Tom Cox (Tooting) (Lab): I declare my interest in this debate and in Cyprus. I am and have been for many years the chairman of the all-party group on Cyprus, which has members from all the main parties. We have always stated that we support the rights and security of Turkish Cypriots, as we do the Greek Cypriots.

Since the events of 1974, we in this Parliament have kept alive the issues of Cyprus. To many, the issues that Cyprus has faced since those events could and should have been resolved long ago. For many more, and certainly the people of Cyprus, over the past 30 years, there have been hopes for a solution—not any solution, but an honourable, acceptable settlement that would have seen the rebuilding of trust within the communities and the rebuilding and development of the whole of the island. That, sadly, has not taken place.

Although the recent efforts of the Secretary-General of the United Nations were welcome, his proposals, known as the Annan plan, were not acceptable to a large percentage of the Greek Cypriot community. That rejection came as no surprise to many of us. I do not intend to comment on those aspects of the plan that were unacceptable, as we could spend hours discussing what was wrong with the proposals. The fact is that the plan was rejected—in some ways regrettably—because of the issue of Famagusta. That, however, does not mean that we cannot develop proposals for Cyprus and, especially, for the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities.

One very clear development would open the way to building a future for the whole of Cyprus: the reopening and the redevelopment of the town, and that means the whole town, of Famagusta. It is not a dream. It is the clear wish of the people, be they Turkish Cypriots or Greek Cypriots, whose links are to that town.

I do not know the extent of the knowledge or involvement of my hon. Friend the Minister who will reply to this debate. As for the co-operation of the two mayors of Famagusta, the Turkish Cypriot and Greek Cypriot mayors now meet to discuss their plans, priorities and aspirations for Famagusta—a Famagusta populated by the people of Cyprus. I have with me a letter dated 4 October from the President of the Republic of Cyprus, Tassos Papadopoulos, giving his full support to the sorts of proposals that I will outline. I have met the president of the Famagusta chamber of commerce, Mr. Andreas Matsis. He will work with Greek and Turkish Cypriots to rebuild Famagusta, as will the chamber of commerce.

We start with a vital commitment—the willingness and desire of the two communities to work together. Famagusta has, sadly, been a deserted town for the past 30 years. It was once one of the principal towns on Cyprus and many of us believe that it can be again. That is why I sought this debate. In recent weeks, there has been a marked improvement in the relationship between the communities in Cyprus, and I warmly welcome that. The United Kingdom must be seen to support fully what the people of Cyprus now clearly say that they want.

My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary and principal spokespeople from the European Union have all recently said that opportunities for Turkish Cypriots must be developed. I put it to the Minister that no area of Cyprus offers the Turkish Cypriot community a greater chance to do that than Famagusta.

Famagusta was once one of the most beautiful and popular tourist areas in Cyprus, and some of the most wonderful hotels in the world were there. All that could happen again. It has excellent harbour facilities, which, when updated, would give it one of the most modern and used ports in that area of the Mediterranean. Famagusta could be the site of the export and import of vast quantities of goods to and from Cyprus. As Cyprus is a member of the European Union, trade links with other countries of the European Union and indeed with the other trading countries of the world would certainly be developed. The Cypriot people have great skills in a wide range of professions. In a reopened, redeveloped Famagusta, there would be every opportunity to develop those skills.

No one would benefit more from such developments than the Turkish Cypriot community. That is to be welcomed, but to many of us the great advantage would be to Cyprus and to its people. It would show them what can be done with real co-operation. As I have said, for some 30 years, much of Famagusta has been deserted. No one can say what the infrastructure of the town is now like, and an in-depth survey of its infrastructure must be a top priority. There are experts who could do that. It would cost money but, in view of recent statements by the European Union, we have a right to look to it for financial support for such a survey, given what can be achieved. Do the Government and the Minister support such a survey?

I put it to the Minister—I ask for his reply to these proposals—that we should invite the two mayors of Famagusta to London to discuss with them and their officials the proposals and plans for the whole of Famagusta. Otherwise, we could ask the British high commissioner in Cyprus to convene a meeting with the same kind of agenda. Let our country, with its long historic links with Cyprus, show the people of Cyprus that we want to work with them and to support them.

I understand that a large sum of European Union money could already be made available to Cyprus. Will the Minister say whether that is correct? If it is, how will that money be spent? In the Cyprus of today, both Greek and Turkish Cypriots clearly want to co-operate, and they have a joint goal in showing that they will use their skills and knowledge for the benefit of the whole island and its people. I have not talked about the events of the past 30 years, because I look to the future for Cyprus and its people, to what can be done and to what the people want done.

I am sure that the Minister knows that in September my hon. Friend the Member for Finchley and Golders Green (Dr. Vis), whom I am delighted to see with us this afternoon, the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) and I spoke to the Foreign Secretary in a friendly meeting, during which we discussed issues concerning Cyprus, many of which I have not mentioned in this debate. The Foreign Secretary has met Mr. Talat to talk about Cyprus. Although there may be a lot of discussion still to take place on some issues, if Mr. Talat wishes to see a Cyprus where Turkish Cypriots are respected and have every opportunity to develop their future and a love of their families, he should support the proposals that I have outlined today. That is what the Turkish Cypriot mayor of Famagusta wants to see, and he speaks on behalf of his people.

Over the past 30 years, Turkey has had influence in the affairs of northern Cyprus, and now the door to its possible membership of the EU has opened. I hope that the Minister and the Foreign Secretary will make it clear to the Turkish Prime Minister and his fellow Ministers that it is time they listened and supported the wishes of the Turkish Cypriots of Cyprus.

I have outlined not a dream or a possible hope but a real opportunity for Cyprus and its people—that is what the reopening and redevelopment of Famagusta will mean to them. The title of this debate is "Famagusta (Cyprus)". That is what I have spoken about and I hope that the Minister's reply will concentrate on that. Do the British Government support such a proposal? What, if any, would be the legal requirements to start discussions on such a proposal? If we support such a proposal, will we promote it in the EU? Will we enter into discussions, as I have suggested, with Mr. Talat about reopening and developing Famagusta with the two people in the forefront of the proposals—the mayors of Famagusta's Greek and Turkish Cypriots—and the Turkish Government? I have already said that the President of the Republic of Cyprus fully supports such proposals.

Please do not let us lose this golden opportunity, which will offer so much to Cyprus and its people. I look forward to hearing the Minister's reply, and I assure him that the people of Cyprus do, too.

3.44 pm

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Tom Cox) on securing this timely debate. He talked about a golden opportunity, and I have stood on the golden sands of the port city of Famagusta, looking at the ghost town of Varosha. That is the correct term for an extraordinary, historic geography. I saw a once bustling, beautiful port and seaside resort, its skyscrapers, roads and shops all empty, like a Hollywood ghost town. It is a bizarre, eerie sensation when one thinks of the money, economic activity and pleasure and profit from tourism that could be brought to all the people of Cyprus—Greek-speakers and Turkish-speakers alike. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for securing the debate. I congratulate him sincerely on the comprehensive interventions and tireless work that he has carried out with other colleagues in the House, on both sides of it, who are so committed to securing justice and a peaceful resolution to the Cyprus issue.

Ever since independence in 1960, Cyprus has been a cause of great concern to the House of Commons—not just in the last 30 years but in the last 40 and more. I have visited Cyprus on and off for nearly 30 years. I recently had a positive meeting with President Papadopoulos and other colleagues on the Greek Cypriot side. They are the sovereign Government of the Republic of Cyprus. I also met Mr. Talat and Mr. Serdar Denktas, the leaders of the Turkish Cypriot community.

It is sad that the historic port city of Famagusta, a lively town with a bustling university, and the neighbouring suburb of Varosha, which is one of the most beautiful seaside resorts that I have seen, have been pawns in the various abortive attempts to resolve the division of Cyprus. Nothing symbolises the wasted potential of the island so much as the kilometres of shattered and derelict buildings along some of the most idyllic coastline in Europe.

We are keen to ensure that tens of thousands of former residents of Varosha can return to their properties. I am sure that all hon. Members would like to see Greek and Turkish Cypriots working side by side to return the port of Famagusta to being a thriving Mediterranean port working for the mutual benefit of the whole island—the port, of course, trading with Turkey. As Turkey starts its accession talks for full membership of the EU, we want a normalisation of trade between all the island of Cyprus and the important future European Union member state Turkey.

Dr. Rudi Vis (Finchley and Golders Green) (Lab): On 17 December, a decision will be made about Turkey's accession negotiations. Is Turkey required to recognise the Republic of Cyprus before then?

Mr. MacShane: It certainly matters that Turkey and Cyprus normalise their relations, but no one is laying down any new conditions for a clear yes on 17 December as a precursor to Turkey starting its accession talks with the EU. In my talks with President Papadopoulos and other Government leaders of the Republic of Cyprus when I was in Nicosia 10 days ago, I was glad that there was no threat that they would try to stop what will, I hope, be an historic decision that will send a signal to the world that that great country, Turkey, is turning its face firmly towards Europe and that, during the long period of accession negotiations, it wants to meet all the criteria that membership of the European Union requires.

Before we get to that point, we must welcome the proposal that the Government of the Republic of Cyprus made in July regarding Famagusta and Varosha. It is vital to explore every opportunity for movement and any measure that might contribute to a climate of increased trust and confidence between the two communities. Such measures need to be mutually agreed. They must be balanced and realistic and they must take us forward.

Under the last version of the Annan plan, the Turkish Cypriots would have been able to operate Famagusta port as part of the Turkish Cypriot state, and Varosha would have been returned to its Greek Cypriot owners. Although I know that the July offer was made in good faith, and I welcome the initiative of Nicosia, it is hard to understand why the Turkish Cypriots should be asked to settle for any less today. That is why I welcome the desire for any move or dialogue. I welcome the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting that the respective leaders of the communities of Famagusta and Varosha should meet to discuss the matter and take it forward. In my meetings with Mr. Papadopoulos and Mr. Talat, I suggested that the two of them should find ways of meeting together or, if they cannot for whatever protocol reasons, they should invite their officials to find places and ways of meeting to discuss how the impasse arising out of the Greek Cypriot rejection of the Annan proposals in April can be taken forward.

The sort of initiative that my hon. Friend referred to is a positive way forward. Of course, it will need backing and the agreement of leaders at a higher level but, if we can find a means of taking it forward, I will welcome that and I am happy to ask the high commissioner in Nicosia to see what he can do to facilitate any such meeting. I strongly welcome my hon. Friend's proposals.

The Government of the Republic of Cyprus must now work with the Turkish Cypriot side to examine how the ideas for Famagusta can be taken forward. The international community has done its best to find a solution. We sent our finest diplomats from New York and London and people from Ankara and Athens have also had something to say, but a vote took place. We are all democratically elected here and we live and die by votes, so we must abide by that decision. That is why I said in Cyprus that we must bring the Cyprus problem back to the people of Cyprus, back to the two communities and back to their elected leaders to meet, to discuss and to find ways forward.

3.52 pm

Sitting suspended for Divisions in the House.

4.22 pm

On resuming—

Mr. MacShane: A solution to the stagnation of Varosha needs to be found sooner rather than later, as Mr. Yiannis Skordis, speaking on behalf of its former residents, told The Independent on 26 April:

> "We want a solution as soon as possible … We have monuments and a town that needs saving. It has remained untouched for 30 years, if we leave it for another 10 to 20 years it might not be able to be saved."

Mr. Skordis is a mayor who is unable to live in his own community, but his words are absolutely right.

In the same article, a young Turkish Cypriot, Mr. Sherer Sever, who flew back from his PhD studies in London to vote yes in the referendum, stated:

> "I voted for a solution, things have got to change. The ghost town is crazy and needs to have something done about it."

I completely agree with what Mr. Sherer Sever—I hope now Dr. Sherer Sever—said.

I wish that many hon. Members could visit the area, as I did, and see from afar the ghost town of Varosha. They would realise what an affront it is to all European norms and values that it cannot be used for its purpose of allowing people to have very pleasant holidays and of bringing enormous economic benefits to Turkish and Greek Cypriots alike.

I discussed Varosha, Famagusta and many other issues during an extremely useful visit to Cyprus a little under two weeks ago. Cyprus is a valued friend and partner of the United Kingdom and the European Union. We must work together to promote an open, dynamic and globally competitive EU. With its unparalleled location, Famagusta has an important role to play as the EU looks to its southern borders for new trading opportunities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting asked about EU funds. I can report that €259 million has been allocated to help with the development of northern Cyprus. In my view, some of that money could help to unblock the Famagusta-Varosha problem.

Dr. Vis: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. MacShane: If I may, I had better finish my speech. The debate is short, despite the Divisions that we had.

Confidence-building measures are an important step towards achieving that shared vision and any measures that can help to build trade links and reduce the economic gap between the two communities, and between Cyprus and the rest of the world, will make reunification more likely, easier to consolidate and less costly. Trade will increase trust and lay the foundations for co-operation in a reunified Cyprus. I say again that the tourist trade is the obvious breadwinner for that stunningly beautiful island. A widening wealth gap and continued economic division will make a solution much more difficult.

During my visit, my friends in the Cyprus Government expressed the well-known demands for a new approach from Turkey on a number of issues that prevent Cyprus exercising its full sovereignty on trade and other issues. The British Government understand such concerns—I am grateful to my hon. Friends here and to other hon. Members who draw them to my attention regularly—just as we understand the concerns of our friends in the Turkish Cypriot community that economic development and normal tourism, trade and travel are not on offer to them despite their clear vote in April in favour of the plan, backed by the United Nations and every EU Government, to create a united Cyprus.

Britain wants to see trade develop in Cyprus on the basis of EU norms, and that means trade in all directions, in all sectors, 360 degrees around the compass. Trade in the EU and all parts of EU member states is open, normal and no longer controlled by Governments or state-linked bodies. Low-cost airlines can land their planes freely in any airport of their choosing in the EU without let or hindrance by Governments. I hope to see flights to all parts of Cyprus on the basis of commercial viability, not political considerations.

The whole atmosphere would be greatly helped if relations between Ankara and Nicosia could be normalised. It is for the political leaders in those cities to decide whether they can find a means of dialogue, as one sovereign republic to another, to normalise their relations. There is no question of the United Kingdom recognising the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus. However, many of my colleagues are asking what practical steps are being taken by all of us as EU member states to meet the "determined" wish of the EU Council of Ministers of 26 April to end the isolation of Turkish Cypriots. That will require a new approach as well.

As I said earlier, I am glad that my talks in Cyprus confirmed the long-held views of the elected leaders of the Republic of Cyprus that no one should seek to veto Turkey's application in December. That will be the beginning of a great deal of hard work, over a number of years, for Ankara. Once the negotiations start, another question will arise: when will Ankara and Nicosia move to normalise their relations, as is the case between all EU member states and between those seeking to join the EU, such as the Balkan states and Turkey?

It is an anomaly that Turkey does not have normal diplomatic relations with one of the 25 EU member states with which it has to negotiate to join the European Union. I hope that that can be solved, although there is no question of its being a precondition. That normalisation should also involve considering the number of troops stationed in Cyprus and the immense amount of money spent by Ankara and the Cyprus Government in Nicosia to maintain troop levels. There are more than two divisions of Turkish troops, and I was informed that £100 million is spent each year. There is a conscription period of more than two years on the Greek Cypriot side. Those are some of the issues that will have to be discussed and resolved soon—the sooner, the better.

In the meantime, if we could start local, serious discussions on finding a way forward on Famagusta and Varosha, no Government would be more delighted than ours. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting for making his distinguished contribution towards finding a solution to this continuing problem.

Diego Garcia

4.30 pm

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): I see this debate not in isolation but as part of Parliament's role in the continuing unhappy and shaming saga of our country's treatment of a small group of its subjects and their descendants, namely, the Chagos islanders, who are drawn principally from Diego Garcia, the largest island in the chain.

I use the term "subjects" advisedly. Although it implies a rather unfashionable view of the relationship between the people and their sovereign, I am entirely clear that my sovereign—in practice, her Government—owes her subjects a profound duty of care. That duty of care is cast as a sacred trust on a sovereign power to promote the welfare and advancement of the people under article 73 of the United Nations charter, but our Government have shamefully and disgracefully honoured it over four decades, and mainly in the breach, in the case of the Chagos islands.

In coming to an understanding of this issue—embarrassingly late, given my service as a special adviser in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office—and in raising it on behalf of my constituents, who are now being invited to pay the nation's price, I am still astonished that a liberal democracy in the early 21st century continues to behave in a shabby manner towards its subjects.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) for his work on the issue and for raising it in the Chamber on 7 July. I also pay tribute to the Father of the House, whose work over four decades on behalf of these unfortunate people is an example to us all.

My remarks should be seen in the context of the debate on 7 July, which focused on the Orders in Council, promulgated on European and local election day on 10 June, which prevented the right of return to the islands as lawfully established four years earlier in a British court. In pursuing the matter, I am in complete harness with my hon. Friends the Members for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) and for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) in that we all represent council tax payers of the borough of Reigate and Banstead. I am also grateful to my hon. Friends the Members for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) and for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) for their support, and for the presence in this debate of the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt), whose constituents are also affected by the issue and who has been dealing with it for about a year.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey will be pursuing the issue of the Government's obligation to the council tax payers of Reigate and Banstead in an Adjournment debate tomorrow with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I intend to focus the rest of my remarks on the Government's obligations to the islanders.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): It would be very useful for the ODPM to provide the Minister with a sincere statement about the plight of these people and the cost to local government.

Mr. Blunt: In the era of at least proclaimed joined-up government, I hope that the two debates can be viewed in conjunction with each other. I do not know whether the Minister will have anything to say on behalf of other Departments when he replies, but I will draw attention in the rest of my remarks to the risks that the Government are running under their current policy.

The only thing to be said for the Government's position on the Chagos islanders is that it is clear. The Orders in Council were detailed in a written ministerial statement and left no room for doubt. The statement read:

> "Accordingly, the Government consider that there would be no purpose in commissioning any further study into the feasibility of resettlement; and that it would be impossible for the Government to promote or even permit resettlement to take place. After long and careful consideration, we have therefore decided to legislate to prevent it."—[Official Report, 15 June 2004; Vol. 422, c. 33WS.]

The lack of consultation and the way in which the decision was taken and promulgated were outrageous, and I am far from convinced that the decision was correct. Indeed, it was probably practically and morally wrong, but at least it was clear.

The Chagos islanders, in the Government's view, are not going home. That leaves 5,500 islanders and their descendants, who live mainly in Mauritius and the Seychelles and who are now entitled to British citizenship and residence, with no practical alternative if they are to extricate themselves from their largely poverty-stricken existence but to come here in increasing numbers. Some 900 passports have been issued so far by the high commissioners in Mauritius and the Seychelles. The Prime Minister was either misleading or misinformed when he told my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell last week that my hon. Friend was exaggerating the number of people who would come. Why does the Prime Minister think that 900 passports have been applied for when these people have perfectly good Mauritian travel documents of their own?

Now that the Government have slammed the door on people returning to the Chagos islands, they must prepare for a significant part of the community to come here. A failure to plan will result in the events that have engulfed the borough of Reigate and Banstead in the past month being repeated a hundredfold. Uncontrolled immigration of those people would be a disaster.

I am advised that 95 per cent. of the original islanders are illiterate, as are 40 to 50 per cent. of their descendants, because of the way in which the Mauritian education system works. If someone fails to meet the necessary standards at 12, their formal education comes to an end. The vast majority speak not English but a French patois, and even now interpreters are being sought to converse with the 32 islanders with whom the borough of Reigate and Banstead is coping, as classical French speakers are deemed inadequate to interpret the reviews of the islanders' circumstances.

The first groups of these British citizens have arrived destitute at Gatwick over the past two years. A few have already settled in the area. In the wake of the Orders in Council, we are facing an uncontrolled immigration of penniless and unqualified British citizens to one part of the country. The huge sympathy for their plight, when understood nationally, will almost certainly rapidly turn to anger and resentment as local services are overwhelmed.

The islanders are bound to concentrate in one area if immigration is uncontrolled, as they will lack the ability to communicate outside their group. The social problems that they endured in Mauritius will simply be repeated here. This country can and should avoid that. The least that we can do is properly prepare those in the community in Mauritius and the Seychelles who wish to exercise their right to move to the United Kingdom.

There is an overwhelming case for controlled immigration. I hope that the Minister will urgently consider a properly funded programme, which would teach such people English, equip them with the skills and training to enable them to be part of the United Kingdom work force, and provide services to enable them to identify jobs and homes in the United Kingdom before they leave Mauritius and the Seychelles. Legally, we cannot control their immigration but, practically, we can prepare for those British citizens, now habitually resident in Mauritius, who wish to come to the United Kingdom.

The Foreign Office is more than capable of administering a suitable programme over several years—that is how long it will take—that will help such people to meet the challenge. It could co-ordinate the resources of the British Council and other Departments in order to do that. I cannot imagine that any teachers sent to the Seychelles or Mauritius on programmes run by the British Council or other Departments will regard it as a punishment posting.

Also, if the Foreign Office administers such a programme, it will at least go a little way towards making up for its unhappy role in the affair of the Chagos islanders over the past four decades. Failure to make investment in such a programme will not save any money. It will cost far more to provide for education, training, housing and social services in the United Kingdom after an unprepared population arrives. In all probability we would cause further social disaster for an isolated and mistreated people. If we do not deal with the issue now, in years to come we may find that we have forced the islanders to turn to crime to support themselves, and the criminal justice budget will then make a contribution to this sorry saga.

The Government's decision to block a return to the islands requires follow-up action now. Telling the local authorities of Crawley, Reigate and Banstead, Surrey and West Sussex that they are on their own could be disastrous. Controlled immigration must be the objective of government policy. As that means discharging our moral obligations generously, we will be doing the right thing for the right reasons. I invite the Government to do so.

4.40 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) for the opportunity to make a short contribution to this important debate, and I congratulate him on securing it. As he will know, I intend to return to this issue from a local government perspective tomorrow, and I will return the compliment should he wish to participate in my debate. The issue affects both our local authorities and those of other hon. Members whom he has mentioned.

The Minister is not responsible for local government finance, but I hope that he is sufficiently joined up with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to understand that the decisions taken by his Department about the Chagos islanders have direct consequences for local government in this country. The Orders in Council signed by the Government in June are a key reason why three weeks ago a group of 45 people from Diego Garcia turned up at Gatwick airport. As the Minister will know, the Orders in Council overturned a High Court ruling that the ordinance preventing the return of the islanders to their homeland was unlawful. Effectively, the Government acted to ensure that the islanders could not return to their homeland.

Given that the prospect of returning to destitute conditions in Mauritius lacks, shall we say, appeal, as my hon. Friend and I discovered during our recent visit to Horley in my constituency, where many of the islanders are housed, their decision to come to Britain has a certain logic. As British citizens, they have every right to be here but, thanks to this Government, they have no right to go home. The question is what further rights they have to housing, food and other benefits, and those matters are the subject of a complicated and expensive legal process.

I would be grateful if the Minister could let me know when he responds what discussions, if any, took place between his Department and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister about the likely, indeed inevitable, consequences for local government and local authorities of the decision to issue the Orders in Council. As my hon. Friend pointed out, the treatment of the islanders has been grossly unjust. From the original decision of Harold Wilson's Government to round them up and evict them, to the shabby decision earlier this year to overturn the High Court ruling, the whole story is a discredit to this country. To that injustice is added another. The cost of keeping the islanders in temporary accommodation is falling exclusively on local council tax payers. That is patently unfair. The problem is entirely of the Government's making and the Government should shoulder responsibility for the consequences of their actions.

My hon. Friend and I will return to the issue tomorrow, as the Minister knows. The short-term solution is in the hands of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, but the long-term solution lies with this Minister's Department—a just solution that either allows the islanders to return to Diego Garcia, which I admit is unlikely given the Government's attitude, or, as my hon. Friend has suggested, at least provides them with the skills that they will need in order to make successful new lives in this country.

There have been too many evasions and too many excuses already. We look to the Minister to come forward with a clear and positive initiative that is fair to the islanders and to our constituents.

4.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): This is a genuinely important debate, and the second opportunity that we have had to air these issues in this Chamber. I understand the concerns that have been expressed. I congratulate the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) on securing the debate. I hope that the similar debate that takes place tomorrow with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will reflect the strategic importance of these issues and the way in which the Government are attempting to work on them across the board.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that I have every sympathy with the predicament in which he and the Reigate and Banstead borough council find themselves as a result of the arrival of that group of Chagossians in his constituency. His is not the first constituency to see such an arrival. Earlier groups arrived in Crawley, and I have had several meetings with my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) about it. Indeed, I am due to see her early next week to discuss it further.

There is a debate tomorrow on local government provisions for Diego Garcians in Surrey. Therefore, I intend today to concentrate on the history of the British Indian Ocean Territory and the chain of events that has led to the present situation. Properly, I shall leave local government provisions to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): Given the huge pressure that councils will find themselves under, particularly West Sussex county council, before the Minister leaves that subject, will he give us some idea of his Department's view in principle on how to handle the extraordinary burden that will be placed on those county councils? How should that be met, and is it acceptable that it should be met entirely by local people?

Mr. Rammell: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the best way to resolve the issues is not necessarily by one Department telling another on the Floor of the House what it can and should do. Nevertheless, I can assure him that the Foreign Office is in touch with other Whitehall Departments, including the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Department for Work and Pensions and the Department of Health, on this issue. We have also been in contact with West Sussex county council, and that will continue. That is one reason that I am seeing my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley next week.

Sir Paul Beresford: On the same point, if the Minister is in discussions, he will be able to tell us what his Department is contributing and what the other Departments are contributing. That could make tomorrow's debate much simpler.

Mr. Rammell: As I said earlier, it is properly the place of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to respond on specific local government provisions.

Hon. Members will forgive me if I am brief, because of the limited time available. If Opposition Members would like more detailed information on the history of the Chagossians and the British Indian Ocean Territory, I should be happy to be contacted after the debate to arrange for such information to be given. However, I shall now give a brief overview of the situation. The islands of the Chagos archipelago, located in the middle of the Indian ocean, were ceded to Britain by the French in 1814 together with Mauritius, of which the islands were a dependency. Under British rule, the islands, which were populated by copra plantation workers and their dependants, continued to be administered as a dependency of Mauritius. Prior to Mauritius achieving independence in 1968, and with the agreement of the Mauritius Council of Ministers—that is an important point—the islands were detached in 1965 to form—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Rammell: Let me finish this sentence. I want to make some progress because I have some important background information to get on the record. The islands were at that stage—

Mr. Blunt: May I assist the Minister?

Mr. Rammell: I will finish this point, then I will give way. The islands were detached in 1965 to form part of the British Indian Ocean Territory, which was created to provide for the defence needs of Britain and the United States. The copra plantations were becoming no longer economically viable, and partly for that reason, and partly because of defence requirements, it was eventually decided that the islanders should be relocated. That was done in the late 1960s and early 1970s. The vast majority of islanders—some 1,200—were relocated in Mauritius, but some went to the Seychelles.

Mr. Blunt: All of us here are familiar with the background, and I hoped that the Minister could start his reply from a later point. We understand that the Government have made their decision through the Orders in Council. Does he accept that that is a given? The merits of that were discussed in the debate initiated by the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) and I do not want to revisit them now. I instead invite the Minister to address the question of what we do now in the light of that decision.

Mr. Rammell: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I was aware that two debates were coming one day after the other, and I spoke to him yesterday to clarify what issues he intended to address. The indication that I then received was that this debate—properly, as it was to be a Foreign Office debate—would be about the background, history and rationale for what we have done and that, properly, the issues about local government finance would be addressed in tomorrow's debate. That is what I am seeking to do.

Although the hon. Gentleman said that people are aware of the background, some of the interventions suggest that not everyone is fully aware of it. I should like to repeat what I said in this Chamber on 7 July about the measures taken by successive Governments, both Conservative and Labour. That is an important point in respect of the speech by the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth). I heard the references to Harold Wilson and to this Government but I think that he has forgotten the role of past Conservative Governments. [Interruption.] With respect, that is the point that was made, and that is what I am properly responding to.

The measures taken by successive Governments of the 1960s and 1970s to depopulate the islands did not—to say the least—constitute the finest hour of UK foreign policy. I do not seek to justify what was done in the 1960s or the 1970s. On 12 October, the Foreign Secretary indicated in the House that he understood how controversial were the measures taken many decades ago to relocate the Chagossians to Mauritius and the Seychelles.

The nub of the problem, however, is that, regrettable as those measures may have been, this Government have to deal with the situation as it exists today. The responsibility of the UK Government for what was done in the 1960s and 1970s has been acknowledged by successive Governments since then, as is demonstrated by the substantial sums in compensation that have already been paid to the Chagossians.

The issue of compensation is directly relevant to the debate. Compensation was made available on two occasions. At the time of the relocation of the islanders, £650,000—equivalent to almost £5.5 million in today's terms—was made available to the Mauritius Government specifically to assist with resettlement. Subsequent to that, in 1982, an ex gratia payment of £4 million—equivalent to £9 million today—was put into a trust fund for the benefit of the Chagossian community in Mauritius. Furthermore, the Mauritius Government made land available to the value of £1 million. At the time, it was agreed by all concerned, including the Chagossians themselves with the benefit of independent legal advice, that the payment was in full and final settlement of all claims against the UK arising out of the Chagossians' transfer to and resettlement in Mauritius, as well as their preclusion from returning to the Chagos islands.

Those payments amount to more than £14 million in today's prices. The Chagossians' lawyers advised them that that was a fair and reasonable settlement. In 2002, proceedings in the High Court were initiated in an attempt to secure further compensation, and in October 2003 the High Court dismissed the case in full in a comprehensive judgment. On 22 July this year, the Court of Appeal refused leave to appeal against the judgment.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I apologise for not being present for the opening speech. I was detained in the main Chamber at the time.

Despite all that the Minister has said, can he not accept that the Chagos islanders have been very badly treated? They have lived, and continue to live, in very poor conditions and great poverty, largely in Mauritius and to some extent in the Seychelles, and there is a moral duty on the British Government to recognise that poverty of people who are British citizens, and to ensure that a new assistance package is agreed with them.

As the Minister knows, a delegation is coming here later this month. It will have the opportunity to meet him, so that he can hear at first hand how awful the lives of many Chagossians have been in Mauritius since they were dumped on the quayside all those years ago.

Mr. Rammell: As my hon. Friend knows, I respect his conviction and integrity on this issue and the way that he has campaigned on it. Nevertheless, there has been a High Court ruling, which makes it clear that we are not required to pay further compensation. That is the situation. However, as is proper for any accountable Government, we will receive and listen to representations. I have done that with regard to my hon. Friend and, as he knows, I am prepared to meet with representatives of the Chagossian community later this month.

In 2000, the High Court, in judicial review proceedings brought by the Chagossians, held that the provisions of the British Indian Ocean Territory Immigration Ordinance 1971, which prohibited the unauthorised entry of any person into any part of the territory, were invalid in so far as they applied to the Chagossians. Accordingly, the ordinance was amended so as to remove the prohibition in respect of the Chagossians, except with regard to entry into Diego Garcia itself. Subsequently, an independent study into the feasibility of resettlement, which had meanwhile been commissioned by the Government, concluded that resettlement of the islands on anything other than a short-term and purely subsistence basis would be highly precarious and would involve expensive underwriting by the British Government for an open-ended period, and probably permanently. That is pertinent to some of the points made by the hon. Member for Reigate.

I emphasise that that study was carried out by experts independent of Government, and because of that—and equally because of the need to ensure and to maintain the availability and effective use of the territory for defence purposes, for which it was created and set aside in accordance with the UK's treaty obligations—the Government decided, after long and careful consideration, that resettlement could not take place.

Mr. Blunt: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rammell: No. I need to respond to the points that have been made. I will give way if there is time.

Accordingly, the Government legislated to restore full immigration control over the whole territory, and that was done in June 2004.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the manner in which these changes came about and the fact that they were undertaken through Orders in Council. I remind him that that has been the normal way of legislating on the overseas territories under successive Governments.

Mr. Blunt: All those points are familiar to anyone who read the debate or attended it on 7 July. I understand that the proposals I have made are fresh to the Minister, but all I am seeking from him is an acknowledgement that in the light of the Orders in Council something needs to be done. I understand that that something would have to be the subject of advice from his officials and other Departments.

Mr. Rammell: With respect, I am trying to be as open and frank as I can, and there is a problem with the hon. Gentleman's seeking to initiate a debate on local government finance matters, and then requesting that the Foreign Office responds.

The hon. Gentleman has worked in the Foreign Office. Other hon. Members in the Chamber who have been in government will know the legitimate difficulties involved. Specifically in response to some of the points that he made about the low level of literacy among the Chagossian community, there are currently no aid programmes to assist through the Department for

[Mr. Rammell]

International Development, because Mauritius particularly is a middle-income country and there have been, at today's prices, substantial elements of compensation. Nevertheless—and without commitment—that issue has not been put to us before and I will consider it.

Following the arrival of the Chagossians in Mauritius and the Seychelles, the majority automatically acquired Mauritian or Seychelles citizenship when those countries achieved independence. In addition, most Chagossians retain their status as citizens of the UK and colonies, and the British Overseas Territories Act 2002 gave them the additional status of full British citizens.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: Will the Minister just try to answer my question about the extent of discussions between his Department and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister about the consequences of the Orders in Council for local government?

Mr. Rammell: I have already made it clear to the hon. Gentleman and to the hon. Member for Reigate that we have, on a number of occasions, been in contact with other Whitehall Departments, including the ODPM, the Department for Work and Pensions, the Department of Health, and with the local authority, and we will continue to be so. I also made it clear that I was seeing my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley to discuss the matter further. Given my responsibilities, and those of the Foreign Office, I do not believe that I can go further in responding to something that is properly a matter for discussion in the debates tomorrow.

I reiterate that I am not seeking to justify what happened in the 1960s and 1970s. I have said on several occasions that I do not regard that as the finest hour in the conduct of UK foreign policy. However, the fundamental problem faced by this Government was this. It is almost 40 years since the Chagossians last inhabited the islands and, accordingly, given the independent advice on the feasibility and sustainability of the repopulation of the islands, it would not have been responsible for the Government to say, "The repopulation can take place and we will pick up the financial consequences." Considering the matter in the round, that would be a significant financial liability in the context of our overall contingent financial liabilities for the overseas territories.

I understand the points that have been made and I have tried, within the terms of the debate, to respond.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Five o'clock.

War against Terrorism

[Relevant documents: Seventh Report from the Foreign Affairs Committee, Session 2003–04, HC 441, and the Government's response thereto, Cm. 6340.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gillian Merron.]

2.30 pm

Donald Anderson (Swansea, East) (Lab): I am pleased to introduce for this afternoon's debate the seventh report from Select Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The report is the fifth in a series on foreign policy aspects of the war against terrorism produced by the Select Committee since the tragic events of 9/11. It covers a broad range of issues, from the political and security situation in Iraq to Russia's stockpiles of chemical weapons. Indeed, we made 74 conclusions and recommendations.

I have always believed that such Select Committee reports are useful in allowing Committee members to gain expertise in the field. We produce them not only for the wider public, but for colleagues in both Houses of Parliament. I was delighted that the report was hailed in a debate in the other place in September using glowing superlatives that I would be reluctant to use myself. I am sure that the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) would underline the remark made by the then leader of his party in the House of Lords that the report was "brilliant".

As usual, as part of our inquiry, we heard oral evidence, received written evidence from a range of witnesses, and held discussions with senior officials in New York, Washington DC, Moscow, Pakistan and Afghanistan. Some members of the Committee were also able to continue our series of visits to Iraq.

My aim today is first to introduce the report to the Chamber and then to update it. We should recall that the Committee drew its conclusions in the middle of July. An interesting feature of foreign affairs is that events move so speedily. Since then, there have been several key developments in this moving picture. There have been elections, as the Prime Minister mentioned yesterday, not only in Afghanistan, to which I shall refer in a moment, but in the United States. Both elections may be relevant to the matters that we are discussing. Equally, there have been events concerning key leaders such as President Musharraf, and the possibly serious illness of President Arafat, who is in intensive care.

Iraq has become a battleground for al-Qaeda, with appalling consequences for the people of that country. We state that the violence stems from several sources such as members of the former regime, local Islamists and criminal gangs, as well as al-Qaeda. The lack of law and order in some areas has been particularly damaging and has affected the credibility of the coalition. Clearly it is the aim of those who take hostages, blow up pipelines and attack electoral officials to make the country ungovernable and, in effect, to create anarchy. Surely it is the aim of the rest of the world community to isolate, so far as we can, those who can be brought into the tent from the fundamentalists or wreckers.

The Iraqi security forces have made significant progress, but they remain a long way from being able to maintain security. They are also being targeted. There was the appalling incident on 23 October when about 50 army recruits were killed in an apparent ambush—again, part of the campaign by the insurgents to destabilise the country. Until the Iraqi forces can maintain security, foreign forces are likely to be required. Indeed, we hope that following the elections in January, with a new legitimacy for the Government of Iraq, the outside forces will be able to move increasingly into the background and into a supportive role.

United Nations Security Council resolution 1546, adopted in June, gives the multinational force a mandate to be in Iraq

"at the request of the incoming interim Government of Iraq."

It is surely regrettable that countries other than the United States and the United Kingdom have failed to send significant numbers of troops to Iraq, which makes the strain on our forces more intense. It would be particularly beneficial if Islamic states could be persuaded to add their forces. What are the Government doing to encourage other states to send forces to Iraq? Perhaps the result of the election in the United States has made it more difficult for certain countries to respond, but all would be affected if there were a significant failure in Iraq.

We know that British personnel play a vital role in Iraq, and their safety is a serious concern, especially with the increase in the number of kidnappings. Thinking of the dreadful murder of Ken Bigley and the capture of Margaret Hassan, I ask again: what are the Government doing to safeguard the security of British personnel in Iraq?

On the political developments in Iraq and the role of the United Nations, the process of wide-ranging consultation overseen by the United Nations plays an important role in the formation of the Interim Government, but the work of the United Nations is being severely hindered by the security situation. That is understandable, given the tragic events of August 2003 when the then UN leader in Iraq was blown up with so many of his staff.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am sure that my right hon. Friend, who like me is a Christian, is particularly shocked at the revelation that the Iraqi Christian minority is being deliberately targeted for the most vicious treatment by the terrorists. Will he say a few words to suggest what support the Foreign Office can offer so that that minority can live in freedom? I hope that the Foreign Office will then respond to that. The Christian minority had a degree of stability in their lives even under Saddam, but that stability has now been taken away.

Donald Anderson: That, alas, has been one of the unintended consequences of the invasion. I, too, have seen reports of not only the bombing of Christian churches but threats to individual Christian families.

[Donald Anderson]

That is a long way from the vision of those, including ourselves, who invaded Iraq, where the Christian minority was reasonably well protected and people such as Tariq Aziz were in government at the time. I hope that our Government will take full note of what my hon. Friend has said and that they will, as far as they can, talk to the authorities in Iraq to say that we are very keen on human rights generally, and that we are concerned at the threats that have been made to minorities, including the Christian community.

On the United Nations, I ask my hon. Friend the Minister what progress has been made in creating a force to provide security for UN personnel and facilities. That is particularly relevant given the elections scheduled for January. It is highly desirable that those elections proceed on schedule to foster Iraqi engagement and confidence in the country's political transition. Continued violence can only hinder the validity of that process. Election registration and polling efforts will be key targets for the terrorists, so what are we as an international community doing to assist preparations for the elections? What is being done specifically to provide help and security to UN election workers? It would be a signal triumph for the forces of unreason—the wreckers—if the timetable were not to proceed as hoped for. Although it is clear that there is potential for certain no-go areas to exist—hence the current threat to Falluja—the alternative to a positive outcome in Iraq may be a failed state and regional instability. It is most important that we progress to a legitimate Government who are allowed to make their own mistakes and whom the people see as their own, via the international community.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): I very much appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. He mentioned Falluja. Does he agree that before some kind of US-led assault on Falluja takes place, it is crucial that every effort is made to ensure that a peaceful solution is sought with the Iraqi terrorists—perhaps not with those who have come from outside—and that civilians living there have every opportunity to escape? Does he think that such efforts have been made?

Donald Anderson: I know that some efforts have been made. There has been leafleting and an attempt to warn civilians in Falluja to leave in preparation for a potential assault that will try to separate the absolute fundamentalists—the bitter-enders—from the more reasonable elements of the population, many of whom are intimidated and frightened to leave. If one can show that every effort has been made to protect, warn and safeguard the civilian population, it will be a test of whether the Falluja onslaught—if it comes—is legitimate.

I turn to Afghanistan, where the picture is broadly positive but fragile. There has been improvement in key areas such as education, women's rights and even private investment. We welcome security and the support that was given by the United States to the electoral process. We are pleased at the news that President Karzai was officially declared the winner yesterday with 55.4 per cent. of the vote. It is clearly unfortunate that the voting was largely on tribal lines with the Pashtun majority supporting the President and the Uzbeks supporting Mr. Dostum. Despite a number of reported irregularities, the election was a great success and such irregularities were not in themselves sufficient to question the result. The parliamentary elections in Afghanistan scheduled for spring 2005 will obviously pose a greater challenge because of their nature.

It is essential for the democratic process and the accountability of the President that parliamentary elections are held on schedule, so I ask the Minister what the Government are doing to assist the holding of those elections and to encourage broad assistance from the international community. We shall examine with great care what President Karzai does. He clearly has enormous problems; he cannot wipe the slate clean in respect of those around him, but he needs to appoint those not tainted with corruption to his Cabinet. Although he initially had an understandable wish to have a large-tent approach, perhaps he should modify that to ensure that more respectable people are around him, particularly because the security forces are spreading out beyond Kabul.

The other interesting feature from the Committee's point of view is that when we were in Peshawar, we were able to speak to individuals who claimed to be moderate members of the Taliban—if that is not a contradiction in terms. Apparently, there is now an earnest debate going on in Afghanistan as to how they respond to those of the Taliban, in exile in Pakistan and elsewhere, who wish to return.

On the subject of drugs, which was part of our survey in Afghanistan, we concluded that there was little sign of the war against drugs being won and that the situation is likely to get worse, at least in the short term. That in an area in which foreign policy shades into domestic policy. We know that 95 per cent. of heroin in the United Kingdom comes from Afghanistan. We are living in the new globalised world where what happens on the streets of our constituencies is highly relevant to what happens in what in the past might have been called a "faraway place of which we know little".

I am told that our Committee's conclusion on drugs is confirmed by the report on drugs has been complied by the United Nations and which was due to be launched tomorrow, but is now to be launched in a few weeks. The report will show that progress has been much slower than had been hoped and will paint a gloomy picture. Clearly, we need to redouble the efforts, particularly because we in the United Kingdom are head of the counter-narcotics group. Our approach must incorporate eradication and interdiction.

There is also a need for alternative livelihoods that provide a living wage. Given the figures that we were shown about the yield per hectare of heroin and wheat, there is no way in which alternative crops are likely to provide farmers with anything like the income that they will get from heroin. Perhaps only the force of law can prevent farmers from producing that very tempting crop.

There is an overriding need for security and to achieve progress on that and other issues. High-level arrests must be made to demonstrate the unacceptability of links with the drugs trade. We understand that there is also a health problem in relation to addicts in Afghanistan, including those who have returned from exile. What are the Government doing to reinvigorate efforts to tackle the drug problem in Afghanistan? Is there any evidence that the price of heroin supplies in this country has been affected? What could provide suitable alternative livelihoods for Afghan farmers and what are the Government doing in that area?

Given the gloomy conclusions of the UN report, how are we seeking to monitor the situation before the publication of the next UN report in roughly a year's time? What is being done to establish treatment centres across Afghanistan? Will the Government undertake to report regularly to Parliament on the progress or, sadly, perhaps the lack of progress?

When the Committee was in Afghanistan, it was able to meet both the UK forces in the provincial reconstruction team and the leaders of the NATO forces. We have played an important role in improving the security of the situation. We are training the Afghan army and police units so that they can assume responsibility for their own population. There is clearly an urgent need to achieve disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration. We need to devote greater resources to that. We know that if adequate security resources are not provided, there will be a real danger of implosion in that fragile country.

In Istanbul in June, NATO member states agreed on a major expansion of the alliance's role in Afghanistan, particularly with regard to extending the reach of the international security assistance force beyond Kabul. However, the implementation of the NATO response has been unsatisfactory and there is also the question of national caveats, which hinder the effectiveness of NATO troops. Are the commitments made by the NATO forces sufficient? Indeed, are the commitments being made? Clearly, there is a pressing need for the Government to put pressure on countries to fulfil the undertaking that they gave in Istanbul. Although France and Germany are doing well, other countries, such as Italy and Spain, are way behind.

It is clear that Pakistan has provided invaluable assistance in the war against terrorism, such as by launching campaigns in the tribal areas along the borders with Afghanistan. Many suspected and actual members of al-Qaeda have been arrested. The Committee received a briefing from the senior military officer in Peshawar relating to the problems in the tribal areas and was able to appreciate the real problems in that region, which, although not exactly the wild west, is difficult and turbulent.

We understand the serious domestic constraints under which President Musharraf operates. Some areas are dominated by forces sympathetic to the Taliban and al-Qaeda; indeed, while we were there we passed the area where two attempts were made on President Musharraf's life last December. What are the Government doing to assist Pakistan's effort to reform the education system and to encourage development efforts in the tribal areas? Dealing with the madrassahs is one way we can assist in addressing the root causes of extremism.

We also expressed, quite properly, our concerns about the state of democracy and human rights. On 1 November, Pakistan's upper House passed a Bill allowing President Musharraf to remain head of the army. That legislation will take effect from 31 December this year, despite his having pledged to stand down. The human rights situation in Pakistan remains unacceptable. To turn again to the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) made about the Christian minority's position, I and other colleagues have received briefings from Christian Solidarity Worldwide on the disturbing reports of attacks on Christians in recent months, including the deaths of a number of individuals. However, we recognise that the Shi'a mosques are also affected.

President Musharraf, with all the internal difficulties that he faces, has made speeches in which he has called for a law banning honour killings and recommended that the Hudood ordinances and the blasphemy laws be scrutinised to prevent further abuses. According to the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, more than 600 women were killed in the name of honour in Pakistan in 2003. We should all welcome the President's words, but encourage him to go further than merely scrutinising the blasphemy laws, which have had such an adverse impact on minority groups, and reform or repeal them. We have to understand the formidably difficult context within which President Musharraf operates, but the Government should do everything possible to encourage Pakistan to do more to adhere to international human rights standards and guarantee the rights of all Pakistani citizens.

The last issue that I shall discuss is the Israel-Palestine conflict. The new factors include the result of the US election and what effect, if any, it will have. Will we see a conventional second term, when the US President, knowing that he does not have to face the electorate and wanting his place in history, is more ready to strike out boldly? Will President Bush be ready to intervene in the conflict as strenuously as President Clinton was and does he realise the enormous damage that is being done to the United States image in the Arab world by the perceived partisan position that the US has taken? The continued violence and suffering of both the Israeli and Palestinian people clearly highlight the need for a resolution of the conflict. That resolution would be an essential component of efforts to defeat terrorism and promote reform in the middle east. Whether the terrorists are using the fact of the Israel-Palestine conflict as a catalyst or excuse, we do not know.

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman is implicitly critical of the US Administration's position on the Israel-Palestine problem. However, have they not taken a less forward role because they have come to the conclusion that Arafat is not a partner for peace and that, after what President Clinton tried to do at Camp David and Taba, there has been no point in pursuing the issue very aggressively? Given the present circumstances perhaps that is about to change, but does the right hon. Gentleman think that we need a post-Arafat era before peace can be achieved, or should the Americans have tried to make progress while Arafat was in charge?

Donald Anderson: It is difficult to say clearly what the reasons are. Will history see President Arafat, who is, of course, now gravely ill, as the Hamlet of Palestine, who was never able to reach a decision? To what extent were the political constraints on him too intense? He has had several opportunities, but failed to make decisions, so one understands the hesitations of the US. Nevertheless, subject to his illness, he still holds the flag and is still a symbol of the people of Palestine. He has brought them from the refugee camps to at least the possibility of a two-state solution. He is the elected president, and we should do all that we can to work with him—assuming that he is able to resume his duties—rather than to shun him.

My hon. Friend—I think that I can call him that in this context—will know that, towards the end of his presidency, President Clinton expended enormous human and political capital at Camp David on trying to reach a solution, and he came extremely close. Yet, the incoming Bush Administration seemed to want to do anything but become involved. For a year or more, they refused to intervene, if only to be different from Clinton. I hope that there will be no such hiatus or vacuum during the second Administration.

Mr. Maples: My point was that the Bush Administration paid no attention until 11 September precisely because of President Clinton's experience at Camp David and subsequently at Taba. He came to the conclusion, which the Bush Administration presumably understood, that no deal would be reached with Arafat, so it was a waste of time devoting attention to the issue.

Donald Anderson: That is a possible reason, but the European Union, for example, did not reach the same conclusion. At the very least, let us converge by saying that there is no reason for further delays. We should remember that an earlier Administration sent Mr. Baker to the area, and that initiative led via Madrid to Oslo.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I rather share the assessment that my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) made of the Americans' motivation. However, as someone who has visited Israel several times and who recently saw the plight of the Palestinians in the west bank and Gaza, let me reinforce the right hon. Gentleman's point by arguing that it is extraordinarily dangerous for the United States to leave a vacuum in the Arab-Israeli dispute. Now is the time for a decisive step forward, lest very ugly forces be unleashed.

Donald Anderson: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. In Prime Minister's questions yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said that the issue is his priority. We know from the documents leaked to The Daily Telegraph that the theme of his senior adviser two years ago was to keep the issue of Israel-Palestine high on the agenda. There is now no excuse for not seeking to address it as best we can.

The Committee noted the failure by both sides to implement the measures outlined in the road map. We reiterated our concerns about the lack of significant progress on reforming the Palestinian security sector and about the illegal settlements and the security fence. Clearly, we have to take account of the fragile nature of the coalition in Israel, where certain rabbis are urging members of the Israel defence forces to consider disloyalty or defection in relation to Gaza. That is the political context in which Israel operates, and the coalition will have to be much broader if there is to be progress.

The Committee concluded that the road map may be fatally stalled and that time is running out fast for a viable two-state solution. Nevertheless, we believe that a resolution of the conflict is attainable, and the broad outlines are visible, as the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) has outlined on several occasions. Israel's planned withdrawal from Gaza is a welcome development, so long as it is seen as part of the road map—as a first step, not as an end station or a prelude to de facto annexation.

It is clearly important that the international community should work to ensure that the withdrawal from Gaza is fully consistent with a durable solution to the conflict. We need to provide assistance with post-withdrawal peacekeeping, together with Egypt and other key countries. What are we doing to provide such protection in this difficult transition period in Gaza?

The report reiterates our previous conclusion that the case for building a barrier along the green line would be strong and acceptable but to build it within the west bank is not justifiable, acceptable or legal, and gives rise to fears that Israel is doing it simply to annex land. Unilateral efforts to change facts on the ground in the occupied territories have been shown to be wholly illegal under international law. Actions taken so far have failed to stop Israel's construction of the barrier in the occupied territories.

We can understand by imagining the situation transposed to our constituencies how suicide bombings will enrage, anger and frustrate the peace movement in Israel; little seems to have been done by the Palestinian Authority about the propaganda that lauds the forces in question, or to prevent the infiltration. What more are the Government doing to impress on the Israeli Government the illegality of building the barrier in the occupied territories?

I concede that I have skated over a few of the key topics, and not mentioned, for example, the Russian Federation, our reflections on international law, or the international co-operation to tackle terrorism, including the attempt to relate more constructively to the Arab world. However, the broad range of subjects covered in our report reflects the Committee's view that the diverse threats to security posed by terrorism and failed states are or could become interconnected and therefore need to be countered as part of a coherent strategy.

The Committee will keep the matter high on our agenda and we intend to publish a further report on the war against terrorism next spring. I commend the report to the Chamber.

3.2 pm

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling) (Con): Like the right hon. Member for Swansea, East (Donald Anderson), I shall focus on Iraq, but not exclusively and in a wider security context beyond that country. First, I want to make it clear that whatever differing views hon. Members in this Chamber may take about the rights or wrongs of the invasion of Iraq in the first place, I consider that we have a wholly unambiguous responsibility to give total support to our armed forces in Iraq in their vital work and to do our utmost to ensure their safe return to our country.

Now that weapons of mass destruction have been found not to exist following the final report of the Iraq survey group, and as the Government were clearly aware that that was the likely conclusion, the Government's justification for the war in Iraq has, of course, changed fundamentally. We have been invited on successive occasions by the Government, and not least by the Prime Minister, to support the war on the ground of the benefit to the Iraqi people from regime change—getting rid of Saddam Hussein.

Undoubtedly, the removal of Saddam Hussein has mostly been beneficial, although as has already been pointed out, the 1 million-strong Christian community in Iraq now faces a degree of virulent and indeed violent persecution in the post-Saddam Hussein era that it never experienced when he was in power. Whether or not it was beneficial to remove Saddam Hussein—I have made it clear that, on balance, I think it most definitely was—it is not the basis on which history will judge whether the invasion of Iraq was justified. In any number of countries around the world, people might have their position improved by the removal of a regime. Indeed, some of us in this Room might argue, as I most certainly would, that regime change in this country might be beneficial for the people. However, regime change is not a justification for military action, particularly if there is no threat.

The question that must be posed now and which will be answered by historians is whether the world has become a safer place as a result of the invasion of Iraq and the removal of Saddam Hussein. I do not pretend for one moment that that fundamental question can be conclusively answered now, but some 18 months away from the invasion and the end of a short war, it is already possible to start drawing at least preliminary conclusions. The pluses and minuses that must be considered in determining whether the world has become a safer place yield initial results that look distinctly discouraging.

On the plus side, we got rid of an aggressor who was responsible for two wars. He was responsible not merely for the invasion of Kuwait, but for starting the Iran-Iraq war, which resulted in an appalling number of deaths. In addition, he had in the past possessed and used weapons of mass destruction. However, we must focus on the situation when the British and American Governments decided to invade Iraq. We now know that at that time Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction. He was being successfully contained—perhaps more successfully than we thought—by the no-fly zone policy, which was undoubtedly successful. He was also contained by the UN weapons inspectors who had been in the country since the end of the first Gulf war. We now know that, in addition to having no weapons of mass destruction, there was no production of such weapons. It has not been demonstrated that Saddam Hussein posed a direct threat to British interests such as the sovereign bases in Cyprus. At the time of the invasion, it was difficult to argue that he presented a security threat to us or the worldwide community. Most significantly, given what has happened since, it was not possible to show that he had links with al-Qaeda at the time we invaded Iraq. To all intents and purposes, Iraq was free of al-Qaeda.

Turning to the minus side, the presence of al-Qaeda is the single greatest security change from a worldwide perspective. As was forecast accurately by the Joint Intelligence Committee and reported by the Intelligence and Security Committee before the war, an invasion of Iraq was likely to bring into Iraq an al-Qaeda presence that had not been there previously. The Prime Minister was clearly warned of that. That JIC intelligence assessment has been shown to be wholly correct, and now inside Iraq a considerable number of al-Qaeda operatives have an opportunity to hone their terrorist techniques. Having honed those terrorist techniques, the worldwide risk is that as so many of the operatives come from outside Iraq, they will in due course go back to other countries and practise them.

I was interested in reported comments made by the Iraqi interim Prime Minister Allawi earlier this week. He gave the information that, of those arrested in Iraq in the last two weeks, 167 were foreign fighters. They included four senior members of the al-Zarqawi terrorist group, who, interestingly, have renamed themselves "al-Qaeda in Iraq". The four senior members who were arrested were all foreigners. One was a Palestinian, another Lebanese, another Saudi and the last Egyptian. In a real and practical sense, that illustrates the extent of foreign al-Qaeda penetration in Iraq.

The security consequences are considerable. What is happening in Iraq is that, although we do not wish it, we are inadvertently providing a training area of the highest quality for al-Qaeda operatives. Any experienced military trainer will say that, for training to be first class, there are two requirements. First, the training should, as near as possible, create an operational situation. Secondly, the best training is against the best and toughest. Unhappily, that is precisely the training benefit that we are providing to al-Qaeda in Iraq. It does not have to simulate an operational environment—it has got one. That provides it with the best possible training environment. It is training against the best—British and American forces.

We are training al-Qaeda personnel across the range of potential terrorist weapons and devices. We are giving them the opportunity to use the existing range of terrorist weapons—surface-to-air missiles, rocket-propelled grenades and improvised explosive devices, which are often remotely controlled. We are, of course, also giving them training and experience in the positioning and use of suicide bombers. They can train against the most sophisticated countermeasures that are available against terrorists—those used by American and British forces. I am afraid that I cannot exaggerate the potential benefit to al-Qaeda of being able to use and try to deploy terrorist tactics against those countermeasures.

Those involved are getting training in infiltration—the infiltration of counter-terrorist forces, such as the Iraqi police and Iraqi armed forces. Sadly, it appears without any doubt that they are having success. Reference was made to the brutal, cold-blooded murder of about 50 Iraqi police recruits. From what one reads, all the indications are that that must have been at least in part an inside job. Lastly, they are being trained in intimidation. As we have seen only today, they have intimidated the Christian community in Iraq by announcing that they intend to murder one person in every Christian household in the country if Christian women in Iraq continue not to wear headscarves.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I am a little confused by my right hon. Friend's remarks. At the beginning of his speech, he seemed to be saying that he supported military intervention in Iraq. He now seems to be saying that we are creating training camps for al-Qaeda. Does he think that there was a method of removing Saddam Hussein using military force, which inevitably meant occupation, without creating such conditions?

Sir John Stanley: What I said at the outset was that we must give total support to our armed forces in the job that they are doing in Iraq. I am now highlighting the security downsides to the intervention.

Perhaps most chilling of all is the fact that the Iraq environment is giving al-Qaeda the ability to develop and use the terrorist weapon of kidnapping, coupled with the use of a particularly brutal form of murder—beheading. One of the most worrying features of kidnapping is its relative ease of exportability. We have already seen the terrorist weapon of kidnapping exported to Saudi Arabia and recently to Afghanistan.

It is a matter of great concern that we are giving al-Qaeda operatives inside Iraq a significant benefit in military and operational terms. It is a bitter irony that having gone to war in Afghanistan, in my view entirely rightly, to remove its Taliban and al-Qaeda training areas, we have by following that with the invasion of Iraq unwittingly created a very high-value training area for al-Qaeda in Iraq.

Mr. Tyrie: I agree with my right hon. Friend, and I am grateful to him for having given way a second time. I am trying to elicit from him whether he now thinks that it was a mistake to invade Iraq, given the consequences, or whether he thinks that there might have been some other method of dealing with Saddam Hussein that would not have resulted in the creation there of training camps for al-Qaeda.

Sir John Stanley: I am happy to explain my position to my hon. Friend. I voted for the war in Iraq on 18 March 2003. I did so with the benefit of what the Prime Minister of this country said to me and the rest of the House of Commons about the threat from Saddam Hussein. We were told that Saddam Hussein had a large number of weapons of mass destruction, some of which could be ready to use within 45 minutes, and that they threatened vital British interests such as the sovereign base areas in Cyprus. That was the basis on which I cast my vote. Knowing what I do now in terms of the threat, I make it clear that if I had had such knowledge at the time, there is no way in which I would have supported an invasion of Iraq.

I want now to move beyond Iraq and point to the consequences for security elsewhere of our huge commitment there. I turn first to Afghanistan. As the House knows, several members of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs were able to go there earlier this year. There has undoubtedly been a huge consumption of military resources and finance in Iraq. However, we must ask what the impact has been on places such as Afghanistan. I welcome the fact that a successful democratic election has taken place, but the Prime Minister was not justified in seeking to convey the impression in Prime Minister's Question Time yesterday that, because Afghanistan has seen one successful election, that is the end of the country's difficulties. If he runs true to form, he may well suggest after the Iraqi elections in January next year that that will be the end of difficulties in that country. I am afraid that that will not be the case.

On security in Afghanistan, the Committee says—it is not contested—that President Karzai's writ runs in only part of the country, and arguably in a relatively small part. The warlords effectively reign supreme in their own areas. They are flush with funds. They are able to buy the weapons and recruit the militias that they want. The Taliban and al-Qaeda are far from eliminated there; indeed, they are having some success in rebuilding their positions. As the right hon. Member for Swansea, East indicated, we have far too few boots on the ground to provide credible security, yet security is fundamental to a stable democracy.

In reality, the job in Afghanistan is only half done. We have not put in the necessary resources—armed forces and finances—partly, if not largely, because of the substantial commitments made by the British and American Governments in Iraq. We are paying a heavy cost in Afghanistan.

Next is the situation in Russia, which is extraordinarily important. One justification, with which I agreed, that the Prime Minister cited for invading Iraq was the huge, long-term, worldwide danger of the al-Qaeda and extreme Islamic terrorist threat coalescing with the possession of weapons of mass destruction. I agree with him that that is the single greatest threat that the world faces, but he made those remarks about the wrong country. We now know that there are no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, but what he said is totally valid in relation to Russia and the WMD stockpile of the former Soviet Union. It is the largest stockpile in the world, and it has the potential to be a serious threat if terrorists get their hands on any portion of it.

As far as we know, that stockpile covers the full range of WMD. I shall deal first with the nuclear weapons. As a member of the defence committee of the NATO Parliamentary Assembly, I had the benefit a few months ago of being given a briefing, including pictures and photographs, on the security dimension of the nuclear materials that have been extracted from the reactors of former Soviet naval ships—submarines and surface vessels. Pictures showing the inadequacy of security surrounding those nuclear materials were deeply disturbing.

As for chemical weapons, the Foreign Affairs Committee had the benefit of being briefed in person by US Senator Richard Lugar, one of the world's leading experts on such weapons in the former Soviet Union stockpile. Inside what is now Russia, a huge stockpile of chemical weapons is still waiting to be decommissioned. There are worries about the security of those weapons.

Finally, President Yeltsin admitted that the former Soviet Union had a biological weapons programme, in complete contravention of its signing of the biological weapons convention. There has been an eerie and worrying silence, certainly in terms of any public documentation of which I am aware, as to whether those biological weapons have been destroyed, and if not, where they are.

I hope and believe that the basic problem in Russia is not will. The Russians are keen to get rid of that huge arsenal. With the terrorist problem that they have in their country, one can understand why they should be keen. The problem is money. Huge sums are being spent in Iraq to deal with what must be faced up to as the internal security consequences of our invasion of that country, when those same sums would be of enormous value in dealing with the former Soviet Union's stockpile. In 2003, the Chancellor announced a £3 billion special reserve to cover military operations in Iraq. The US Congress has appropriated a staggering $100 billion for military operations in Iraq. If that money, or even some of it, had been used and was now being used to remove the former Soviet stockpile, that would be a huge improvement in world security.

In conclusion, we cannot reach a definitive view as yet of whether the world is a safer place as a result of the invasion. However, there are grounds for serious worries about what will happen when the al-Qaeda elements that have now poured into Iraq get the benefit of operational experience and go back to other countries around the world. I hope that I am proved wrong, but I fear that there may be some awesome and awful consequences once those al-Qaeda operatives who are working in Iraq, doing such appalling things, get back to other parts of the world.

3.28 pm

Mr. Greg Pope (Hyndburn) (Lab): I am grateful to follow the two right hon. Members who are members of the Committee.

I want first to make a point about Iraq. I supported the war; I voted for it in March last year. Unlike the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley), I think that it was the right thing to do. The world is a better place without Saddam Hussein. All hon. Members must have found it a difficult decision. I certainly found it difficult to decide how to vote.

Whatever we thought about the war, and whatever the rights and wrongs of going into Iraq, we can agree, and should be able to form a consensus on, our duty not to walk away from the people of Iraq now. People in the Stop the War Coalition—not all, but some—urge that British troops should pull out. We cannot leave the people of Iraq to the Ba'athist elements, to the al-Zarqawis of this world, to the al-Qaedas or to the anarchy of terrorism. We have a duty to make Iraq a stable place, to make the elections in January a success and to rebuild and reconstruct Iraq.

We can be enormously proud of the work of the British Army in Iraq. I was fortunate enough to be able to visit Iraq a while ago. I spent a brief time in Baghdad with the British Office and then went to Basra to see the work that British soldiers are doing there. As a House of Commons, we can be enormously proud of the work that our soldiers are doing in some of the most difficult and dangerous circumstances imaginable, especially in the south of the country.

It is quite likely that the Queen's Lancashire Regiment will be recalled to Iraq as part of the reconfiguration of our troops there. The regiment has already served with distinction there, and I know that if it has to go back, it will rise to the challenge and serve with distinction again, but that might be easier if it were not threatened with a merger, or abolition.

I wish to focus also on Afghanistan. I add to those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Donald Anderson) and the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling my congratulations to President Karzai, whom we were fortunate enough to meet when the Committee visited Afghanistan this year. There has been remarkable success in that country, which had never had elections before. Between 9 million and 10 million people, of whom about 4 million are women, registered to vote in those elections. Women now have a say in the running of Afghanistan for the first time.

We should be proud of our contribution to making Afghanistan a more democratic nation, but that is not to say that there are not problems. There is a problem with drug production and poppy cultivation. We flew over Afghanistan into Kabul and then to Mazar-e-Sharif in the north, and somebody told us that every cultivated field that we could see out of the porthole of the RAF Hercules was a poppy field. They go on for mile after mile. If we are serious about tackling that problem, we must provide some peasant farmers with a viable and profitable alternative. It is too easy for them to fall back on poppy production, which is enormously profitable, and for us to leave them in league with certain warlords.

In south Afghanistan, there is still fighting with Taliban elements; there is fighting along the Pakistan border in the south Waziristan area. At some point, we will have to tackle the warlords. We saw the work that the British Army is doing in Mazar-e-Sharif, in the north, where a small provincial reconstruction team of perhaps 40 British soldiers is doing remarkable work. Those soldiers are winning a hearts-and-minds campaign with the people in that area; they are respected and popular, and we should be proud of them. However, if we put the issue in context, we see that there are 40 British soldiers in north Afghanistan, whereas General Dostum has about 10,000 men under arms in that area. We cannot allow that situation to continue indefinitely.

I agree that there are too few troops on the ground, but that is not necessarily our fault. I do not think that British forces should make up the shortfall in peacekeeping troops in Kabul. We are a member of NATO, and it is about time that some of our colleagues in NATO who enjoy talking about Afghanistan started to put troops on the ground there. However, although we are talking about the extra contribution that our allies could make, we need more money. There is a danger that we are trying to rebuild Afghanistan on the cheap. If we want to see a stable, prosperous, peaceful and democratic Afghanistan, that will require a lot more money than is going in.

My third area of focus is the middle east peace process. During the American presidential elections, it struck me that one name cropped up more than that of most foreigners. That was the name of our Prime Minister. I hope that when he picks up the telephone and congratulates President Bush on his re-election, he urges him to breathe life into the middle east peace process. During the Clinton Administration, we saw what a difference it can make if, in his second term, a President does not have to look over his shoulder and worry about a re-election campaign. Instead, he can focus on, and make a difference in, some areas of the world.

In the dying days of his presidency, President Clinton came incredibly close to doing a deal that at least offered a chance of lasting peace in the middle east. It was put to us in Washington—the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) will remember this—by somebody who had served in the Clinton Administration that the deal that Clinton had offered to the Palestinians right at the end was not the deal of a lifetime, but the deal of three lifetimes, but the Palestinians walked away from it.

I understand why the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon made the points that he did—it is easy to see why President Bush did not make the middle east peace process a top priority given what happened to the Clinton Administration's efforts to find a resolution to the conflict—but we must reinvigorate the process. The sickening endless cycle of helicopter-gunship attacks on Palestinians followed by the atrocities of the suicide bombers cannot possibly be allowed to continue. I am very pleased that our Prime Minister has said that it will be the top foreign policy priority. He is right—it should be.

The Committee saw an Israeli security wall when we visited the area last year. First, we went to a village near Qalqiliya. The village is on a hilltop and is surrounded by razor wire. The Israel defence forces had cut off the water supply to the village, which was slowly being strangled. I suspect that there are no Palestinians left in that village. In Qalqiliya, which is a much larger town on the west bank, the Israelis have built a wall with razor wire that entirely circles the town. People told us that it took up to two hours to go through one checkpoint—there is only one way in and out.

We met a farmer whose farm is on one side of the wall and whose land is on the other. He was sleeping outside because he could not get back through the checkpoint to go home at night. We saw children whose homes were on one side of the wall, but whose school was on the other. I never saw the Berlin wall, but I imagine that it looked like that. The wall in Qalqiliya was enormously high, had watchtowers with Israeli soldiers in them and was incredibly intimidating. There is no possible security justification for encircling entire Palestinian towns on the west bank. I have no sympathy for the suicide bombers, but one can see where the anger comes from—it fuels the suicide bombers—in the degradation, humiliation and oppression of the Palestinian people in towns such as Qalqilya. We should redouble our efforts to tell the Government of Israel that the wall is a disgrace and that such treatment of an entire people is simply unacceptable in the modern world.

I shall briefly talk about Iran, which the Committee was also fortunate enough to visit. This is beginning to sound a little like extreme tourism, as the Committee has visited a variety of places that probably few people would want to visit on holiday. A claim that is often made about British policy is that we are just a poodle of American foreign policy. Nothing gives the lie to that claim better than our approach to Iran. On one side, there is the American neo-con view that Iran is part of an axis of evil. On the other side—the British side—there is the very clear view that we should have constructive engagement with Tehran.

I very much welcome the announcement made this week by our Foreign Secretary, which in effect ruled out a military solution to the threat that Iran poses. That threat, however, is real and needs to be dealt with. Iran is attempting to build a civilian nuclear power programme, although it is hard to think of a country that needs a nuclear power programme less than Iran. It is rich in all sorts of energy resources and does not need such a programme. The obvious fear that it is developing weapons-grade uranium is real. The answer, however, is not military intervention but diplomacy through the United Nations and the troika of European nations—Britain, France and Germany.

Mr. Streeter: I certainly agree that constructive engagement with Iran is very important. However, if later this month the International Atomic Energy Agency reports to the Security Council that there is no compliance and that Iran is still enriching uranium, does not the hon. Gentleman agree that it may be unwise for anyone to rule out any particular sanction, especially the sanction that the Iranians most fear?

Mr. Pope: The corollary of what the hon. Gentleman is saying is that we would leave open the option of a military assault on Iran, but I do not believe that threatening Iran is likely to have the desired effect. If the desired effect is that it should not enrich uranium to build a nuclear weapons programme—I am sure we all agree on that—I am not sure that threatening it will be the most productive way to achieve it.

One problem when considering Iran is that it is tempting simply to look at the Iranian Government and see a fairly unpleasant regime. They have a poor human rights record, they oppress their own people and they may be trying to develop weapons of mass destruction. However, they are not simply a monolith. One thing that most encouraged me when I went to Iran was what a vibrant culture it has. It is a young country—more than half Iran's population are under the age of 20, and many of those people are not happy with their Government. The best beacon of hope that they have is that brave woman, Shirin Ebadi, the Iranian Nobel peace prize winner, whom we were privileged to meet. When she flew back to Tehran, thousands of women flocked to Tehran airport flouting the laws on the wearing of the veil. We should look to people like that. I do not think that threatening the Iranians is the most constructive way of achieving our aims.

I also want to focus on the forgotten conflict in Kashmir. For too long, Kashmir has been locked in a kind of nuclear stalemate. There have been two wars between Pakistan and India, countless incursions from one side or the other and countless deaths. I welcome President Musharraf's recent diplomatic initiatives, which at least have the benefits of showing fresh thinking and moving away from the sloganising that has for so long characterised both the Pakistani and Indian positions on Kashmir. It is a little disappointing that those initiatives have not had a warmer response from the Indian Government, and perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister might mention anything that the British Government can do to encourage a warmer response and reciprocation from the Government of India.

I understand that it is difficult for Britain to be an honest broker in the Kashmir conflict. The legacy of empire is probably a burden too great, and we have too many ties with both countries for us to be able to play that role, but we have a duty to try. I gently say to my hon. Friend that the problems of Kashmir arose on partition in 1947 on the watch of a Labour Government. Perhaps it falls to this Labour Government to try to do whatever they can to heal the divisions. We could try to engage the Americans further in the problem. They have played an effective role between India and Pakistan as a firefighter, and when tensions have been great, they have played an effective role in getting people together. However, perhaps they should be more than just a firefighter when times are bad. They should try to resolve the problem when times are better.

We should bear in mind a deeply held view. I represent a large community of Kashmiri origin in my constituency, and whatever the solution is to the problem—I certainly do not know—it will require the agreement of the people of Kashmir themselves. It is not just a matter of international diplomacy that we can decide on their behalf.

I am happy to support the war on terror, and I have been a loyal supporter of the Government in that, including on the war on Iraq. However, we must not allow the war on terror to diminish our respect for human rights. It is impossible to wage war to promote human rights, as arguably we have in Afghanistan and Iraq, while at the same time withholding the human rights of our opponents. In that context, what is happening in Guantanamo Bay undermines the credibility of the United States in particular, and also of the western nations allied to the United States when we acquiesce in that. We should be far more robust in telling the Americans that the human rights situation in Guantanamo Bay is unacceptable.

I fear that several nations are using the war on terror as a cloak to repress their own people. China, for example, is ruthlessly repressing people in various provinces, claiming that it is doing so because they are terrorists. Frankly—I say this as a critical friend—the response of the British Government to China's abuses has been supine. We should reassess our policy towards China and be far more robust.

Uzbekistan has been a steadfast ally in the war on terror. Its bases and airstrips have been incredibly useful, and we are grateful for them, as are the Americans. The country, however, has arguably the worst human rights record in the world. It has been said that it boils its opponents, and we ought to say to countries such as Uzbekistan, "If you want to be an ally of ours, you cannot behave in this fashion. It is completely unacceptable." It might be helpful if our ambassador in Tashkent were able to raise those issues with the Government there, but we do not have an ambassador in Tashkent. That is a matter of great concern to hon. Members on the Committee and across all parties.

It is not enough just to tackle terrorism. We are rightly robust in facing down the terrorist threat worldwide. One of the most encouraging developments recently was Osama bin Laden's attempted intervention in the American elections. If he is reduced to sending messages by video because he cannot carry out the atrocities that he would undoubtedly love to carry out against us, the Americans and other western nations, we are succeeding in the war on terrorism. That is a good thing, but we must also accept that it is not enough just to be tough on terrorism; we must drain the swamp in which terrorism grows and divide the peoples of areas such as the middle east from the terrorists. To corrupt the Prime Minister's phrase, we need to be tough on terrorism and tough on the causes of terrorism.

3.47 pm

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I follow a couple of outstanding speeches from which I have picked up a lot. I particularly agree with the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope) about Guantanamo Bay, which deeply concerns me and to which I shall return in a moment. I also strongly agree with the lion's share of the extremely thoughtful and well-researched speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) and, in particular, with his allusion to the threat from lack of control and potential loss of control over weapons of mass destruction in the former Soviet Union and, specifically, Russia. I gave quite a lot of thought to that issue during the years in which I worked in that part of the world.

Most people agree that things have not gone according to plan in this war. Most would agree that the price of the invasion of Iraq is considerable. It is worth listing what that price is. We have a western alliance that is divided and seen to be divided by those who resent western and American ascendancy. Our moral authority, to which the hon. Member for Hyndburn alluded, has been badly damaged by Guantanamo Bay and Abu Ghraib. Just as importantly, the limits to western power and to the United States' power in particular have been brutally exposed by Iraq; the US is militarily strong, but that does not appear to be the right or best form of strength to deal with this threat. It looks as if Iraq will be the limit to even the most enthusiastic neo-conservatives' ambitions of rolling out the new foreign policy invented by their Washington think-tanks in the 1990s.

Even now, after 18 months, there is serious insurgency in Iraq, and few of us know how it will be brought to an end. We can hope, but that is all we can rely on. A military solution looks extremely difficult to find. The border, particularly with Iran, is poorly policed where it is policed at all, and the scope for further penetration of Iraq and the building up of what were described as al-Qaeda training camps will certainly continue unless there is some radical change of policy.

A middle east settlement is further away than it has been in many years. Far from accelerating the process, the invasion of Iraq has made it much worse. Far from acting as a deterrent against nuclear proliferation, which is probably the biggest threat to our security, the invasion of Iraq seems to be spurring several countries to maintain or enhance their weapons programmes, the most prominent of which are Iran and North Korea.

[Mr. Andrew Tyrie]

Far from winning over moderates in the middle east who yearn for a more western and democratic style of government, the invasion seems to have succeeded only in alienating large sections of the populations there. The effect of the invasion has been to strengthen Islamic fundamentalism, including militant fundamentalism, and weaken a number of secular Islamic states, some of which are now internally under threat from fundamentalism. There also seems to be a dangerous binding together of Arab nationalism and Islamic fundamentalism. That would worry me deeply, and it is reminiscent of what happened after Suez, which enabled Nasser to bind his breed of nationalism with socialism and anti-colonialism, which all but expelled the west from influencing much of the middle east for more than 20 years.

Finally, there is Iraq itself, to which I have hardly referred in my litany of things that seem to have gone wrong. We are told that up to 100,000 Iraqi casualties may have been sustained, although that may be huge exaggeration; I have no way of knowing. I remain extremely concerned that our action has been deeply detrimental to western interests. We have performed a humanitarian act by removing a brutal dictator, but I can think of few other benefits that we have derived from our military action. Indeed, the Prime Minister seems to admit as much from time to time, when he says that he will apologise for the intelligence on the possible threat that led to the war, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling alluded, but not for removing Saddam Hussein. By implication, that seems to be saying, "Well, I got rid of Saddam Hussein; he was an evil man, and I will not apologise for having done that good for the world."

A number of hon. Members may think that I have overcooked the down side, but even if they do not agree with all my points, most people would agree that we are in a mess. I want to explain why we are in that mess, and in so doing to make some suggestions on how to get out of it. We are not in the mess because we failed to do adequate post-war planning or did not send in enough troops, or because not enough thought was given to policing the Syrian or Iranian borders or the diplomacy before the invasion with a number of key middle east countries was poor, which it certainly was. Neither are we in a mess because we underestimated the Ba'athist capacity to plan for our occupation and make life difficult once we arrived, or because of al-Qaeda, about which the hon. Member for Hyndburn spoke. Those reasons fall into the category of second-order issues.

We are in a mess because the justification for military action given by George Bush and the Prime Minister has had dramatic repercussions in how foreign policy is being conducted in the world. I am referring, of course, to regime change and pre-emption. Regime change and pre-emptive military action can never become the basis for orderly relations between states, and neither can attempts to impose western values at the barrel of a gun. The weak resent such doctrines, which creates the conditions for harbouring terrorists in otherwise moderate Muslim populations. Meanwhile, those strong enough to seek to protect themselves from such policies will do so. It has not been lost on small states that do not share western values that North Korea—a nuclear power and a far more serious rogue state—did not get the same treatment just after it expelled inspectors, while Iraq was invaded just after letting them in.

The plain fact is that the doctrines used to supply the intellectual support for the military action that we have taken are deeply dangerous and destabilising. They further neither America's nor Britain's national interests. They erode the things that keep order in the world, such as the principle of non-interference—"Don't invade my house and I won't invade yours."

I would be less worried if I felt that we could heap all the blame on ideological zealotry in Washington and particularly on a small group of neo-conservatives. Unfortunately, however, I do not take that view, because my Prime Minister is in the vanguard on such issues and my country has been articulating the rhetoric. He has been arguing for several years that we should use military force to overthrow regimes that do not share western interests. What is more, he has been a vigorous advocate of such intervention even where broad-based support for it could not be obtained in the international community. He has made that clear in several important speeches.

If we persist with such a policy, anarchy ultimately beckons. Larger states that know that they are immune from the regime change treatment will use the same justification for their own actions, adopting the language of George Bush and of the Prime Minister to buttress their foreign policy interests. China has recently used the language of regime change in reference to Taiwan. North Korean spokesmen have been saying for two years that they may need to launch a pre-emptive strike on South Korea.

However, this is not just about language; it is about action, too. Putin has used the same logic to justify military action in Georgia. He is doing so not only to suppress terrorism, but to justify what he says is pre-emptive military action to secure his frontiers. The truth is that that is not what he is doing: he has deep interests in the Caucasus, which go way beyond trying to suppress the insurgency in Chechnya and have much more to do with ensuring that Russia maintains a tourniquet on oil supplies out of the Caspian sea. That is his aim, but he has found a new form of justification for it.

I have given only a hint of what lies in the Pandora's box that we have opened with our new policies. What we are dealing with—we must be clear about this, and I am very frustrated that so many people seem not to be—is a revolution in the foreign policy of the world's leading power, which our country is actively supporting. That revolution is deeply inimical to British interests.

I may be extremely and accidentally selective in the people whom I talk to in the foreign policy world—I talk to quite a few in this country and, indeed, in Washington, where I have a number of links—but I have the impression that the majority of people accept much of what I have said. That includes officials on the policy-making side; they might not put it quite the same way, but they basically accept what I have said. In fact, aside from small cliques and a diminishing number of people in think-tanks, it is difficult to find many supporters in London and Washington for these new doctrines and this new approach to foreign policy. Even the neo-conservatives in Washington are now arguing bitterly among themselves about whether they got things right.

I think that George Bush knows—many of his advisers certainly do—that the new US policy is derived from a number of misconceptions that gained ground after the cold war, and I can summarise them in three sentences. The first is the belief that the US preponderance after the cold war could be harnessed to impose a new world order. The second is the belief that the peoples, if not leaderships, of most countries share a deep-down yearning for American values. The third is that we can make the world a more secure, safe and peaceful place by spreading democracy around the world, even if we initially do so by force.

The first of those suppositions is simply wrong. It is not possible for America to impose a new world order, and I have tried to explain why. Indeed, it will create only a new world disorder. The second and third suppositions—that most countries want western values and that a democratic world inevitably means a more peaceful one—both need heavy qualification. On the second supposition, the truth is that, if anything, the world is becoming more heterogeneous and not more homogeneous in its values. That is a paradox of globalisation. The values that lie behind many communities are diverging, and communities are also becoming more local. Politics in all countries, whether democratic or not, is becoming more deeply local, while at the same time economic forces are pushing countries to become much more interdependent and creating a tension. Managing that tension will be a major challenge for policy makers in the 21st century.

As for the third supposition—the idea that if we make the whole world democratic, peace will break out everywhere—a huge amount of ink has been spilt on this subject. I will not try to launch into a lengthy debate; I shall only point out that the first world war was probably the most popular war in history. Asquith was jeered by a jingoistic crowd just outside this Hall, and the experience apparently had a deep influence on him and led him to change his mind about whether to take Britain into the war in 1914. He was sitting on the fence for a long time. If there had been referendums in Europe on whether to go to war in 1914, I am sure that there would have been three-to-one or four-to-one support in all countries. Indeed, a good number of the countries that participated were democracies or quasi-democracies. The mobilisation of jingoistic populism in democracies can be a source of conflict, just as much as a democratic country's wish to remain prosperous and peaceful can be.

Mr. Streeter: My hon. Friend is making a typically thoughtful speech. I certainly agree that trying to export a Westminster or even US-style democracy to all parts of the world is a huge mistake, but does he not think that some basic democratic principles—rule of law, freedom of speech, some kind of representative governance—are important, and that if they were to take hold in other parts of the word by whatever means, the world would be a better place?

Mr. Tyrie: I think that the world would be better, and I want it to go in that direction. When it comes to a clash of fundamental ideologies between dictatorship and democracy, I am not neutral. I have clear and strong views about the direction in which I want to go, but I am cautious about believing that we will necessarily solve all our problems by going down the democratic road.

I am clear that, in trying to win more of the world round to our values, military coercion is likely to have the opposite effect to the one intended. We won the cold war largely by arguing our case without recourse to military means. It is true that the Afghan war was a proxy war, some of which we are now paying for. Some say that, to some degree, that is where al-Qaeda and certainly the Taliban got going. However, the key ingredients that led to collapse of the former Soviet Union, which was an evil empire, lay in the increasing exposure of the satellite countries of eastern Europe to western values, which finally meant that they were prepared to take a risk and rebel. The velvet revolution, the bringing down of the Berlin wall and the vast migration out of East Germany through Hungary and Czechoslovakia were triggered after a debate—in a sense, it was a vigorous ideological struggle—between east and west that took place over 40 years.

I have taken a moment or two to respond to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter), but perhaps I can return to the subject under discussion. I should not have raised the issue of democracy, because it is such a difficult and sensitive subject, but it is important not to have simplistic notions in one's mind or to think that going down one particular route will solve all our problems. It will not.

I said that I would also talk a little about what we should do, bearing in mind the seriousness of the situation. I have half a dozen or so suggestions to make. First, I wish the Government to acknowledge that the muscular nation-building strategy that the Prime Minister articulated in his party conference speech in Brighton and which he also developed in a speech in Chicago in 1999 is a little more difficult than he supposes. That would at least help to change the mood.

Secondly, I hope that the Prime Minister will be more robust during the second presidential term than he was during the first in challenging George Bush's unilateralism. If necessary, he may have to do that publicly. We should have known what was coming. After all, in 2000 Condoleezza Rice wrote in Foreign Affairs that > "a Republican administration will . . . proceed from the firm ground of the national interest, not from the interests of an illusory international community."

Donald Rumsfeld called for a coalition of the willing, the clearest possible statement of unilateralism. We should have been left in no doubt about the limits of British influence in backing the President publicly and hoping at the same time to bend his ear in private.

More than one person in a position to know has given me a vivid description of briefings of the Prime Minister before his meetings with the President at Camp David. I was told that beforehand the Prime Minister would be given a thorough and detailed briefing on each area in which our policy differed from American policy and told how important it was that we got our points across. Apparently, at the subsequent meetings—two were described to me, one of them in starker terms than I shall give now—after the Prime Minister had been wound up to make certain points, George Bush made suggestions of his own to which the Prime Minister replied, "Yes, yes, yes."

I am not at all convinced that the Prime Minister is using our alleged influence even to bend George Bush's ear in private, and I am not even sure that the Americans, now that they feel that they have done their bit for us by pushing unsuccessfully for a second UN resolution, are listening to us any more than to other countries. That worries me deeply.

Of course, it has been said that we should keep trying none the less and that we should not speak up in public, but keep our differences private, because we will at least have a seat at the table or influence equivalent to that of Colin Powell. When I put that thought—it is not great, but it is something—last year to a pro-British American acquaintance of mine who works in the Pentagon, he laughed and said that we were getting about as much influence as Colin Powell's secretary. We must bear in mind that reality when we talk about how much we gain by keeping completely mum and not allowing a cigarette paper to get between our view of the direction of western foreign policy and the American view. I said that I would make half a dozen suggestions, but I am thinking of more as I go along. I promise not to make this speech too long.

Thirdly, we must be much clearer than we have been so far about the threats to stability and the means of making the world more orderly. On the threat, in what is perhaps a vain effort to justify the invasion of Iraq, the Prime Minister and George Bush have sought to bind together nuclear weapons and chemical and biological weapons in the omnibus phrase, "weapons of mass destruction". The truth is that the threat from nuclear weapons is of a completely different order from that of chemical and biological weapons. It was and continues to be a mistake to give the wider public the impression that they basically represent the same level of threat.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling said, the twin challenges that we face are terrorism and nuclear proliferation. A policy based on the primacy of nation states is the best security against both. There is such a thing as international society, and America and Britain both have a huge interest in fostering it and in rendering it less anarchic. What we desperately need is the broadest possible coalition of states against terrorists, even if some do not share our values. Such a coalition may include states in the former Soviet Union, whose values we certainly do not share. Shouting at states that may not be going in the direction that we want them to take will certainly not help. Many states will be ready allies even if they do not share our values, for it will not be lost on them that terrorism in one form or another could also be a threat to their regimes. Several middle eastern states and several in former Soviet Asia come to mind.

Fourthly, we need to remind America—I think we should do so publicly—that terrorists thrive on overreaction, which is exactly what we got from the United States after 11 September. Inadvertently, it became a recruiting sergeant for bin Laden. The key to the suppression of most Islamic terrorism lies in winning over the hearts and minds of moderate Muslim opinion at home and abroad. The Government need to stress that view time and time again and to act on it.

Fifthly, it is unlikely that we will be able to prevent nuclear proliferation by coercion, and certainly not the coercion implied by regime change and pre-emption. On the contrary, coercion is likely to lead countries to redouble their efforts to obtain weapons as a protection against it. To discourage proliferation, we need to make countries that might seek nuclear weapons feel more secure, not less so. We need to create by treaty or negotiation conditions in which they do not need those weapons. I am not suggesting that that is an easy or certain route, but I believe it to be, on the whole, a better route than coercion.

Sixthly, I return to moral authority. We need to rebuild the west's moral authority, which has been extremely badly damaged by the events of the past two years. The abuses of human rights in Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo Bay have a lasting resonance in the middle east that we should not underestimate. To a large degree, that problem is created by the Americans, but it is also our problem, because, among other reasons, we handed more than 300 prisoners of war to the Americans. We have an enduring legal and moral responsibility to take care of those people's welfare even after we have handed them over.

It took me a long time to find out what happened to those people. Even now I have been unable to obtain a good deal of the information that I have been seeking. The Government have sought to avoid my parliamentary questions on the issue for months, and I wrote a letter to the Foreign Secretary that has not been answered. I will have another go on a couple of questions now. Will the Minister, now or later, tell me whether any of those 341 prisoners of war were held in Abu Ghraib? Will he tell me whether we have inquired subsequently about whether any of them were mistreated in Abu Ghraib? Will he tell me whether we made any inquiry about the welfare of the POWs while they were held, as was required, agreed and accepted in a protocol that we signed with the United States about the handling of POWs? Did we use the terms of the protocol to visit them, as we had a right to do, to see whether their welfare had been harmed? I raise these points partly as an illustration of the extent to which we have tacitly found ourselves to be participants. To that extent, what went on in Abu Ghraib and what is still going on in Guantanamo Bay is diminishing all of us.

Perhaps most controversially, I want to discuss the handling of policy in Iraq itself. We need to be clear about our motives and to deal with the deep mistrust that now exists in the middle east about western motives. We need to reassure western Muslim opinion about what we are trying to do and to make it clear that we are not bent on suzerainty in the area, and still less on occupation. Perhaps we are moving to the point at which we may gain more by setting a date for the withdrawal of troops from Iraq and trying to persuade the Americans to do the same than by staying there.

That judgment is not easy. We badly need legitimacy to flow from the elections; there is no legitimacy for the current regime. If we were to say that, after a certain period and given certain conditions, we would withdraw our troops after the elections, would those elections be able to confer greater legitimacy on the regime in Baghdad? I cannot say, but the time has come to consider that question.

I realise that, as well as being very long, my speech has been quite pessimistic. I have argued that the world is a less safe and more disorderly place than it was before the Iraq invasion. The war was not only morally wrong, but not in our national interest. However, I want to end on a more positive note. The threats that the world faces are far less than those that we faced at times during the cold war, when miscalculation, accident or malign leadership in the Soviet Union could have resulted in a nuclear exchange and obliteration and when the superpowers were fighting proxy wars around the world much of the time. The challenges that we now face are far more manageable. If the US provides the leadership, they can and will be tackled, just as they were after the second world war, when for half a century America worked as part of the international community and helped to build it.

Unfortunately, we are not being given such leadership by the current American Administration, but as a fervent Atlanticist I am optimistic. Most of Washington opinion knows that much of what I have said today contains at least a grain of truth and that it is not possible to form by command a new international society in America's image. Most of Washington opinion knows that we are all much stronger in alliance than we are working separately. We must work with the Administration, but we must do so with much greater frankness than we have so far shown about what mistakes we think they are making.

4.18 pm

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) has made a typically thoughtful and all-encompassing speech about aspects of foreign affairs. I agree with much of what he said, and what he said about Iraq is almost entirely true. I have a long and substantial speech of my own brewing about Iraq; hon. Members will he happy that I am not going to make it today, but it is coming along.

I do not want to follow my hon. Friend down this route, but I must pick him up on a couple of points. First, force—and certainly the threat of force—has a part to play in international affairs. It cannot always be ruled out. The terrorist attacks were brought to the United States, and an Administration who, at the time, were heavily criticised by many people in Europe for not being interested in international affairs were forced to become interested in them. Although I think that the invasion of Iraq may turn out to have been a terrible mistake, the invasion of Afghanistan was entirely justified. If failed states and rogue states allow international terrorism to brew within their borders and exert its malign effects outside them, we are entitled to interfere in those states by force if necessary. My second criticism is that, although in the end, we won the battle of ideas across the iron curtain, I am not sure that we would have had the necessary 45 years in which to achieve that effect without being prepared to make a substantial military commitment to the defence of western Europe in that time.

I shall touch on a couple of minor themes in the report. One is political reform in the middle east, which covers some points made by my hon. Friend, and the other is the Arab-Israel dispute. We consistently say in the report that we think that political reform in middle-eastern countries is highly desirable. Why, when we see democracy breaking out in Latin America and, to some extent, in the former Soviet Union, does the Arab world seem, almost uniquely, to be immune to it?

I know that people will say that there is a bit of progress in Oman and Yemen. However, the main Arab countries in which reform is needed are Saudi Arabia and Egypt—one has the money and the other has the intellectual clout in the Arab world—but we have not seen much reform in either and both are feeding grounds for terrorism. Although I agree with those, including my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester, who say that we cannot impose our version of democracy by force, we need to encourage something to take root in such places—perhaps the rule of law, a little more openness, a little more distinction between ruling families and the state, or local elections. I do not suggest that those countries move straight to full-blown western-European-style democracy overnight. However, more progress is needed.

In fact, 15 or 16 of the 19 terrorists came from Saudi Arabia—its money is financing the madrassahs, not only at home but in Pakistan. It is not encouraging malign influences, but it is allowing them to have an effect around the world. So far as I can see, Egypt survives entirely on United States aid, without which its economy would collapse, but it publishes the most appalling libels in its newspapers. I would have thought that one of the advantages of running a dictatorship was that one could stop people doing things like that. If it were a democracy, presumably there would be a plurality of opinions of which those would be some.

Reform is needed. I was disappointed in the Government's response to our report, bearing it in mind that it is three years since 11 September 2001. They say:

> "At the June 2004 G8 Sea Island Summit, the G8 adopted a Plan of Support for Reform in the Broader Middle East—" and that the UK's G8 presidency in the second half of next year would be a very good opportunity to ensure that there was some progress. We need to do things a lot faster and more purposefully than that. We have programmes for promoting greater openness, democracy and the rule of law in the middle east, particularly in those two countries, as do the United States and the European Union. I do not know why the Government do not mention them. I should like the Minister to tell us what the Government feel that they have achieved in that respect, and what we in the west have achieved collectively.

It is not just in our interests to see reform—and, perhaps, circumstances in which terrorism is less likely to be bred or to take root—in those countries; it is in their interests. Saudi Arabia's GDP per head has halved in the past 20 years. Egypt's has not halved, but it was nowhere to start with. Most of the countries in that area are disastrous for their own populations; any prosperity that they enjoy is a result of oil revenues. That is a bit like a child living off a trust fund; it is not very good for building an economy. Unless they have better and less corrupt government, the rule of law and more openness, those countries will not benefit from investment or the establishment of the liberal economic forces that lead to the rising standards of living that can be seen in many other parts of the world, including some countries of eastern Europe. Reform is in their interests and ours.

I take slight issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester in that if such foundations are laid in many Arab countries and their economies start to grow, people will find that they are usefully occupied in running their own businesses or making a living for their families. They will not have time to go to radical clerics and become stirred up into becoming suicide bombers. There is a long way between there and here, but we need to take definite steps in that direction. I would be interested to hear from the Minister what the Government think that they are doing, and what they have achieved. I am not really interested in the second half of our G8 presidency; I should like to know what we have achieved in the past three years.

On the Arab-Israeli conflict, nobody could have tried harder than President Clinton to broker a solution to the problem at Camp David and subsequently at Taba. A deal was very nearly reached. In fact, one Palestinian negotiator said:

> "We were offered 98 per cent. of what we wanted."

I do not think that anybody can blame President Bush for not doing more—certainly in the first part of his presidency before 11 September. He saw what had happened to President Clinton. Arafat was not a partner for peace; he was never prepared to say yes, or to take yes for an answer. There are understandable reasons for that. He has waved the banner for Palestinian nationalism and a Palestinian state for nearly 50 years and perhaps he does not want to be the person who agrees to make a deal that gives up the Palestinian claim to all Palestine and settles for half of it. In that case, we need to wait until we have moved into a post-Arafat era. We have moved halfway into that era with the appointment of various Prime Ministers, but he will never really give them the authority that they need to negotiate a deal.

It remains to be seen during the coming days whether we are likely to move into a post-Arafat era. I cannot help feeling that if we are—whatever one's feelings about Mr. Arafat—the prospects would be better than during the past few years. An example of how disastrous his leadership has been for the Palestinians is that after Taba, where he effectively succeeded in delivering the Israeli electorate to Sharon rather than aiding the re-election of Barak, he completely misguidedly and self-destructively launched the second round of the intifada. Unlike the first intifada, it involved not chucking rocks at Israeli tanks, but letting off suicide bombs in Tel Aviv cafes and Jerusalem pizza parlours.

That has provoked what one could argue is a complete overreaction from the Israelis—it has certainly been a brutal reaction—but if there were no suicide bombers, there would be no fence and no Israeli tanks in Gaza or west bank settlements. Arafat has led them into that; it is an absolute disaster for the Palestinians. There are many questions that the Israelis have to answer about how they have reacted, but there is no question in my mind as to what started the latest round of violence.

To end on a positive note, I would like to suggest a positive way out. We all know what the settlement will be, if it is ever reached. It was very nearly done at Camp David and Taba. It will involve a roughly Palestinian state with its boundaries along the green line as they were set by the UN resolutions in 1948, with its capital in Jerusalem, almost all the Israeli settlements removed from the west bank and a limited right of return for Palestinian refugees to Israel. There will probably need to be a few territorial adjustments. Where there are Israeli settlements right on the border that can be compensated for in some other way, those adjustments should probably take place. A great many of those details were negotiated and discussed at Camp David and Taba.

A formula over the return of refugees was effectively agreed at Taba, where the principle was conceded that the numbers who returned should be controlled by Israel and would be extremely limited. Those who did not come back would be offered alternatives including significant financial compensation. Taba would have allowed the Palestinians to situate the capital of the state of Palestine in Jerusalem.

The parties were very close to a settlement and one cannot help feeling that if Abu Mazen or Abu Ala had been the head of the Palestinian state at Camp David or Taba, a deal would have been reached. I very much doubt whether Sharon and Arafat can ever reach a deal, but Barak and a more moderate Palestinian leader could have done. My point is that we know what the settlement will be. The problem is not identifying the deal, but getting both sides to accept it. Whenever one side is ready to accept it, the other has the kind of Government who are not ready to do so. We are now in a situation in which neither side is ready, but the Palestinians sound keener on a deal than the Israelis.

The road map is completely dead. Any idea that withdrawing from Gaza or that my suggestions could be a way of restarting the road map is whistling in the wind. It was dead from day one. There were two primary things that the opposing sides had to do: the Israelis had to stop building new settlements or expanding old ones, and the Palestinians had to stop the terrorist bombings. As far as I can see, neither side has taken any steps to make even the first move in those directions.

We need to start from a different point of view. The dispute causes externalities—to use an economist's phrase—out of all proportion to the intrinsic problems that it represents. There are other disputes, such as Cyprus. It is self-contained dispute that is similar, but much less violent, and it does not really affect many people outside Cyprus. However, the dispute in the middle east poisons our relations with the Arab world and is one of the causes that bin Laden goes on about—although it was not one of the original causes underlying al-Qaeda's existence and activities. It is desperately in our interests to solve it because it would remove one of the main avowed causes of hatred of the west and of fundamental Islamic terrorism. There is a huge incentive for us to solve it, not just because of the violence that is happening to both sides and the awful lives people have to live, but because of the weight that it would take off our shoulders in dealing with the Arab world.

Because the stakes are so high, it is time to say, "This is the deal," and we should seek to impose it. We could talk to both sides and try to adjust the proposals to take account of any lingering doubts and little problems, but I believe that we and the United States should take the proposed solution to the United Nations Security Council and seek to have it implemented. As a mandatory resolution, it would become international law.

We should tell Mr. Sharon and Mr. Arafat or their successors that that is the deal and that, if they so wished, we would help them to implement it. However, we should make it plain that issues such as the position of the border or whether refugees can return are no longer up for discussion. When both sides do not want to make progress, they always use such matters to trip up the talks; they say that they cannot accept little details here and there. We know what the deal is going to be. In the interests of the international community as well as those of the Palestinians and the Israelis, we should seek to impose it. I see no other way forward.

4.31 pm

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): It is a privilege to participate in the debate.

The right hon. Member for Swansea, East (Donald Anderson) invited me to echo the comments of Baroness Williams, who described the report as brilliant. I am happy to do so. It clearly makes a substantial contribution. As the right hon. Gentleman pointed out, it is the fifth report in the series on the foreign policy aspects of the war on terrorism.

Once again, the Committee has served the House extremely well. The report should be read by all who have an interest in international affairs. As ever, the breadth of the Committee's work is impressive. The hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope) should not worry about a charge of political tourism being levelled at the Committee; the return achieved through the visits and the resulting report more than justifies the effort.

We are at an extremely important juncture in connection with the war on terrorism, with the re-election of President Bush helping to define the context in which international problems will now be tackled. It is not new for the Liberal Democrats to highlight differences with the US Administration's policies. Indeed, yesterday in this Chamber, we had the opportunity to debate that very subject. I repeat today that our principal hope is, as the hon. Member for Hyndburn suggested, that the President will take the opportunity in his second term to broaden his international focus and to widen the coalition of interests that seek to combat the threat of international terrorism.

As many right hon. and hon. Members have said, this is a key moment also for the Government. If ever there was a time to exert the influence that we have gained through our unique and strong relationship with the United States, it is now. With the imminent presidency of the G8, and in 2005 of the European Union, the Government have the opportunity to stamp their mark on all those pressing international issues.

The Committee's report highlights the scale of the challenges and the range of issues that fall under the foreign policy agenda in the war on terrorism. That conflict clearly has a military aspect, but it is far too simplistic to paint the picture of what needs to be done in khaki only. The series of reports of which this is the latest lays that fact bare. It goes without saying that we need to defend ourselves: we need to tackle those who, explicitly or by default, would give aid to international terrorists. However, we need also to tackle the underlying conditions that fuel the terrorists' many and complex causes. We must not lose sight of the need to tackle those causes—the poverty that leads to conflict, which breeds further conflict, which lays the grounds for the growth of terrorism. The Committee has been right in interpreting its remit to look at a broad range of countries across the world, including Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan, the middle east generally and the Russian Federation, while also re-examining the suitability of our international laws and organisations to address those matters. It is good that some of today's contributions have highlighted the particular importance of human rights in this policy area.

It is hard to do justice to the Committee's brief in the time available. Given our other recent opportunities to debate issues in the report, I shall focus my remarks on just a few key matters.

I draw attention to Russia, which has featured in the debate already. The Committee's focus on Russia has been absolutely right and it paints an alarming picture. It shows in more than one way the importance of Russia to the whole war on terror. Parts of the report, and the evidence supplied in the compilation of it, show that there are many in Russia who are suspicious of the west's terminology and think that the war on terror is simply a cover for spreading western influence through the regions of the world where it is not seen to be strong enough. Others have pointed out that it is a handy cover for some activities into which Russia itself wishes to extend its influence. Certainly, the conflict in Chechnya, in terms of how Russia has pursued and justified it, echoes many of the debates that we have in the west. Since the Committee's report was compiled, we have had the horrors in Beslan—unimaginable, terrible events. Sadly, the response to that from the Russian authorities has been almost exclusively in terms of that event's being part of international terrorism and the need to respond to it robustly. That is a mistaken analysis, and we must do everything to persuade the Russians to resist it.

The Committee has drawn particular attention to the existence of nuclear weapons, nuclear materials and other weapons of mass destruction, such as chemical and biological weapons. The situation in Russia is fundamentally alarming. The scale of the problems that remain since the end of the Soviet Union is beyond belief. Some good practical steps have been taken, which I do not want to decry. In particular, the Committee draws attention to the American initiative—the co-operative threat reduction programme—and Senator Lugar and others are prayed in aid. Their expertise has undoubtedly been useful in focusing attention on that matter.

The report is critical of the European Union and its contribution. I hope that the Minister can clarify the position. It is important, as the report highlights, that we make a contribution to ending the nuclear threat from old weapons, missile material and nuclear material at a level commensurate with our economic size in the world.

[Mr. Michael Moore]

There is a danger in how Russia has been assisting Iran. I appreciate that both sides would maintain that that is an entirely civil programme, and we debated that specific issue here in Westminster Hall recently. However, it is important, as we reach the denouement of the situation in Iran at the International Atomic Energy Agency in the coming weeks, that we can persuade Russia of the importance and dangers of the programme and persuade Iran that it is folly to pursue that path.

Another area where Russia plays an important role is Ukraine. Because of the inconclusive results of the presidential election at the weekend—again, that is something to have arisen since the Committee's report—the process will run to a second round. On that issue we see an overlap between the war on terrorism, and old-fashioned political land grab and the desire of the respective blocs, such as Russia, and the United States and the west, to gain as much influence as possible. We shall have to watch the process with great care, because for all our preoccupation, rightly, with the war on terror, we must not lose sight of other geopolitical concerns.

A common thread of today's contributions and a serious thrust of the report is concern about nuclear proliferation. The case study of Pakistan is one that should alarm us all. The report colourfully depicts the A. Q. Khan network as offering almost tailored packages of nuclear expertise to anybody able to provide the funds to buy them. Indeed, the report quotes someone talking about a "nuclear Wal-Mart" having existed in Pakistan.

I appreciate the sensitivity of our dealings with Pakistan, not least because it has been an important ally in the military battles that we have been fighting in Afghanistan and elsewhere. Equally, Pakistan is not a member of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and for that reason some regular sanctions that we might hope to use through the IAEA do not exist. In dealing with President Musharraf and his allies in the regime, however, we must be clear that we cannot accept the way in which they have behaved in recent years, whether in the nuclear field or, as has been mentioned, on human rights.

Probably our most important debate in the House and elsewhere in the last couple of years has been about international law. The report makes a major contribution to that debate. We live in a changed world. Do we therefore need changed responses? I will not enter into the debate that the hon. Members for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) and for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) began. They set out cogent arguments that illustrate the complexities of the issue. However, there is no doubt that there is more dispute about how we legitimise interventions and maintain peace and security in the world than there has been for a generation or more.

There are serious international initiatives seeking to tackle the issue, the most important of which is perhaps the high-level panel that the Secretary-General of the United Nations set up. That panel is due to report soon. As I have mentioned in recent debates, I hope that we will have an opportunity to debate its conclusions in the House and come to our own views on the way forward for the international community.

As the report sets out, whether we are talking about self-defence, anticipatory self-defence and how that interleaves with the US pre-emption doctrine, or the grey area of humanitarian intervention, we must be careful in altering our ideas to reflect a changed world situation not to provide arguments that will justify a Chinese intervention in Taiwan or a North Korean strike against South Korea or some other part of the world. That will be a finely balanced set of arguments, and we in this country must be alive to it.

We debated the reform of the United Nations this time last week in the Chamber. I hope that in responding to the Committee's work the Minister might say something about the United Nations counter-terrorism committee. In our Committee's previous reports, the UN committee, originally chaired by Sir Jeremy Greenstock, has been highlighted as a significant development. I support the initiative, which is a very important part of the UN machinery. However, the report expresses real concerns that it has lost its way, although I accept that there have been attempts to update it and to provide it with proper support and political clout in recent months. Will the Minister give us his perspective on that? That is an example of a broader issue: we must collectively modernise the legal and institutional frameworks for our interventions and maintenance of peace in the world. We must not lose sight of that.

I shall comment briefly on situation in the middle east. I echo the comments made by hon. and right hon. Members about the depressing spectacle that it makes. Our pessimism is made more acute by the political weakness of Ariel Sharon and the political and sad physical frailty of President Arafat. Like the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon, I worry that the road map is dead and that we have been going through the motions for too long. Now is the time for the Quartet to have its bluff called. We will have to find a new solution if the new term for President Bush means that we cannot make progress. As I said, I am not entirely convinced that the policy proposed by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon would be effective, but it is an alternative view, and to make progress we certainly need something dramatic.

It is always instructive and a pleasure to participate in debates instigated by the Foreign Affairs Committee. Once again, its members have brought a sharp focus to bear on the most pressing of international issues, and its work on this debate shows us that the war against terrorism, however defined, is not simply a military matter. I join others in commending this fine report and in encouraging the Committee to continue its excellent work.

4.47 pm

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): I concur with the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) that this has been a debate of the highest quality. It has been a pleasure to listen to robust and thoughtful contributions from both sides of the Chamber. Many questions have been asked and many suggestions made, and it has been a privilege to take part.

I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Swansea, East (Donald Anderson) and his Committee for a very impressive report that is weighty both in kilograms and in substance. It is a very fine tribute to the hard work done by the right hon. Gentleman, his Committee and the team that supports and advises them.

I also state firmly for the record—I did so slightly yesterday morning, although we were not then entirely sure during our fine debate on US-UK relations of the precise outcome of the presidential election—that I strongly support the re-election of President George Bush, which gives us new opportunities in international affairs. It is obviously thrilling for us to see our sister party do so well in both Houses in the US, and to see a man with such personal convictions succeed. I am all for the result, which is thoroughly commendable. [Interruption.] I know that the Minister will reciprocate with equally sincere warm personal wishes and a warm welcome, as, I am sure, will his colleagues.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): It was some of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues I was wondering about.

Mr. Streeter: The Minister can wonder about his own colleagues and leave us to wonder about ours.

Mr. Maples: The Minister may not have been entirely clear whether my hon. Friend was speaking for the full Conservative party or for his colleagues when he endorsed President Bush's victory. That was all.

Mr. Streeter: It is very rare indeed for me to speak for the whole Conservative party.

The opportunities are first to see through the job that has been started in Afghanistan and Iraq. We must get those interventions right before anyone starts to think about any more interventions around the globe. I shall say a little more about that in a moment.

Secondly, it is crucial that the US re-engage with the United Nations. The hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale talked about the United Nations reform proposals, which return to us shortly, and I hope that we can debate them. [illegible] that the US engage fully in those propo[illegible] at future interventions are multilateral and [illegible]ported by the Security Council with formal resolutions.

Thirdly, as President Bush enters his second term and with all that he has learned in the past four years, he has the opportunity to exercise more soft power rather than hard military power in various parts of the world. I hope that the Minister will agree and confirm in his winding-up speech—he will have almost half an hour, so he will have the opportunity to answer fully the many questions that have been asked today—that the United Kingdom has the opportunity to become more assertive in our relationship with the US. Perhaps in some quarters there will be a new enthusiasm for all kinds of activity, so we must ensure it is tempered by good old-fashioned British common sense and responsibility. The Prime Minister is well placed to become more assertive.

I will mention the main focus of the report, and start as others have done on the war against terror being fought in Iraq. We have seen many external insurgents, such as al-Zarqawi, pouring into Iraq, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) made a powerful and chilling speech about the possibility of Iraq becoming a training ground for al-Qaeda. That is of immense concern and even more reason why we must see the work through and succeed. I do not think that my right hon. Friend or I would have necessarily started from where we are today, but we must see it through.

We have seen distressing acts of savagery—kidnapping and beheading. We think very much still of the family of Kenneth Bigley, and of Margaret Hassan, who is still captive and in our thoughts and prayers. The Minister needs to know that we will stand firmly with him to see the work through and the January elections take place. I have not heard much about engaging the United Nations in that process. The Minister was asked about security for United Nations officials, but what about monitors and support for those vital elections? Will he say more about that? We must also see reconstruction moving on apace, more jobs created for Iraqis and services re-established.

As is well known, we supported the recent deployment of the Black Watch in Iraq because Major-General Rollo confirmed that it was for operational purposes. Will the Minister say any more—we will understand if he cannot—about the proposed action on Falluja? I am concerned about whether we have done everything to reach a peaceful outcome—not with the external insurgents, as that is probably unrealistic, but with the various Iraqi factions. I am concerned also about the 50,000 or so civilians who remain in Falluja. I have no idea what military action is contemplated if any, but what about them? What opportunity is being given to them? Are we really going that extra mile to ensure that collateral damage, or the killing of innocent people, is not part of the story over the next few weeks?

Who will replace the Black Watch, given the firm commitment that it will be involved only for 30 days? Will it be the Scots Guards, as has been mentioned? My daughter has married into the military, and I have recently realised that maximum clarity about what is required of all our armed forces is a very good thing. It was the uncertainty that beset the Black Watch that caused so much distress; once it got its marching orders, things were fine. If the Minister can say any more about what will happen next, it will be most welcome.

On Afghanistan, we must, again, see the situation all the way through. There are some causes for hope, such as the election result. President Karzai is very impressive, but, as has been said by others, his writ runs only in and around Kabul, and that situation must be improved. Will the Minister confirm that President Karzai will be provided with adequate resources to clamp down on the warlords and on terrorist groups, which are raising their ugly heads again?

We are concerned about opium production; we have taken responsibility to deal with it. When the Taliban were in control, opium yield slumped almost to nothing: 185 metric tonnes were produced in 2001, zooming to 3,400 in 2002 and 3,600 in 2003. We expect the figure to be even higher in 2004.

Mr. Mullin: The hon. Gentleman said that the Black Watch was going to be deployed for only 30 days. My understanding is that the only commitment given is that it will be for a limited period, lasting weeks rather than months.

Mr. Streeter: I thought I heard a senior Army officer in Iraq say that it was a 30-day deployment. However, I agree that the Prime Minister made the commitment that the Black Watch would be home by Christmas. I do not seek to challenge that; the Minister has given the answer that he has, and I am sure that is fine.

To return to opium production, it is likely that this year's yield will be even higher than last year's when the next United Nations report comes out. The Government are committed to spend £70 million on the issue over three years. Given the scale of the impact of the yield on the United Kingdom, is that really sufficient spend to try to stamp out that vile trade?

I understand that the Americans put forward a proposal that the poppy fields should be destroyed using strimmers—they call them weed whackers, in their quaint American way—but that we said that that was not the right way forward. Why did we do that and what other ideas do we have to try to destroy those crops?

I want to make a couple of comments and ask a couple of questions about Iran. We certainly agree with and support the Government in their constructive engagement. We want to see the issue of uranium enrichment brought to a successful and harmonious conclusion. How do our Government intend to bridge the gap between the approach taken by the EU, particularly France, Germany and the United Kingdom, and the rather hard-line approach taken by the United States of America? What proposals are there to try to bridge that gap?

What will the United Kingdom say and do if the IAEA reports on 24 November that Iran is still intent on producing enriched uranium? After all, on Sunday the Iranian Parliament passed a law allowing them to continue to do that. Where are we going on that issue? When will we get the military equipment back that the Iranians stole from us when they wrongly captured some of our troops a few weeks ago? They are still holding British military equipment.

I want to touch briefly on the Russian Federation, because some important points have been made. Since the report was produced, we have had the sickening scenes from the Beslan siege, which was an awful outrage. What do the Government make of regular Human Rights Watch reports of Russian heavy-handedness and of the involvement of senior Russian parliamentarians and Government officials in the oil for food scandal? Does the Minister think that that impacted on how they responded to the crucial UN security resolution that they would not support?

My right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling asked some important questions about weapons of mass destruction stockpiled throughout the former Soviet Union. What is our policy to try to do all we can to see that those stockpiles are removed?

I also want to focus briefly on the middle east peace process. President Bush's re-election, as others have said, gives a fresh opportunity. He can be more relaxed about the Jewish lobby and the strong Christian evangelical lobby in the USA, which has a very zealous view of the state of Israel. We welcomed the Prime Minister's commitment at the Labour party conference to re-engage vigorously in the proposal. Can the Minister confirm that he meant it and that he will take that forward over the next few days and weeks?

I have some sympathy with my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples), who asked whether the road map exists any longer or whether it has been blown to pieces. What is the strategy either to get the road map back on track or to introduce a new way to bring both sides together? I want the Minister to know that any action that the Government take to bring the Palestinians and Israelis back to the table so that they can negotiate and finally settle the outstanding issues between them will have our full support.

What role is the Government playing as regards security operations to help the Palestinians in Gaza enjoy security during the withdrawal? What is the status of the current Quartet engagement with the road map? Finally, what is the United Kingdom's strategy for taking the matter forward?

Other issues were mentioned. During his sparkling, thoughtful and insightful speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) spoke about exporting democracy, and I absolutely agreed with him in my equally sparkling intervention. No one plans to export our style of democracy anywhere—certainly not with hob-nailed boots on—but it is important to underpin and encourage a local expression of democracy in the right way. We should encourage the rule of law, freedom of speech and some kind of representative governance in every country we can, because that is the framework in which people can enjoy freedom.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon that the Government's response to one paragraph in the report was over modest. I have been involved in some work being done by the global opportunities fund in Bahrain. There has been a new Parliament for the past two years, and I hope to return there in a couple of weeks to help parliamentarians learn more about holding a Government to account—something that we do excellently in this country, of course. The Foreign Office is doing some very good work on such issues, and it is important that we know about it and spread it to other countries. It is long-term, often invisible work, but it is important and I strongly support it.

I was recently in Saudi Arabia, where people are holding municipal elections at the end of this year and the beginning of next. While I was there, a raging debate was under way about whether women should be given the right to stand for election and to vote. I did not know whether to be depressed or jubilant about the fact that they were having that debate. None the less, something is moving there.

In a very enjoyable speech, the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope) spoke of not allowing countries to use the war against terror as an excuse for human rights abuses, and I think, in particular, of Uzbekistan. Will the Minister confirm that our man in Tashkent was not recalled simply because he was robust on the issue of human rights and expressed his strong view to the Foreign Office that we should not extract evidence under torture?

Mr. Mullin: Yes, I can confirm that.

Mr. Streeter: I had not finished the questions yet, but that is very welcome. Who took the decision to recall him? Hon. Members have tabled questions about the issue, but we have not really had full replies. Why did the case arise? Why were so many charges of misconduct levied last year but then mysteriously withdrawn? I do not want to be overly accusatory or to overcook this, but there is just a faint whiff of something being not quite right. I hope that the Minister, in his winding-up speech, rather than in an intervention now—

Mr. Mullin rose—

Mr. Streeter: Oh, go on then.

Mr. Mullin: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I cannot go into details about the case, because it is liable to be the subject of employment or legal proceedings, and we must obviously await their outcome.

Mr. Streeter: I would like to finish where I started by thanking the Foreign Affairs Committee for its excellent work. The United Kingdom has a significant role to play in international affairs and the war against terror, and the Committee's excellent work is very much part and parcel of that.

5.4 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): Hon. Members will be grateful to the Committee for its comprehensive and thoughtful report. They will have seen the Government's detailed response, which was published in September. It addresses some questions that I have been asked, and I commend it to hon. Members. We have heard some wide-ranging and impressive speeches, and I shall do my best to address all the points that have been raised. If I cannot respond to some of them, or do not get round to doing so, I shall write to hon. Members.

The report underlines not only the enormous challenges facing the international community but the extent of the international effort to deal with the terrorist threat and its causes. In recent years, 60 nations on five continents have been affected by terrorist acts. In the past five years as many as 4,000 people have died in such attacks—the majority carried out by al-Qaeda-related groups.

International terrorism and the potential of terrorists to acquire and use weapons that kill on a massive scale, to which some hon. Members have referred, present the greatest threat to our security. That is why fighting terrorism and preventing the spread of weapons of mass destruction have become our No. 1 priority. That means not just military action to hunt down terrorists, but dealing with the causes of terrorism—injustice, oppression and poverty, which contribute to the helplessness and despair that, as several hon. Members have mentioned, all too often fuel extreme reactions.

While we continue to strengthen international action to thwart terrorists we must redouble our efforts to strengthen the rule of law, help democracy take root and alleviate the suffering of the world's poorest and most vulnerable people. That is the focus of our efforts to support the modernisation of political and economic structures in the broader middle east region.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter), who referred to the work of the Government's global opportunities fund. Part of my portfolio is the Chevening scholarships, which draw those whom we regard as potential movers and shakers in many parts of the world to this country in an attempt to teach them something about our culture and democratic culture in the hope that they will take it back to their countries.

The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) asked what we are going to do to change the regimes in Saudi Arabia and Egypt—I think that that is the gist of what he said. He is right—those are two key countries for progress in the middle east. Where, as in the case of Egypt in particular, Governments are heavily dependent on large amounts of foreign aid, there is some leverage, but I would not want to pretend—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not want me to—that it is in our gift to change those regimes or impose reform on them.

All that we can do is hope, where local initiatives are occurring, to exert influence—especially to press the role of women, to which the hon. Member for South-West Devon referred—and to lead by example. However, we have enough on our hands at the moment in Iraq and Afghanistan without opening a new front, if hon. Members will forgive me for putting it so.

The report states, and I agree, that it is important not to impose reform but to encourage and support domestic initiatives where appropriate. That is the basis of the Government's approach.

In passing, I want to touch on an area not covered by the report—Africa. Already, failed states such as Somalia have become a breeding ground for terrorists who have been responsible for atrocities in several African countries, and we must not allow that virus to spread. That is why support for good governance, democracy, the rule of law and human rights is the focus of our work in Africa.

Despite serious incidents in Nairobi, Mombassa and Dar es Salaam, Africa has not yet become a hotbed of terrorism, but it will if we neglect it. That is one reason why the Prime Minister has established the Commission for Africa; it is to take a fresh look at the huge challenges facing that continent. That is also one of the reasons why we already have a huge development programme targeted on Africa.

Donald Anderson: In fact, the Committee dealt with that in a report on bilateral relations with South Africa and in an earlier report in the series.

Mr. Mullin: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that information.

[Mr. Mullin]

As the Committee makes clear, 2005 will also be a critical year for Iraq. There is, as we all appreciate, a growing appetite among the Iraqi people for elections. As the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) said, the legitimacy of any Government in Iraq will flow from those elections. The Iraqis want to be able to determine their own future, and we attach great importance, therefore, to the January elections, which will be a milestone in the transition toward achieving a constitution-based Government by the end of next year.

Several Members have asked about UN involvement. A United Nations team, under the Secretary-General's special representative Ashraf Qazi, is helping the Iraqi independent election commission to prepare for the elections. Political parties and electoral laws have been agreed, a provisional voter registration database, which contains about 14 million names, has been completed and tested, and a public information campaign has started, for which 2 million leaflets are ready for distribution.

The UK and the US are working closely with the UN to ensure that UN personnel get the protection that they need to operate effectively. I assure the House that we take every possible measure to ensure the safety of our personnel. Travel outside secure zones and bases must be in armoured vehicles with close-protection teams, and is limited to essential journeys.

The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) asked whether the world is a safer place as a result of the invasion of Iraq. He said, I think, that that is a matter future historians will discuss. It has, though, been debated in the House many times, and will be debated many more times. If he will forgive me, I shall not go down that road now, interesting as it is. I will, however, make two points. First, the Iraq survey group report of 6 October confirmed that there were no weapons of mass destruction, but it also made it clear that Saddam intended to resume his WMD programmes after sanctions were lifted.

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman is right to say that al-Qaeda is now present in Iraq, but most of the attacks have been carried out by former members of the Ba'athist regime.

Mr. Tyrie: Is it the Minister's view that an intention to start a programme to create a weapon can constitute a justification for war?

Mr. Mullin: I did not say that. I merely pointed out a sentence or two that were missing from the account that the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling gave of the 6 October report.

Terrorists and insurgents are stepping up their attacks, but Prime Minister Allawi is determined that as many Iraqis as possible should be able to take part in the elections. Iraqis will able to register to vote in any polling station in Iraq. They do not need to vote in the polling station nearest their home. Prime Minister Allawi has said that he wants the political process to be as inclusive as possible. He has made major efforts to encourage Sunni and Shi'a leaders to join the political process and create the secure, stable conditions needed for the elections to take place. We are giving him, the Iraqi Interim Government and the Iraqi security forces all the support we can.

Security is vital. Already, there are more than 220,000 Iraqi security personnel on the streets. We continue to equip and train the Iraqi security forces, and the multinational force is helping the Iraqis to protect the infrastructure and provide security for key Iraqi personnel.

I note that the Committee expressed disappointment at the number of countries that have so far been prepared to contribute to the multinational force—as did my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East, today—and urges the Government to encourage more countries to do so. We shall indeed do so, but I remind the Chamber that the multinational force is drawn from 30 nations, including 14 European countries. Italy, Poland and the Netherlands are major troop contributors along with South Korea and Ukraine. It is a concerted effort, and we will continue to encourage other nations to join us.

I pay tribute to the courage and determination of UK armed forces, and all the military and civilian personnel from around the world who are putting their lives at risk to help the people of Iraq.

Despite the difficult security situation, reconstruction continues. The hon. Member for South-West Devon asked me for details of that. I have a long list that I can hand to him but, if he will forgive me, I will not read it out.

Electricity distribution is now more equitable across the country and 45 km of water pipes have been laid in Basra alone. In early September, the Secretary of State for International Development announced that the UK would contribute an additional £50 million to help to create jobs and to provide training for Iraqis. That is in addition to the £252 million disbursed in the financial year 2003–04 from the UK's overall commitment of £544 million in the three years to 2006. As the report makes clear, we cannot afford to let Iraq fail. We will continue to urge the international community to support Iraq's rehabilitation, and we will continue to help the Iraqi authorities to create a safe and stable country so that Iraqis can live in peace and rebuild their lives.

We are also working towards that in Afghanistan, where 10.5 million people, including 4 million women, registered to vote in the recent presidential elections. Those were the first democratic elections ever in Afghanistan, and there was a turnout of more than 80 per cent. The next step in the political process is parliamentary elections, which are due to take place next spring. The Afghan people sense a new hope and a new beginning, but I think that we all agree that much needs to be done to improve security across the country.

As the Committee said in its report, the provincial reconstruction teams are one of the success stories of the international engagement in Afghanistan. The report notes, however, that there are differences in the approaches adopted by different PRTs and suggests that they all be brought under the control of the international security assistance force. Unfortunately that is, for the time being, not possible because ISAF's writ does not yet extend throughout Afghanistan. However, as ISAF expands, more PRTs will be brought under its command. The two UK-led PRTs, in Maimana and in Mazar-e-Sharif, were transferred to ISAF on 1 July.

As hon. Members will know, the UK led the way in deploying a PRT and was instrumental in generating the resources necessary to expand ISAF beyond Kabul in the north. By the end of October, ISAF was deploying 9,500 troops from 37 NATO and non-NATO countries. ISAF's contribution to the security of the recent elections—a commitment made at the Istanbul summit—was crucial. ISAF now needs to move to the next stage of expansion, which is to the west. The UK is working with potential contributors and with the NATO authorities to tie down the different offers of resources.

Long-term stability is vital for Afghanistan's economic development. Stability is also the key to tackling the hugely complex problem of opium cultivation. I am grateful to the Committee for its recognition that there are no instant solutions to the problem. Eradication of the opium poppy is a campaign that demands perseverance and long-term commitment. The hon. Member for South-West Devon asked me about the scale of poppy growth. I understand that the results of the UN survey will be published on 18 November. That will provide us with the most up-to-date figures.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me about a programme involving strimming. I do not pretend to know the details, but I am told that there are no plans for such a programme. If I find out anything different, I will get back to him. As the lead country in co-ordinating counter-narcotics activity in Afghanistan, the UK will continue to provide substantial support to help the Afghan Government to implement their national drug control strategy. We have, as the hon. Gentleman noted, committed more than £70 million in three years for counter-narcotics activity and at least £20 million for developing alternative livelihoods.

To encourage Afghans to develop a viable economy, we are funding research on alternatives. We are also considering innovative ways to fund the significant income gap between opium poppy and other crop cultivation and the crippling opium debt that many Afghan farmers have accumulated. We are working with the Afghans and with our international partners on improving law enforcement, eradication, judicial reform and the Afghan public's awareness of the illegality of the opium industry. Winning the war on drugs is central to winning the war on terror, as drug money supports the insurgents and funds weapons. We must tackle the issue not just inside Afghanistan but, as we are already doing, with Afghanistan's neighbours.

I turn now to Pakistan, which is a key ally in the fight against terrorism. We welcome the Select Committee's conclusion that Pakistan is making a meaningful contribution to the war against terrorism. We welcome President Musharraf's support. He has taken considerable personal and political risks to confront the extremist groups operating in Pakistan and to stop the spread of nuclear weapons-building capability. We will continue to support him in his efforts and to work with the Pakistani authorities to promote sustainable development, greater democracy and respect for human rights.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope), who has had to leave the Chamber, we warmly welcome the improved relationship with India and continue to encourage India and Pakistan to resolve their differences over Kashmir. However, as my hon. Friend noted, our advice is not always welcomed by either party, so we must tread carefully when proffering it.

Russia is also a key partner in our efforts to combat terrorism, as the Select Committee's report underlines. We will continue to work with Russia, both bilaterally through our joint working group on terrorism and military co-operation, and multilaterally in the UN, the G8—in particular, the important global partnership programme—and the NATO-Russia Council. Although, as the Select Committee says, the war in Chechnya is not purely a terrorist insurgency, it is important to recognise that Russia faces genuine and serious security problems in the north Caucasus. Several Members referred to the horrific tragedy at Beslan, which is only the most recent example.

Finally, I turn to the Israel-Palestine conflict, which, as we all recognise, has done more than anything else to fan the flames of hatred and terrorism that threaten the stability of the entire middle east, if not the world. The Prime Minister has said that reviving the middle east process is one of his personal priorities. We shall continue to work with the new US Administration, our EU partners and members of the Quartet to encourage the Israelis and the Palestinians to move forward. Both sides must deliver their commitments under the road map. We continue to think that that is the best way to achieve a lasting political settlement. I believe that hon. Members will agree that much depends on the extent to which the new American Government are willing to become engaged, and we shall encourage them to do so.

Prime Minister Sharon's plan to withdraw all settlements from Gaza and some from the west bank is an opportunity for progress. We have made it clear, however, that such withdrawals should be a first step rather than an end in themselves. Despite what the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon said, we continue to believe that the road map is the best way to achieve a comprehensive and lasting settlement. I am sure that I speak for the Government—I hope I do—when I say that we are unconvinced that we could impose a solution on the parties.

We are also urging the Palestinians to deliver on their security responsibilities, which include serious action against terrorists, especially those who organise suicide bombings. We provide technical assistance and training to the Palestinian security forces to help them to take more effective action against those who plan suicide bombings, and we are urging the Israelis to curb heavy-handed action by their defence forces. As the Prime Minister said yesterday, progress in the middle east, along with democracy in Afghanistan and in Iraq,

"would be the . . . most significant contribution we could make to the reduction of terrorism".—[Official Report, 3 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 299.]

Sir John Stanley: I assure the Minister that this is not tit for tat in return for his comments about my being less than comprehensive in reporting on the Iraq survey group, but will he and the Foreign Secretary reflect on how advisable it is to go on referring to the withdrawal of Israeli settlements from the west bank without making it clear what is involved? Is it not the case that we are talking about the removal of just four out of 138 settlements in the west bank, that the population of those four is less than 1 per cent. of the total number of settlers on the west bank and that, at the same time as that withdrawal was announced, the Sharon Government announced a significant new house-building programme inside the existing settlements?

Mr. Mullin: The right hon. Gentleman is quite right to draw attention to that, and I am sure that it is an issue that we will discuss with the Israelis.

At an international level, we hope that the recommendations of the UN Secretary-General's high-level panel—that may be what the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) was referring to—will encourage greater consensus on action to strengthen international security, including tackling emerging threats at an earlier stage. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Chichester that the key to defeating terrorism is to win over moderate Muslims. I think that every sensible person would accept that and that must be the approach that all sensible countries follow. It is certainly a large part of our strategy.

We must also continue to promote greater understanding between peoples of different faiths, cultures and traditions. I take this opportunity to acknowledge the often unsung work of those working in non-governmental organisations and voluntary organisations around the world to teach and promote learning through educational and cultural exchange. For our part, through the work of the Department for International Development, the Foreign Office and the British Council, we will continue to support political, economic and cultural development in those parts of the world riven by strife.

Mr. Tyrie: Before the Minister finishes, will he return to the questions that I asked about British responsibility for the detainees who may have been held in Abu Ghraib? I refer to the 341 detainees we passed to the United States. Did we check up on what was happening to them while they were detained? Were any of them in Abu Ghraib? Have we checked up on them since they left or made any effort to contact them?

Mr. Mullin: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for reminding me. I understand that that is the issue on which he wrote to the Foreign Secretary. He said that he had not had a reply, but I understand that one is in the post, so he will hear shortly.

We all appreciate that greater understanding brings tolerance and with tolerance comes peace. That is our goal and I am sure that it is the goal of us all.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-eight minutes past Five o'clock.

Breast Cancer

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Hutton.]

9.30 am

Dame Marion Roe (Broxbourne) (Con): During October, we witnessed another successful breast cancer awareness month. That campaign, which is now in its 11th year, raises at least £10 million annually, and it has helped many of those suffering from breast cancer.

As a joint chairman of the all-party parliamentary group on breast cancer, I am delighted to have the opportunity this morning to initiate a debate on the primary prevention of breast cancer.

The latest figures from Cancer Research UK indicate that a woman's lifetime risk of suffering breast cancer rose between 1995 and 2001 from one in 12 to one in nine. Breast cancer is the most common cancer in the UK; there has been a steady rise in new cases per year—from 21,446 new cases in 1979, to 34,824 in 1998 and 40,989 in 2003.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): I thank the hon. Lady for allowing us to debate such an important issue; the work being done on breast cancer is similar to that on many other cancers. However, it is an international problem. In the United States, 192,000 new cases of invasive breast cancer were diagnosed in 2001, and about 50,000 women died of the disease in that year. It is a serious problem. Does the hon. Lady agree that we could play a leading role in an international movement to tackle the disease?

Dame Marion Roe: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He is right to say that it is a worldwide problem, and I fully agree that the United Kingdom could take a lead in the fight against this terrible disease.

Breast cancer is currently the most common cancer among women in the UK. Unfortunately, more than 40,000 women are diagnosed with this devastating disease each year, and more than 1,000 women die from it every month. The incidence of breast cancer in the UK continues to rise year on year. However, we should remember that better detection of the disease through the NHS breast screening programme and better breast awareness among women has contributed to that rise.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): I, too, congratulate the hon. Lady on gaining this debate. We obviously welcome the extension of screening to older women, but when I raised the issue last year, I mentioned the need to reduce the age limit from 45, perhaps to 40, to allow the screening of younger women. There is an increase in the number of younger women suffering from the disease, and earlier screening might allow for more successful treatment.

Dame Marion Roe: More and more younger women are being diagnosed with breast cancer. The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, and I am sure that the Minister will have noted it.

Breast cancer is a complex disease, and we do not yet fully understand what causes it. Scientific evidence indicates that breast cancer is caused by a complex mixture of factors, some to do with lifestyle, some to do with environmental factors, and some genetic—in other words, inherited. Those factors act at many different stages of life, probably starting before birth and continuing to the menopause and beyond. Unfortunately, we do not yet know how to prevent breast cancer.

Professor Jack Cuzick, the head of Cancer Research UK's epidemiology, mathematics and statistics department at the Wolfson Institute of Preventive Medicine in London, has stated:

> "We need to do more to understand the risk factors and develop preventative strategies."

Several established risk factors have been identified, including age, gender and pregnancy. The biggest risk factor for women is age, and as a woman gets older, her risk of getting breast cancer increases. More than 80 per cent. of all breast cancer cases in the UK involve women over the age of 50. Unfortunately, most of the established risk factors, such as age, are outside our control.

However, women could do something about other risk factors, such as alcohol intake. In a recent survey carried out for Breakthrough Breast Cancer, for example, only 7 per cent. of the women surveyed were aware of any link between alcohol and breast cancer. However, an intake of 1 unit of alcohol daily is estimated to result in one extra case of breast cancer among every 100 women who drink, compared with 100 women who do not drink at all. Based on that information, more than half the women surveyed by Breakthrough Breast Cancer said that they would be willing to limit their alcohol intake or to stop drinking completely to reduce their risk of breast cancer. That example highlights the importance of public education and public awareness of breast cancer risk factors. Based on such information, women can make informed choices about their lifestyles.

If breast cancer is to be prevented, its causes must be found. Studies are currently taking place to investigate some of those causes. The Breakthrough Generations study, for example, was launched in September. It will investigate the causes of breast cancer, and in particular gain information about those causes that might be prevented. It will be the largest study of its kind in the world and will cover more than 100,000 women in the UK. It will continue to give information for the next 40 to 50 years, although the first results will be available within the first few years of the study. Similarly, the Long Island breast cancer study project is a multi-study effort to investigate whether environmental factors are responsible for breast cancer in particular areas of America.

Every day, we are all exposed to many different chemicals through our diet, our lifestyle and the environment. Before we can conclusively determine what factors, other than better detection, are contributing to the increasing incidence of breast cancer, we must carry out further in-depth and robust research. The National Cancer Research Institute analysis of cancer research funding in the UK revealed that only 2 per cent. is spent on prevention.

Although the incidence of breast cancer is increasing, the good news is that the number of people dying from the disease is decreasing, and more women are surviving than ever before. That is partly due to the NHS breast screening programme. As we do not know how to prevent breast cancer, it is important that all women between the ages of 50 and 69 attend their appointments. Most cancers picked up by screening are at an early stage, with five-year survival rates of more than 90 per cent. The World Health Organisation's International Agency for Research on Cancer recently identified a 35 per cent. reduction in mortality from breast cancer among screened women aged between 50 and 69, which may go some way to explaining the dramatic 22 per cent. fall in breast cancer mortality rates in the United Kingdom in the 10 years between 1990 and 1999. More than 1 million women are screened every year in the UK.

Mr. Luke: I agree with the hon. Lady that early detection is important for the prevention and successful treatment of breast cancer. Does she feel that the breast-screening programme for women between 50 and 60 can be impeded by the acknowledged shortage of radiologists, which has delayed screening programmes around the country?

Dame Marion Roe: I again take the hon. Gentleman's point and I am sure that the Minister has listened to his important contribution.

Bearing in mind the importance of the NHS screening programme and the fundamental role that it plays in early diagnosis and, therefore, better prognosis, we should be concerned that not all women are attending their screening appointments. The recent report by the all-party group on breast cancer, entitled "Early Detection Saves Lives: Tackling Inequalities in Breast Screening", found that one in six women not attending screening said that it was because the appointment given to them was not convenient. They cancelled and never rearranged another time. Indeed, in some areas of the country, the uptake of screening falls far short of the programme's 70 per cent. target. For example, in one part of London, the take-up rate was only 51 per cent.—19 per cent. below the target rate.

As a result of the all-party group's report, we are calling on the Secretary of State for Health to encourage screening services to make local changes and increase the choice of when and where women can be screened, including considering the possibility of screening women in units outside their local breast-screening service catchment area—for example, nearer to their place of work. We also call on the Secretary of State to put renewed efforts and resources into public education to promote the importance of attending breast-screening appointments, and to help make people more aware of the common signs and symptoms of cancer.

At the moment, we do not have enough information or the means to prevent breast cancer. However, our growing knowledge of breast cancer risk factors means that we may be able to reduce the risk of developing the disease. More research and better public education about the risk factors are needed. In the meantime, since we do not know how to prevent breast cancer, it is important that women over 50 years of age attend their screening appointments and that women of all ages are breast aware. Being breast aware and having regular mammograms will not prevent women developing breast cancer, but may help them to find it early when it is more likely to be successfully treated.

I want to raise another preventive measure. Last night, many parliamentary colleagues and I attended a reception in the House of Commons organised by Macmillan Cancer Relief to promote its campaign to obtain a better deal for people with cancer—that is to say, to prevent cancer spreading to people's finances. Macmillan claims that cancer patients tell it that they suffer financial hardship as a result of having cancer. More than three quarters of people that it surveyed said that they ran up extra bills, and, for most people affected by cancer, money worries are second only to pain as a cause of stress. However, the disability living allowance and attendance allowance, which should ease the burden for many patients, are designed for long-term conditions. We all know that cancer is different, because the debilitating effects of treatment are frequently immediate and drastic. The sudden extra costs, such as travel for treatment, hospital car parking and heating, can be equally drastic, and generate an urgent need for benefit support.

What action is being taken to arrest the rising incidence of breast cancer in the United Kingdom? What action is being taken to identify the various risk factors for breast cancer and to understand how they affect the risk of breast cancer? What support are the Government giving to breast cancer research, particularly to the causes and possible prevention of breast cancer? Will the forthcoming public health White Paper specifically address the issue of breast cancer incidence and risk? What public health policies do the Government propose to adopt to address the rising incidence of breast cancer and to improve public education about and awareness of breast cancer and its risks?

As many of the risk factors, such as age, are not within the control of any woman, does the Minister agree that it is particularly important that we educate women about risk factors such as alcohol intake and post-menopausal obesity that are within their control so that they can do something about them? How do the Government propose to improve public understanding of those risk factors? What action have the Government taken to increase the uptake of the NHS breast-screening programme, particularly in areas of low uptake and in social groups, such as minority ethnic groups, in which uptake is below the average? What are the Government doing to promote a co-ordinated and joined-up approach to breast cancer research and prevention that involves all relevant agencies, and what are they doing to ensure that every cancer patient is offered specialist benefits advice when diagnosed? Finally, what are the Government doing to improve cancer patients' access to the disability living allowance and attendance allowance? I look forward to the Minister's replies.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), I advise the Chamber that the hon. Gentleman has told me that he will have to leave the debate early. We all understand why.

9.47 am

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): I apologise for having to leave the debate early, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I have a constituency appointment at 10 am.

It is a delight to follow the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Dame Marion Roe) and her erudite exposition of the risk factors of breast cancer and what we should be doing about them. I congratulate her particularly on highlighting the Macmillan campaign event, which I had the pleasure of hosting last night. It was a brilliant event attended by many people, and is another great initiative in our development of cancer services, which have been improving in this country since 1997.

We all realise that the work never stops. We must continue to make improvements until we eliminate the sad incidence of breast cancer, which continues to increase, unlike death rates, many of which the Government have brilliantly turned around. I will not quote the figures, but I will say that I spend a fair bit of time talking to people about breast cancer on Capitol Hill. They are a fearsome bunch. It must be like playing against Thierry Henry of Arsenal. They are brilliant at advancing their arguments, and the breast cancer lobby groups in this country—the hon. Lady is a member of a prominent one in this place—have played a major part and have moved the debate forward. The Government have reacted to that in many ways.

It is agreed in the United States that it should be the goal of medicine to detect breast cancer early and to provide a possible cure. Breast cancer prevention strategies in this country and the States have been developed recently to include a comprehensive breast cancer screening programme, which I agree we should broaden to include risk assessment as well as breast examination and screening mammography. This is a new concept. The hon. Lady described all the risk factors of various degrees. There is a nine-point programme in the States now and one could argue that perhaps every woman, of whatever age, should have this risk assessment.

There is a high incidence of breast cancers caused by genetic factors—some 10 per cent, possibly more. As more genes are discovered we may find that it is more complicated and that genes form the basis. Risk assessment is a way to decide whether better scrutiny, such as every six months or every year, is needed. We need to grasp this nettle. It is a new concept that the Americans have taken on strongly because of the lobby and the interest it has generated.

Incidentally, men get breast cancer too. It is a low incidence, but because men do not present as well as women to the medical profession, many are not diagnosed until a late stage. We should remember that. Men must not feel that they are immune. It happens to a reasonable number of men. Who knows what causes it. Very little work has been done on this. The breast cancer screening guidelines can be applied to the population in general, but patients at this increased risk should be identified through risk assessment.

For those at risk, screening, mammography and proven prevention strategies can be individualised according to the level of risk. There is the most intense debate about how screening should be done, when and how often. I would not like to count the number of times that I have been at conferences debating the issue. Results often conflict. It is difficult to get information. The Swedes say, "Yes, if you do it here it works." Someone else in Britain will say, "No, it does not work." We have to find this out. We know that we do not know all the answers, but we certainly know how to handle some of the problems that we have at this stage.

There will be really big technological developments and advancements in digital mammography. The Government have put in many scanning machines. The technology is moving almost faster than the machines can be put into the district hospitals. We have to encourage that. It will improve the accuracy of the screening method and, I think, reduce breast cancer mortality. The implementation and further development of breast cancer prevention strategies give us hope that the reduction in the incidence of breast cancer may be within reach and may happen within some of our lifetimes. We should be heartened by the political dimension and its interest, but we must continue to press on this issue and keep it high on the agenda in medical practice. I finish by congratulating the hon. Lady once again.

9.53 am

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Dame Marion Roe) on securing this important debate. It is just over a year since the last debate. Sadly, there are not quite so many people here today as I would have hoped, but it is first thing in the morning and the morning after a significant event for my party—our annual dinner.

The hon. Lady has once again established the seriousness of this issue. Were it not so serious, one would think it amazing that more money was not being spent on research into the prevention of breast cancer. She said that 2 per cent. of the research money is spent on prevention. This is something that affects 40,000 women and 300 men a year. We are talking about a large section of the population, because families and friends are affected too. This is a scourge on modern life. We do not know enough about it to understand why it happens.

I imagine that few people do not have direct experience of breast cancer in their family or their circle of close friends. Those of us with such experience want our children and grandchildren to know what to do to avoid the very high risk that exists currently.

I want to dwell specifically on prevention. The primary prevention of breast cancer depends on two things—a real knowledge of the associated risk factors, based on hard evidence and research and, as the hon. Lady said, education so that young and old have the information necessary to make rational choices about the factors that they can change. We know that breast cancer occurs as a result of complex interactions between genes, lifestyle and environmental factors, but we are finding it difficult to separate those issues out, because we simply do not have the body of research evidence that will give us the necessary information.

The hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) reported that Cancer Research UK has said that we must do more to establish the risk factors. That is absolutely right; 2 per cent. as a proportion of what is spent on research is simply not enough.

Dr. Gibson: Does the hon. Lady agree with me that the Americans are taking knowledge about cancer to the next level? The National Cancer Institute has developed a risk assessment tool, which is on a website. Using nine factors, it can estimate for anyone the risk of developing breast cancer over five years or a lifetime. Whatever the risk factors are currently, we should plug that information into the equation, which would enable us to see that some people are more at risk than others. That tool seems to provide an accurate reflection of what happens, and we should pick it up. It is great in America; it is possible to find everything to do with cancer on websites there. We should develop that risk assessment technology now.

Mrs. Calton: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, because I was about to mention that risk assessment tool. It is one of a battery of tools that can be used to assess someone's risk at, say, age 20, 15 or whatever age. Once people have some knowledge of their risk, they can modify the factors that might contribute to it. Obviously, I am talking about the things that they can alter. Clearly, as we have said, age and gender cannot be altered. Those things are part of us and we have to accept that. However, it is very important that people have information about the risks to which they are exposed and that they can do whatever it is possible to do to minimise those risks, if they choose to do so. Personal choice comes into this; people will make their own decisions.

We have heard that one unit of alcohol a day increases the risk of breast cancer by 6 per cent. and 2 units a day increases the risk by 12 per cent. It would be pretty rare for people in our society to say, "Well, that means I won't drink at all." If people wanted to remove the risk, they would be talking about not drinking at all. People will make individual choices about what they intend to do, based on the risk factors that they know about. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we need the risk assessment tool as one of an armoury of tools, but it will not replace the need for fundamental research. The needs have been identified and the money needs to be spent.

We have talked about age. As the hon. Member for Broxbourne said, the one thing that we can do about age is to attend screening. However, some groups are difficult to reach and do not, for whatever reason, attend screening. The all-party breast cancer group's report clearly pointed out that a high number of women said that it was not convenient to attend screening. There has been passing comment on some women's concern that they will experience pain when they have the test. It would be wrong for us to assume that women's fear of the pain involved is irrational, as some women undoubtedly experience pain. It would be useful if the Minister reflected on what could be done to minimise the pain that some women definitely experience with mammography through a change in technique, and to find out whether pain is caused by the technique or by something in the woman concerned, for example her cycle.

It is fairly common among the women to whom I spoke to experience pain—sometimes severe—when the mammogram is taken. That sort of information passes around women like a piece of folklore. It is not good enough simply to say that it does not happen, or that it need not be taken into account; it should seriously be taken into account. Some women may say that it is inconvenient to go for a mammogram, and may not give it top priority, when really they are worried about experiencing pain. It would be interesting to see how many women will not return for a second mammogram—not when something has been found to be wrong, but in the normal course of events—if they experienced considerable discomfort the first time. That problem needs to be addressed. It is not enough simply to pass it off as one of those things. Some women experience quite severe pain.

We have discussed the gender issue. We have not talked much about family history. We know that small numbers of breast cancer cases run in families, and we think that about 5 per cent. of cases are due to changes in the BRCA1 and BRCA2 genes. It is possible that cancer generally, breast cancer included, is caused by other genetic problems, and that some families' and people's immune systems have an inability to deal with cancer. General research in that area may give the most benefit, because if we can identify why some families experience cancer more often, we may be able to find some way of preventing it, or of boosting the immune system so that cancers do not take hold.

There is little that anyone can do about early periods or late menopause—they happen in the natural course of things—but there is some indication that they are associated with increased rates of breast cancer, probably due to an increased lifetime exposure to oestrogen. However, there is an issue with early periods, because they occur in girls who are heavier than average. If work can be done to prevent young women from becoming obese in their early years, there is a strong possibility that the onset of their periods will be held off for a little longer.

The association with height is also complex, but women over 5 ft 9 in are more likely to get breast cancer. That seems a bit unfortunate, and there is little that they can do about it, but there is a range of established risk factors about which something can be done. Pregnancy is one such factor. In this society, we generally frown upon and are concerned about early pregnancy, particularly teenage pregnancy. Most of us want our children, and other children, to wait until their 20s before their first pregnancy, but a pregnancy before the age of 20 seems to be protective. That is an indication that sometimes such matters are not as black and white as society believes. Perhaps we should be more careful about being so condemnatory of people who have children at a younger age—they may save the country a great deal of money, if they do not get breast cancer at a later stage.

The other worry is that women have an increased risk if they have their first child at over 30 or if they do not have children. That is a matter for women to take into consideration when they are looking at their range of risk factors. Perhaps if women applied the risk factors mentioned by the hon. Member for Norwich, North, they would not delay having children until they were in their 40s or late 30s. Women need to be able to take those issues into consideration. Many women and their families have not had that information, and so have not been able to take those issues into account.

We know that breast feeding for more than a year in total reduces risk. I know that the Government have done considerable work, particularly through the Sure Start programme, in trying to encourage breast feeding. We know that breast feeding is best for children, but society still has a tendency to regard it as unnatural and to imply that it should not take place. We need to do a great deal more to educate the public that breast feeding is good not only for babies but for mothers, and that mothers who breast feed for at least a year in their lives reduce their risk of breast cancer.

The Million Women study reported recently on the effects of hormone replacement therapy. We now know that there is an increased risk of breast cancer with HRT, particularly with the combined oestrogen and progesterone drug, and if the drug is taken over long periods. GPs and their patients are talking about that matter in a considered way, to try to minimise women's risk. There is an indication that once women come off HRT, their risk is lowered within a few years. However, it is important that women are aware, before they engage in HRT, of the effects that it might have.

Similarly, we know that there is a slightly increased risk for women who take the pill. We are told that 10 years after stopping taking the pill, that risk disappears. Women need to know that they increase their risk if they take the pill. Those factors all build up.

Women's weight is a major issue. Women who are overweight, particularly after the menopause, are more likely to get breast cancer. It is thought that that happens because fat tissue is the primary source of oestrogen after the menopause. Therefore, the more fat women carry, the more oestrogen they will produce, and the greater risk they will have of getting breast cancer. If weight gain can be minimised, women have more chance, in those circumstances, of reducing their breast cancer risk.

There is another issue. We cannot isolate breast cancer from everything else. Breast cancer is linked to a range of other diseases. Obesity appears to be associated with a variety of health problems, including heart disease, high blood pressure, diabetes, arthritis and several other cancers. Persuading women to reduce their weight or to keep it within normal bounds will reduce their risk not only of contracting breast cancer but of developing a variety of other health problems. Women who are high risk for breast cancer or who have breast cancer, possibly because they are overweight, are also high risk for those other factors. That needs to be taken into consideration.

The alcohol issue is very important indeed. As an aside, whenever my younger daughter tells me that she is going out for the evening, my standard text message back to her—we text each other, as mothers and daughters do these days—is "Think of your long-term health." She sends a text message back to me saying, "Yes, all right, don't worry." I ask her to be aware that she needs to minimise her alcohol intake and should not go along with the craze for binge drinking, which appears almost to be the norm.

I have recently been concerned about local papers in my area showing pictures of young people who are clearly under the influence of alcohol enjoying themselves. There is nothing wrong with people enjoying themselves, but it is worrying when newspapers make it look as if being over the limit in alcohol and indulging in what most of us would call binge drinking is the norm. Society needs to do more about reducing the tolerance of binge drinking.

We know that radiotherapy can increase the risk of breast cancer. There are some treatments for which a balance of risk factors has to be taken into account. Hodgkin's lymphoma treatment leads to increased risk of breast cancer, because of the site of the radiation therapy. However, if people did not have that radiation therapy, they would be at greater risk from Hodgkin's lymphoma. Those things have to be taken into account.

There are strong suspicions that diet and exercise are inextricably linked with the risk of breast cancer, but we simply do not know enough yet about how they affect it. More work needs to be done on that. Work has been done on diet and exercise separately; indeed, I myself was a subject in a study of diet. There is no clear link between diet and exercise and breast cancer. However, because the issue is complicated and because modifying behaviour seems a likely avenue if the two are in fact implicated, it is important that more research should be done, so that we can iron out some of the conflicts in the existing research.

We are absolutely certain for other reasons, however, that eating a healthy diet rich in fruit, vegetables and whole grains, is good for a range of other things, particularly maintaining lower body weight. Although it is difficult to separate diet and exercise, we know that controlling diet and exercising are important for other health reasons. People are likely to be leaner if they exercise regularly. As somebody who exercises regularly and struggles hugely with her weight, I sometimes think about such things with a wry smile and ask myself, "How much do I have to do to get my weight down?" Well, I can tell the Chamber that it is necessary to do enough training for the London marathon. Weight goes down once exercise gets up to about 25 miles a week; below that, it does not go down particularly.

A further factor, which has not had enough exploration, is exposure to low-dose radiation. Cancer Research UK is doing a great deal of work on mapping the incidence of cancer across the country. I would like research to be done into the effects of low-dose radiation in those areas of the country where background radiation is higher than average. I am thinking of parts of the south-west, where the main rock is granite, a relatively new rock that gives off more radiation. It would be useful to know whether there was a higher incidence of breast cancer in those areas. It is difficult to know precisely what anyone would do about it, but it would be useful to have an understanding of whether high radiation levels cause that difficulty.

We do not know about telecommunications masts yet, or about in vitro fertilisation treatment—although studies so far show that that there is no increased risk. We do not know about the impact of stress, although if one talks to people who have had breast cancer they often identify a major stress event in the previous two years, either in their family or affecting them personally. A major stress event could involve the death of someone close, or something else that is really serious; it does not refer to general levels of stress. I think that most of the work that has been done has looked at the background stress that most of us feel as we go about our day-to-day lives; I am talking about the major life events that cause massive stress. We could do with more work on those.

There is some research into exposure to light at night. People who sleep with the light on, it is thought, produce rather less melatonin, and because of that they are more likely to end up with cancers. That is the theory. We need more research into that, because it would be very simple to ensure that one never slept with the light on. That would be something that every one of us could do. Melatonin, we believe, may suppress the growth of breast cancer.

We do not know enough yet about childhood risk factors. The hon. Member for Broxbourne made quite a lot of comments about concerns that breast cancer may start in childhood or even earlier, in the womb. Some research indicates that factors in the womb have an effect.

We do not know enough about ethnicity yet. We know that breast cancer is a worldwide problem and that it affects some populations more than others, but we do not know enough about that.

I make a plea that the newspapers and media are a little more responsible when it comes to parading some of the risk factors. I sometimes wonder where they pluck them from. They suggest that underwired bras could increase the risk, which does not seem to have any research foundation, or that bumps or bruises to the breast, breast implants, abortions, deodorants and anti-perspirants could do so. Research does not show that, but sometimes the media get hold of a piece of research, parade a great headline and frighten people with issues that have not been shown definitively to cause an increased risk.

We do not know about smoking—there have been differences of view about that—or about chemicals that people come into contact with in their environment. We do not know about pesticides. There is a tendency to think that because everybody is exposed to so many chemicals and trace chemicals, we can do nothing about it. I do not agree with that. I was a chemistry teacher. I taught in a school in which, within a fairly short period, something like half the women had a breast lump—a breast cancer—that had to be removed. Clearly, that may just have been an isolated cluster. When people asked me what my occupation was, I did not write just "teacher", but "chemistry teacher", because a chemistry teacher will have a very different exposure to chemicals. It is important that such issues are looked into.

Once again, I congratulate the hon. Lady. She has again brought this important issue to the attention of the Chamber. I do not think that it will go away in the immediate future. I hope that we will see a turnaround in the dreadful figures of 40,000 women and 300 men affected every year, and that that work will be done with some speed. I look forward to the public health White Paper, because I hope that it will address some of those issues in the round, perhaps not just for breast cancer but for women's health—and men's health—in general.

10.20 am

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Dame Marion Roe) on yet again securing an important debate on this issue; I thank her for doing so, and for all her work on the matter, which is recognised by hon. Members on both sides of the House. I thank other hon. Members, too, for their interesting contributions.

The importance of the debate can be clearly illustrated by the statistics. One in nine women will, as we have heard, develop breast cancer at some point in their lives, and 41,000 cases are diagnosed each year according to the latest figures, and that includes 300 men. Something like 13,000 deaths a year are caused by breast cancer.

It is unusual in some respects to talk about primary prevention strategies in the context of breast cancer. All the major risk factors, such as age, genetic code, endogenous hormone levels, late age at menopause and late age at first pregnancy, are not in any way modifiable through traditional intervention strategies. Meanwhile, drugs that have proved to prevent breast cancer or to have some effect are also of limited use, given their side-effect profile. It has been clearly shown, for example, that tamoxifen reduces the incidence of breast cancer by something like 6 to 8 per cent., but it produces bad side effects, which rules it out of a responsible prevention strategy.

Mrs. Calton: Perhaps we should mention that although tamoxifen is useful for women with the potential for oestrogen-positive tumours, or who have had such tumours, it is not of value for anyone whose tumour is not of that kind.

Mr. Baron: I accept that, but it is still relevant to the issue of breast cancer generally, and breast cancer prevention; as I have said, side effects have ruled it out of any responsible prevention strategy.

Several factors are modifiable through intervention, as my hon. Friend mentioned. One of those is diet. The NHS cancer plan rightly focuses on tackling cancer by reducing the number of people who smoke and promoting a healthier diet through initiatives such as the five-a-day programme. There is strong evidence to suggest that because people have taken more care with their diet over time and have become more knowledgeable about cancer in general, cancer death rates have fallen.

The Government make great claims about the 10 per cent. fall in cancer mortality rates since 1997—which is right—but those declines are part of a longer-term trend not only in this country but on the continent, for example. Under Conservative Governments, between 1990 and 1997, cancer mortality rates also declined by 10 per cent. It is important to recognise that those welcome figures are part of longer-term declines.

There is no doubt that initiatives such as five-a-day are a step in the right direction, but the Government's record on matters such as obesity and drinking has been quite poor overall. Figures from the Health Committee's report on obesity this year found that between 2000 and 2002 the proportion of women who were obese or morbidly obese increased by 7 per cent. I am sure that the Minister will be aware that if present trends continue, one quarter of the population will be obese by 2010.

The biggest failure in tackling obesity—this is relevant to all developed countries, not just this one—is the absence of a co-ordinated programme accommodating individual and public health approaches to the problem. The net effect of the anti-obesity drive, whether in this country or other developed countries, has been the introduction of a wide variety of individual treatment and prevention programmes, the published success rates of which have been disappointing overall.

Those concerns are reflected in current Government policy. As the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson) told the Health Service Journal last year:

> "We have a 'five-a-day' programme, the schools' fruit scheme. I'm not sure you need a strategy because we are talking about some very simple messages".

I suggest that that approach is wrong. Indeed, the Health Committee's report highlighted the naivety of approaching obesity in such a simplistic manner. It said:

> "The causes of obesity are diverse, complex and, in the main, underpinned by what are now entrenched societal norms. They are problems for which . . . no one simple solution exists."

Drinking is another matter on which the Government's record could be better. It is a shocking trend that the number of women drinking above recommended guidelines—35 units a week—has risen by more than half during the last 15 years, although I accept that that has taken place not only in very recent years. Breakthrough Breast Cancer believes that, as my hon. Friend mentioned, drinking on average one extra unit of alcohol a day increases a woman's risk of breast cancer by about 6 per cent. and the risk increases by a further 6 per cent. for each additional unit of alcohol consumed on a daily basis.

The important message is that the Government must do far more to make people aware of how many units they drink and that they should drink in moderation. What is needed from the Government, as a matter of urgency, is the implementation of an integrated and co-ordinated wide-ranging programme of solutions to tackle these issues.

We hope that the White Paper on public health, which will be published next week, although it was due in the summer, will tackle these matters. I hope that the Minister will be able to give us an early indication of what is in that White Paper, because the approach to the issue so far has been disappointing—indeed, its approach has been described as "dilatory and disgracefully complacent" and a "calamity" by the BMA as recently as last month.

The Government's failures on obesity and alcohol illustrate perfectly why public health should rest not in the hands of a junior Minister but with the Secretary of State. Public health challenges need to be recognised and tackled at the highest levels across Government, through a broad, population-based programme that aims to change behaviour at a collective environmental level. My colleague Lord Foster's HIV/AIDS campaign is an example of how public health challenges should be tackled.

The Minister should consider our proposal to establish a public health commission—an independent body with a similar role in public health to that of the National Audit Office. Its functions would be to gather evidence, publish reports and make recommendations to Government and Parliament. The commission would ensure that there was a research-effective, evidence-based approach to the matter, which would help to form public health policies.

Meanwhile, we would establish public health directors to work at city or county levels, as there is evidence to suggest that PCTs are too small to carry out population-based interventions to safeguard public health. In addition, we would instruct the National Institute for Clinical Excellence to include in its future work programme reviews of public health measures—for example, in the provision of alcohol clinics and drug therapies for the morbidly obese.

I look forward to hearing from the Minister how the Government will improve their performance on the issue, as there is little doubt that there is a lack of a co-ordinated approach to public health. We sincerely hope that the White Paper will focus on the necessary answers.

Other hon. Members have rightly focused on the importance of screening. As we still know so little about the causes of breast cancer, it is vital that the UK has adequate screening and surveillance programmes in place to aid early detection, which we know saves lives. I hope that the NHS breast-screening programme will continue to be rolled out; NICE guidance published this year recommended that women between the ages of 40 and 49 with a high family risk of breast cancer should be screened annually. I would welcome the Minister's assessment of the extent to which that guidance has been implemented nationally.

As my hon. Friend said, research published last month by Breakthrough Breast Cancer and the all-party group on breast cancer found that, in some areas only about half the women who should be screened were going for screening—20 per cent. below the 70 per cent. target among that group. The report also revealed that one in six women who did not take up their breast screening appointment said that that was because it was not convenient. In addition, as the Minister will be aware, the National Audit Office found this year that women from lower socio-economic groups and ethnic minorities were less likely to attend screening appointments.

The Conservative party fully supports the all-party group and Breakthrough in calling on the Health Secretary to investigate ways of making the screening service more flexible and accessible to the women it was set up to serve and to put renewed effort into promoting public education and the importance of attending appointments and making people more aware of the common signs and symptoms of breast cancer. We all know that making women more aware of the importance of screening is, in a way, primary prevention and that the earlier breast cancer is detected, the better the chances of survival. I therefore look forward to hearing what the Government propose to do to address the action points raised by the all-party group and Breakthrough on this important issue.

I want to leave the Minister plenty of time to wind up, so let me briefly add a few words to those of my hon. Friend and other hon. Members about the Macmillan reception yesterday evening. The event tried to focus on something that is almost a crime—the fact that many cancer patients are simply not accessing the disability living allowance or attendance allowance to which they are entitled. Something like half of all cancer patients who die—I think this statistic is accurate—did not receive DLA or AA, to which they were entitled. I would therefore endorse a good number of Macmillan's recommendations, including that all cancer patients should be made aware at diagnosis of the benefits to which they are entitled. That would be a useful way of ensuring that they access those benefits.

At the moment, about £126 million of benefits are unclaimed, and I ask the Minister to address the issue, because there appears to be a lack of co-ordination between the various Departments. Many cancer patients are falling between Departments and suffering as a result. As my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne said, people at such a crucial time in their lives, who are having to deal with cancer, should not have to contend with financial stresses.

We all want to improve the primary prevention of breast cancer and the treatment of cancer patients generally. I would be the first to acknowledge—it would be churlish not to—that the Government have made improvements in the provision of cancer services and treatment. However, given the money that has been invested in the NHS, not enough of those improvements have shown up in front-line services—a lot of the money simply is not reaching them.

Many services need urgent attention. There is strong evidence that radiotherapy waiting times are deteriorating badly, and the situation is not helped by "Agenda for Change", which has alienated many radiographers, who will be meeting this Saturday to express their opposition to the changes proposed under it.

We know of the referral lottery, which has, to a certain extent, been created by the Government and their two-week target, under which nearly 10,000 women are routinely referred and subsequently diagnosed with breast cancer. That places GPs in a difficult position, because they are not necessarily best placed to decide what is a routine and what is an urgent referral. We also know about the postcode lottery, which leads to wide disparities across the country in terms of access to cancer drugs such as Herceptin. That is another failing that must be addressed.

Having pointed out those failures, it would be wrong not to return to this morning's discussion and focus on the Government's failures with regard to primary prevention and care. The Government are failing to provide a comprehensive and co-ordinated public health agenda. They are failing to get across the importance of screening and to create a more flexible system of appointments. They are also failing to make sure that benefits are available to cancer sufferers who are entitled to them. I ask the Minister to address those issues in his response.

10.35 am

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): May I join others in warmly congratulating the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Dame Marion Roe) on calling for this debate and drawing the attention of the House to what we all accept is an important issue affecting tens of thousands of women and many families in this country? All hon. Members who have spoken have made thoughtful and balanced contributions. The focus has been on prevention and I shall deal with that in my remarks.

It is a fact of life that many issues divide this House along party political lines. We are all grown up and we accept that—it is partly why we are here. However, breast cancer should not be such an issue. We all have a perspective and we share the general view that we must continue to improve the range of services deployed in the national health service to help tackle and get on top of this serious problem.

The hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron), as a party spokesperson, introduced a more party political tone into the debate than the hon. Member for Broxbourne, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) and the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mrs. Calton), who made no party political points whatever. It is part of my job as a Minister to respond to some of the party political attacks that have been made. I shall do that briefly, but I do not want to get into a party political debate because the issue is much more important than that.

If more of my hon. Friends were present today, we would all have been slightly puzzled to hear the hon. Member for Billericay complaining about postcode lotteries and insufficient investment, because his party voted against the additional investment that we are giving to the NHS, without which it would have been difficult to sustain the progress that we are making.

Mr. Baron: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hutton: No, not yet. The hon. Gentleman also claimed that the Government were not doing enough to tackle the problems of obesity and excess alcohol consumption. I cannot recall a single suggestion that he made about how he would deal with those two problems, other than establishing a public health commission to advise Ministers.

Mr. Baron: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Hutton: I will in a moment. The hon. Gentleman criticised the Government for setting up arm's-length bodies—he would use the term quangos—yet his suggestion was that we needed another quango to deal with those problems. He also said that it was not proper for a junior Minister to deal with this issue and that it should be the responsibility of the Secretary of State. Everything in the Department of Health is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, so I do not understand his point. He wants me to give way, and I am happy to do so.

Mr. Baron: I want to raise two quick issues. The Minister said that I suggested that there had been a cut in investment. I did not. I am the first to admit that there has been an increase in investment, and we would match Labour's planned increase in investment over coming years to the tune of about £34 billion. My point was that, bearing in mind the amount of investment in the NHS, much of the money is not reaching front-line services, of which breast cancer care is, unfortunately, an example. That is not a party political point. We are all trying to improve services for those suffering from breast cancer and it is a perfectly valid point to make.

As for the co-ordinated approach, I suggested to the Minister that we had a well-thought-through policy for dealing with obesity and drinking. We would introduce a much more co-ordinated approach on public health generally—and the HIV campaign co-ordinated by Lord Foster shows what such an approach can achieve. Those are concrete proposals, and I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say about them.

Mr. Hutton: I really do not want to continue with this; it is a familiar merry-go-round, and it would be rather dispiriting to get bogged down in these issues. The hon. Gentleman says that we need a more co-ordinated approach. With the greatest respect, that is not a specific policy. It is a generalisation. I hoped that he would make some concrete suggestions today, but he may be holding them back for another occasion.

I was not arguing that the hon. Gentleman wanted to reduce expenditure on the NHS, although some of his policies would have that effect. I was simply saying that it is a matter of historical record—it is not contestable, and I do not want spend more time on it—that the present Leader of the Opposition described the increase in expenditure that we announced in 2001 as reckless and irresponsible. It is obviously of interest, therefore, to hear that it is now proper, responsible and the right thing to do. But that is opposition politics.

Mr. Baron: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hutton: Let us leave all that to one side. I did not intervene on the hon. Gentleman; and the hon. Member for Broxbourne deserves the courtesy of a proper response to the nine specific questions that she asked me.

The hon. Lady referred to the convenience of a booking system for local screening services, as did the hon. Members for Billericay and for Cheadle. That is an important point. The hon. Lady will be aware of the work that we are doing to move to a system of booked appointments across the NHS, particularly for referrals by GPs for hospital-based appointments for secondary care. People using the NHS will not have to wait for someone to tell them when they can be seen; at the beginning, they will agree with the clinician or the referral service when they are to be seen; they will be able to negotiate the time and place. The system will be built around people's needs, not the convenience of the provider who is running the service.

Exactly the same logic applies to breast cancer screening as applies to booking appointments for secondary care. The hon. Lady was right to raise the issue. I and my ministerial colleagues will reflect on what more can be done to improve the convenience of booking systems for breast cancer screening. However, I am sure that she will understand that it is a local issue. The local primary care trusts and providers are responsible for putting the service in place, and I would expect them to organise similar access arrangements for breast screening services as we hope to achieve with booking appointments for secondary care. There is plenty of food for thought; we need to reflect on what more can be done to promote that sort of approach for local screening services.

The hon. Lady asked us to renew our efforts to promote the importance of breast cancer screening and the need for people to attend appointments. We need to do more on that, and I shall write to the hon. Lady and set out in more detail some of our thoughts on the subject.

Like all who spoke in the debate, the hon. Lady raised the question of access to benefits. In our work as constituency Members, we all have to deal with terminally ill patients who know that benefits are unlikely to arrive in time to provide any measure of comfort to their families. However, we are realistic and know that if a member of the family is terminally ill, it will have an effect on the family's finances. There is no question about it. However, the state's job is to ensure that the maximum amount of help is delivered promptly in such circumstances. I shall refer the hon. Lady's comments to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. I shall ensure that she receives a proper response to the points that she raised, particularly about how disability living allowance can be paid conveniently in order to allow for the needs of people with terminal illnesses.

Mr. Baron: Will the Minister specifically consider the Macmillan suggestion that cancer patients should be made aware of benefits, perhaps as early as on diagnosis, in order that they receive the benefits to which they are entitled?

Mr. Hutton: Yes, they should be told; that issue does not come between us. The question is who is best placed to provide that advice. I suspect that health care professionals are probably not well placed to provide proper benefits advice. An interesting trend in many primary care locations is that work is being done to ensure that patients have access to proper welfare benefits advice. I am aware of GPs who work with benefits advice agencies and sometimes with the local authority to provide drop-in clinics at GPs' surgeries so that patients can receive more convenient advice. That is entirely sensible. We have tried to encourage that development, and will continue to do so.

The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right that people should have access to the right advice on which to base the decisions that they need to take to get their lives in order. That is particularly true of benefits advice, which is especially important at a moment of undoubted crisis when someone is told that they have cancer and it could be terminal. There is obviously some common ground between the hon. Gentleman and me on that point, at least.

[Mr. Hutton]

Many statistics have been used in the debate, and I do not take issue with any of them. It is salutary to think that breast cancer is the most common form of cancer in women in Britain today. More than 34,000 new cases are diagnosed each year in our country, and as the hon. Lady rightly said, the incidence of breast cancer is also rising. Between 1996 and 2001, for example, it rose by more than 10 per cent. Those statistics are one reason why preventing cancer and improving services for those who develop the disease should rightly be a top priority for the NHS.

We have made significant progress in reducing deaths from breast cancer. As the hon. Gentleman said, despite the increase in the incidence of breast cancer, mortality in England dropped by more than 10 per cent. between 1997 and 2002. In the past decade, England has seen the greatest decrease in the number of deaths from breast cancer than anywhere else in the world.

Survival rates are improving. A women diagnosed with breast cancer between 1986 and 1990 would have had only a 67 per cent. chance of being alive after five years. A woman diagnosed with the same disease between 1996 and 1999 now has an 80 per cent. chance of being alive five years later. I argue very strongly that the progress that we have been making has been made possible at least partly by the increased investment in the NHS. That has allowed the NHS to employ an extra 1,182 cancer consultants, as well as an additional 2,800 consultants who spend a significant amount of their time caring for cancer patients.

The hon. Gentleman referred to radiography. It is certainly not my argument today that we have enough consultants or radiographers. I am unsure that we will ever be in that position. I do, however, argue that we have significantly more consultants and radiographers than we have ever had. The number of therapeutic radiographers has increased by almost 20 per cent. since we took office, and we also have doubled the number of therapeutic radiography training places.

Mr. Baron: I thank the Minister for his generosity. In a totally non-party political way, may I ask him to explain why, if there is such an increase in numbers, radiotherapy waiting times have deteriorated so badly? There is no dispute about that when one sees the figures.

Mr. Hutton: I probably would want to reflect on what the hon. Gentleman has said, as he has said several times that the figures for radiotherapy waiting times are deteriorating. I want to see the evidence for that, so perhaps he can provide it.

We intend to measure, in a way previous Governments have not, the entire waiting time for patients at various stages on the various care pathways along which they need to go. For the first time, that will include waiting for diagnosis, treatment and therapy.

More diagnostic radiographers and therapeutic radiographers are working in the NHS than ever before. I have not tried to claim today for a second that that is anywhere near enough, but it is worth pointing out that vacancy rates are starting to move in the right direction for radiographers from a peak of more than 10 per cent. last year to 8.8 per cent. this year. I accept that that is not enough, but we are making significant headway.

We are therefore increasing the fiscal capacity of the NHS as well as the human resources that are available to it. Significant investment has been made in new MRI scanners, CT scanners, linear accelerators and breast cancer screening equipment, which have all become available to the NHS since April 2000. That is part of a £520 million capital investment programme. Those investments have helped us to get to the point at which 99 per cent. of women with suspected breast cancer are seen by a specialist within two weeks of being urgently referred by their GP. More than 97 per cent. of women receive treatment within two months of GP referral and 97 per cent. receive it within one month of diagnosis. By 2008, patients will experience a maximum one-month wait from urgent referral to treatment for all cancers, including breast cancer. I hope that hon. Members will welcome those objectives.

The National Institute for Clinical Excellence has also been playing its part in ensuring that the latest drug treatments are made available more quickly to NHS patients. NICE has to date approved for use 15 new cancer drugs, five of which are for use against breast cancer. That is one of the ways we are trying to tackle the problem of variation in access to such treatments.

Mr. Baron: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hutton: No, I really do not think that I will any more, although I should like to make one final party political point, because we all like doing it on occasion.

Mrs. Calton: I really am grateful to the Minister for giving way. I have listened carefully to what he has said. He has spoken a great deal about work that is being done on improving treatments, and those of us who have been personally involved are grateful for that. However, the debate is about the prevention of breast cancer. The point that the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Dame Marion Roe) made, and which I reinforced, was that only 2 per cent. of research is currently on prevention. What are the Government planning to do to change the balance of research, so that we look at prevention rather than simply treatment?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to the hon. Lady, who anticipates what I want to say later about prevention. She is quite right; I have been focusing on treatment. Perhaps I should have started with prevention, but no speech of mine is ever perfect, so we are where we are.

On the subject of NICE, I feel rather depressed now, because I was about to make my party political point, but I think that I shall move on, except to say in passing that the hon. Member for Billericay and his lot voted against the creation of NICE in the first place.

There is a great deal that we can feel represents good progress, but I do not want to give anyone the sense that we are complacent or make anyone feel that we can rest on our laurels. That would not be right. Many hon. Members still have concerns about breast cancer services, many of which have been raised this morning.

The national cancer director, Mike Richards, published a report earlier this year that showed that not all eligible breast cancer patients had access to Herceptin, for example. The differences in take-up around the country are simply not acceptable. The Department is taking action to improve information on prescribing and ensure that clinicians all over the country are made aware of the benefits of drugs that have been positively appraised by NICE. We are also working with strategic health authorities where particular problems have been identified.

We are also trying to make better use of staff through new skill-mix programmes, allowing qualified professional staff to focus on the tasks that need their input, by training others to perform the more routine functions. A practical example of that is the introduction of new roles in radiography, which allows radiographers to extend their roles into some of the tasks previously undertaken by oncologists and radiologists, such as reporting on X-rays. In turn, assistant practitioners are being trained to take on roles traditionally performed by radiographers, and can now perform plain film radiography and diagnostic imaging examinations.

All of us will be concerned about the rise in the incidence of breast cancer. I do not think that there is a single explanation for that, and I am sure that other hon. Members share that belief. However, we know that exposure to increased amounts of oestrogen can increase the risk of breast cancer. The hon. Member for Broxbourne referred to that.

We also know that some synthetic chemicals, including some organochlorine insecticides, may have a very weak ability to act as oestrogens in the body. That has led some people to make a connection between organochlorine insecticides and breast cancer. However, there is no evidence at all that such chemicals cause breast cancer. An independent committee that recently published a review on the issue concluded that individuals exposed through air, water or food to environmental levels of DDT, betalindane and lindane insecticides were not at risk of developing breast cancer due to exposure to those chemicals. The committee could not reach a definitive conclusion about dieldrin because of a lack of epidemiology.

It is not permitted to add chemicals that are known to cause cancer by interacting with DNA or chromosomes to food or to use them in food production. We are aware that some environmental contaminants may be present at low levels in food and that others may be formed during cooking, but they have not been linked to breast cancer.

We are firmly of the belief that in the long term the best and most efficient way of beating cancer is prevention, both for individuals and in terms of NHS resources. We know that diet plays a role in about a quarter of cancer deaths in this country, and are taking action to tackle that problem. We are encouraging people to eat more fruit and vegetables through programmes such as the five-a-day initiative, to which the hon. Gentleman referred—I am glad that he supports them—to increase access to fruit and vegetables. We are also testing different ways of increasing physical activity.

The hon. Gentleman invited me to say a few words about the White Paper, as did the hon. Members for Broxbourne and for Cheadle. It was a nice try; obviously, I cannot say anything today about its content, but it will become apparent quite soon. However, I can say that it will set out how we can do more on diet and nutrition, physical activity and obesity, all of which can help to reduce cancers, including breast cancer. It will also have more to say about how we can tackle behaviour that increases the risk of developing cancer.

Of course, even with the best prevention services in the world we would not be able to prevent every case of breast cancer. Early identification and intervention must remain central to our plans, beginning with the overriding importance of teaching women to be breast aware, as 90 per cent. of breast cancer is found by women themselves. We have some of the best national screening programmes in the world. The national computerised call and recall system for breast screening was introduced by the previous Conservative Government in 1988, and was the first such programme in the EU. They made the right decision, and as a result thousands of women are alive today who might otherwise have died. Our predecessors deserve to be congratulated on that.

For our part, we constantly encourage women to attend the NHS breast-screening programme, through which nearly 10,000 cancers were detected in 2002–03—a 13 per cent. increase on the previous year. We have extended the coverage of the screening programme to those aged 65 to 70. Over 250,000 extra women in that age group have been invited to attend since the extension began in April 2001. That number will rise to 400,000 a year when screening is fully established by the end of this year.

However, we can do more. That is why we are working with GPs to help them to identify those patients most likely to have cancer, so that they can receive fast, efficient and targeted specialist investigation. Guidelines are currently being reviewed by NICE, and are due to be published in March next year.

The hon. Members for Broxbourne and for Cheadle asked about research. I accept that we must always look at what more we can do to promote research into the causes, treatment and prevention of breast cancer. The Department provides about £80 million a year for cancer research. Over the past three years we have dramatically increased our ability to do clinical trials of the latest cancer drugs and treatments. The percentage of cancer patients in trials in the UK is twice that in the United States. Breast cancer trials also constitute the highest proportion of trials within the National Cancer Research Network.

To mention just two such trials, Cancer Research UK is trialling a new chemotherapy regime to test whether it improves survival for women who have had surgery for early-stage breast cancer, and NCRN is providing NHS infrastructure support for a major Cancer Research breast cancer prevention trial called IBIS II. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Broxbourne is aware of that, but I will send her details of it. That trial is an international multi-centre study of Anastrozole—I am sure that someone can help me with the pronunciation: I had it last night, but it has gone today—versus a placebo in post-menopausal women who have an increased risk of breast cancer.

As has rightly been acknowledged, the voluntary sector plays a huge and important role in this area. We are committed to working in partnership with bodies in that sector to improve and deliver cancer services. For example, we are working with Macmillan Cancer Relief to develop local cancer user-involvement work, and with the Royal College of Surgeons in its work to develop training for sentinel node biopsy training. The Department funds 19 cancer charities through its section 64 grants scheme.

Breast cancer is a major issue for our country. The action that the Government have taken confirms the priority that we attach to it, and we are seeing progress as a result. Such progress has been made possible first and foremost by the hard work of NHS staff, and is dependent on our maintaining the right level of investment, and continuing to work with patient groups and the voluntary sector so that we can build a proper national consensus on the best way forward.

Mobile Home Parks

11 am

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): I am grateful for this opportunity, because although the rights of mobile home or park home residents have been discussed and amended recently, I want to highlight a constituency case that shows some of the major problems. I shall talk about the problems at a mobile home park called Thameside Court, near Northmoor in West Oxfordshire, referring also to Kings Court in Carterton; I shall relate those cases to the general state of the law and put some questions to the Minister about how we can ensure that the people involved have meaningful rights and proper security.

A Mr. Tom Hartley bought Thameside Court, which has 60 residents, on 8 September 2003. After receiving a number of complaints from residents, I organised a meeting with the residents at Northmoor village hall this September. The hall was packed. Former residents as well as current ones and their families attended. Many of the people living in Thameside Court have limited means and are worried by the cost of getting proper legal advice, and they are worried about who will look out for their interests. The residents' association is doing a great job, but it is newly constituted and feels, quite understandably, that is up against a highly experienced park owner. It was incredibly moving to hear people's powerful testimony about the way they have been treated and their determination to ensure that others do not suffer in the same way. Why are those people so concerned? There are two issues. The first is about the way in which park rules can be changed. The second is about the rights owners have when selling their homes.

In October 2003, shortly after buying the site, the owner wrote to the residents suggesting a change in the park rules. Some 90 per cent. of residents objected to the new rules and a meeting was requested with the owner. Under his membership of the British Holiday and Home Parks Association he should grant such a meeting, but up to now he has refused to do so, even though a residents' association has now been formed and the request has been made several times, including through me. I am delighted to say that, following letters from me to the BHHPA and other action—possibly including the announcement of this debate—a meeting has now been granted. None the less, the saga of the rules is interesting.

Initially, the site owner refused to respond to a number of letters sent by the residents' association about the issue. When he did, it became very clear that he was not willing to hold a public meeting and would deal only with individual residents. In a letter that the site owner eventually sent to the residents on 7 June 2004, referring to the residents' association he said:

> "It is a fact that I am not obliged to recognise any association."

When I wrote to him, the site owner responded stating his belief that

> "It is only a few residents who have nothing better to do with their time who are trying to cause a problem."

It should be remembered that 90 per cent. objected to the new rules. He ended his letter:

> "I would advise you to spend more of your precious time dealing with more important issues."

As I have said, a meeting will now, I hope, take place.

In her letter to me, Ros Pritchard, director general of the BHHPA, referred to Mr Hartley's "proposed rule changes". I am glad that the word "proposed" was used, because in a letter to the residents on 2 December 2004, the site owner said:

> "Please be advised that the Park Rules which are displayed on the notice board are now fully effective."

I hope that this reflects a genuine change of approach and that a more reasonable dialogue can now be established.

I said that the saga was interesting. It throws up two questions for the Minister. First, does he think that we need proper rights of recognition for residents' associations? Secondly, should the BHHPA guidelines about rule changes and consultation be written into the law? Let me be clear: some of the proposed rules are very significant. One example is: "Strictly no children." A second is:

> "No one to reside in the park under the age of 50."

Vitally, one rule change reads:

> "The tenant/owner of mobile shall not be allowed any kind of advertisement, promotion or for sale sign notice to be attached or exhibited on the outside or any part of the premises."

The situation at Kings Court in Carterton is a little different. The owner there wanted to develop the land to provide housing and applied for planning permission, but there were and are issues about rule changes and rent charges. Residents have worked together and presented quite a united front, which has clearly had an impact.

To return to Thameside Court, I said that the second concern expressed at the public meeting at Northmoor was about the right of owners to sell their homes. The rule changes are, I believe, directly linked to that issue. If we think about the proposed changes—no kids, no one under the age of 50, no one allowed to put up for sale signs—we can see the connection. Some residents felt that they were under pressure to leave because of the rule changes, but even for those people, it was becoming more difficult to sell homes, because they could not put up for sale signs and the like.

Let me read the testimony of one person who felt enormous pressure to sell their home. The quote is quite long, but I hope that hon. Members will indulge me. That person said:

> "My house was up for sale at the time and I had moved into other accommodation in Witney. Hartley could contact me through my park home estate agents, Seekers, but chose not to. Instead, he called my neighbour.
>
> I did call him and he told he that I had no choice but to sell to him at his price as he had a file on me and that as I was not living in my park home any more, I was breaking the terms of the agreement. He threatened to remove my home from the park if I did not comply immediately. At this time he also informed me that he was in possession of my new address. As my house was officially up for sale, he actually had no grounds to do this and I was acting within my rights. Hartley demanded that I meet him later that day at the park to formalise the sale for £25,000. My house was up for sale for £36,000.
> When I met him at the park, he inspected my home and declared that it was older than the age stated on my park home agreement by eleven years and that he was not going to tolerate such an old house on the park. He said that he would probably have it taken off anyway as it would take a lot to do up. He said he would pay me £20,000 and no more. I had no choice but to accept in the end as I felt that my family could be at risk and I no longer had the funds to use a solicitor to fight him even though I was in the right. Hartley spent around £5,000 to £7,000 doing up my home and it is now for sale for £89,500."

One resident alleged that the site owner refused to accept the display of notices inside or outside a mobile home advertising it for sale. After it was pointed out to the owner that he was required, as a member of the BHHPA, to permit one for sale notice to be displayed in the window of a home for sale, provided that it does not exceed A4 size, he amended the rules.

There have been a number of accusations of improper behaviour, and I know that the Government recognise the problem of harassment. A press release from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on 24 February states:

> "According to residents' associations, one of the most common complaints is the harassment of park owners when they want to sell their home. This often results in properties being sold at low prices to the site owner."

I congratulate the Government on recognising the problem.

When another couple informed the site owner that they intended to sell their home because it was no longer their main residence, he said—this will become familiar—that he could not allow them to do that as the unit was "too old and worthless". He did not want old units on the park and intended to remove their home and burn it. That elderly couple told the residents' association that they were then subjected to threats. The site owner warned them that if they discussed their situation with anyone else, he would leave them with no money at all. In the end, he gave them a cheque for about £5,000 and the unit was carefully dismantled and removed on transporters. The same methods were used with another elderly couple, who had hoped to sell their unit for £70,000. In the end, they sold it to the site owner for £20,000. It is being resold for £90,000. I accept that work has been carried out on those units, but the fact is that people have not been given a fair deal.

What is happening seems fairly straightforward. Owners recognise that the value of these sites is now great, particularly in areas of high housing demand such as West Oxfordshire, and particularly if new units can be erected. On occasion, improper pressure is put on people to sell at a low price or to leave because of other rule changes. The case histories that I heard at the public meeting, some of which I have shared today, are pretty clear. There are cases in which what has happened can be done within the law because, for example, the owner in question has another home, but due process should be followed, and judging by what I have seen and heard, that has not happened in every case.

To give credit where credit is due, the Government have taken action. The press release from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on 24 February explained a number of amendments, including the following provisions:

> "To remove 'age' of a home as a criterion for ending an agreement, and to give discretion to courts to adjourn termination proceedings on the grounds of the condition of a park home to allow for repairs to be carried out".

However, some important questions remain for the Minister to answer.

First, what more can be done to stop the abuse of the rules and the exercise of market power? Secondly, what additional role could the local authorities, or even trading standards departments, play in ensuring that owners of mobile units get a fair deal? The Mobile Homes Act 1983 potentially provides people with extensive rights and the Government's amendments to the Housing Bill will extend that provision. However, those rights are mainly enforceable through the civil courts, which means that people must pursue the action themselves, usually with the assistance of a solicitor. In the case in question, West Oxfordshire district council has been extremely supportive, as has the citizens advice bureau, but the council finds it difficult to intervene directly on a resident's behalf because it can deal only with issues relevant to the site licence conditions, or accusations of harassment if they are properly made and put to the council. My constituents often have neither the funds nor the inclination to drag the matter through the courts, especially because of their shortage of funds, and because they fear the consequences of taking that sort of action.

I welcome the recent Government amendments to the Housing Bill, which sought to address the serious concern about park home owners' rights. However, it is essential that the changes are effective in reality, on the ground, when residents either feel too intimidated to take their case to court, or simply prefer the option to leave, selling their property to the site owner at a very low price. There are many good parks that operate fairly, but I suspect that the type of harassment that I have described is common. One of the main reasons why mobile home residents do not assert their rights under the Mobile Homes Act is that they are often vulnerable and elderly, and many lack the means to take their case to court.

I have spoken about residents' rights, but park owners have rights too. I respect the fact that they are running a business, not a charity or a public service, and I understand that they must be able to take steps to ensure the quality of their parks, to protect their investment and to run an efficient and effective operation. Because up to now Mr. Hartley has not had a meeting with residents, I accept that I have not fully heard his side of the story, although I have called him on the telephone and corresponded with him, as the Minister knows. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say. I have become involved only because the residents were distraught and felt that they had nowhere else to go. The stories they told me, especially about trying to sell their homes, are quite chilling. Some people have lost their life savings; they are bitter about that and I am angry on their behalf.

My conclusions are as follows: first, we need a system whereby local authorities and citizens advice bureaux can offer more support. Local councils may need to be given specific powers in that respect and I hope that the Minister will keep an open mind on the issue. Secondly, information for mobile home residents must be clear, concise and specific, telling them about their rights and how to exercise them. It should tell them what to do if they feel they are being mistreated or worse, or ripped off. It should also tell them when not to do something, but to consult the residents' association and seek the advice of a solicitor if they are concerned about what they are being asked to do.

Thirdly, the Government need to keep under review whether more needs to be done about how park rules can be changed and whether a clearer role could be set out for residents' associations. Fourthly, the Government need to examine carefully the rights of owners to sell their mobile homes in a reasonable market and at a fair price. Fifthly, and lastly, residents need to work together: on their own they are likely to be picked off and disadvantaged if faced by an unscrupulous owner, whereas together they can stand up for each other, seek the backing of the law and ensure that their rights are upheld.

At the meeting in Northmoor, there was strong agreement on the following points. First, no one should agree to action set out by the owner without first consulting the residents' association. Secondly, the request for a meeting between the residents' association and the owner should be made again. Thirdly, the residents' association needed to take legal advice about the position with regard to the proposed rule changes and what has happened about the sale of certain homes. I hope that the Minister agrees that that is the right advice. Hon. Members are often put in a difficult position in such situations, because they come between owner and residents. However, I hope that that was reasonable advice to give to park home residents, to ensure that their rights were protected.

I know that the Minister has been examining the issue for some time, and that he is therefore almost certainly more expert than I. However, I hope that I have crystallised some of the issues by raising a constituency case that throws light on the matter, and put forward some thoughts for future consideration. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say.

11.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) on securing the debate and on his speech. I welcome the opportunity to debate mobile home parks—in fact, similar matters were raised in the House only a fortnight ago, at ODPM oral questions.

I am extremely sorry to hear of the problems that the hon. Gentleman has so graphically described—a sorry saga indeed. I hope that, as a result of his intervention, some progress is now being made. The problems that he describes are unacceptable and a response is needed, although I hope that he understands that I cannot speak about individual cases. I shall use this opportunity to outline how current provisions and ongoing reforms in respect of park homes will help not only those residents but others throughout the country who may be experiencing similar difficulties. Certainly, the issue has not had the prominence that it deserves, given the nature of the exploitation by unscrupulous site owners in the past.

I pay tribute to others who have been considering the issue for some time. My noble Friend Lord Graham of Edmonton and my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) have campaigned on those matters. I also refer the hon. Gentleman to the all-party group on park home owners, which has worked hard on the issue for a number of years.

The Government set up the park homes working party in 1998 in response to the views of many residents that some park owners were behaving in the way described by the hon. Gentleman—pressurising and harassing residents. The working party's aim was to consider the operation of existing controls on residential park homes and to make recommendations on what changes, if any, would constitute a fair and workable solution that struck the right balance between the needs and interests of park owners and home owners. The working party's report on the options it considered was published in July 2000. It made 30 recommendations covering a wide range of issues, including changes to the rules on the sale of homes, the provision of written statements, the ending of agreements, harassment, site licensing and the rates of commission and pitch fee available. The Government accepted 25 of the 30 recommendations and, as the hon. Gentleman said, a number of those have been included in the Housing Bill. Those provisions will strengthen the rights of residents of mobile home parks and, at the same time, ensure that the industry's regulatory framework helps to meet the growing need for quality, affordable housing. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that, when such parks are well run, they provide a good opportunity for people to find affordable places to live.

Turning to the specific points that the hon. Gentleman made, he mentioned the problems of harassment that some residents have experienced. Harassment is one of the most disturbing of the many issues that the hon. Gentleman raised today. Let me make it clear that harassment of any kind has no place on park home sites, or anywhere else. There should be strict enforcement by local authorities, which have clear powers to deal with it. Although, as the hon. Gentleman said, residents can be frightened in such situations, the local authority needs statements from residents who experience such difficulties. Residents must come forward and make statements so that a local authority can bring a prosecution.

Local authorities, in addition to their power to prosecute, can be helpful in offering informal advice and guidance to residents. It appears that the hon. Gentleman, as their Member of Parliament, has also been offering such guidance, which is very helpful to residents. We have issued best practice guidance to local authorities on this subject, following the publication of a report entitled "Harassment and unlawful eviction of private rented sector tenants and park home residents"; there is thus guidance for local authorities.

We have increased the protection for occupiers of park homes against harassment and illegal eviction. The Housing Bill amends the Caravan Sites Act 1968 to mirror the protection under the Protection From Eviction Act 1977, which governs the protection for occupiers with other types of tenure, including tenants of conventional housing, against unlawful eviction and harassment. Importantly, the wording, which refers to a site owner doing of the occupier that cause him to abandon his home has been amended to refer to "acts likely to interfere" with the occupier's peace or comfort, which is obviously an easier test to satisfy in the courts. In addition, a new offence has been introduced, which does not require intent to be shown with respect to the harassment. It will be sufficient if the site owner or agent knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, that his conduct is likely to result in an occupier abandoning occupation. That therefore increases the protection available to occupiers and the chance of successful prosecutions.

"acts calculated to interfere with the peace or comfort"

The Bill also creates a power whereby the Secretary of State can add additional terms to be implied into the agreement between the site owner and occupier governing the occupation of the site, and to repeal and vary those in the Mobile Homes Act 1983. Because existing agreements are of infinite duration, it is necessary for the Secretary of State to be able to amend the statutory implied terms for existing agreements, where these are clearly inadequate. Provision has therefore been made for the first exercise of the power to have retrospective effect—that is a very powerful measure. Future exercises of the power will be non-retrospective. That was discussed during the consultation on "Park Home Statutory Instruments: Consultation on Implied Terms and Written Statement", which we closed on 22 October. We propose to insert a right of quiet enjoyment of the pitch into all contracts. We are aware that many site owners enter the pitch with a view to harassing residents, so we propose to require site owners to give 24 hours' written notice before they are allowed entry to the pitch.

I shall now speak to some of the other issues that the hon. Gentleman raised, including allegations of illegal eviction. The current written statement that residents receive makes it clear that the specific grounds on which a contract can be terminated by the site owner include a court's being satisfied that a term of the agreement has been breached, that notice to remedy the breach has not been complied with in a reasonable time, and that termination is reasonable. Another ground is that the site owner has applied to a court to terminate an agreement because an occupier is not using the home as their only or main residence. Also, at present, a site owner can apply to a court to terminate an agreement at the end of the current five-year period on the basis that the age and condition of a home is having a detrimental effect on the amenity of the site, or that it is likely to have a detrimental effect before the end of the next five-year period.

In the Housing Bill we have provided that the age of a home should be removed as a relevant criterion for ending an agreement. The amendment will remove the reference to age from the Mobile Homes Act, as we consider that only the condition of the home, not its age, should determine whether it is having a detrimental effect on the amenity of the site. The amendment will also enable courts to consider the condition of the unit and to allow time for appropriate repairs if reasonably practicable, and if the occupier indicates that he intends to carry out those repairs. That would deal with some of the instances that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

We are examining a number of issues in the implied terms consultation paper on protection from eviction. We aim to remove mention of the relevant five-year period so that the current condition is the only reason for which a site owner can apply to have a home removed. We also propose that a court can evict someone on the basis that their home is no longer their only or main residence only if a court considers it reasonable to do so. That will protect people who have prolonged absences from their home, such as lengthy hospital stays, or to care for a sick relative elsewhere in the country, from an abuse of those circumstances.

[Phil Hope]

The Housing Bill will also improve the transparency of transactions and ensure that the resident has more information on the transaction at the time of purchase. At present, written statements setting out the terms of the agreement between site owner and occupier governing occupation of the site by the occupier may be given up to three months after the agreement has commenced. It is quite amazing that that is the current position. I am pleased to say that the Bill requires a written statement of terms to be given to a prospective occupier 28 days before any agreement for the sale of the mobile home is made; or, if there is no such agreement, not later than 28 days before the occupation agreement is entered into. To clarify, the parties will be able to agree a shorter period than 28 days between themselves, but the prospective occupier must indicate their consent in writing to the specified shorter time scale. That provision is designed to ensure that potential park home occupiers are made aware of the terms under which they will occupy the site before—not three months after—coming on to the site.

The hon. Gentleman gave some examples of restrictions on sales. I cannot talk about specific cases, but will talk about the issue in general. At present, a simple failure to give timely approval to a purchaser, as opposed to the active withdrawing of approval, is a method used by some site owners who wish to force occupiers of older-style homes into selling back to them. If the delays are too long, potential purchasers lose interest and it becomes difficult in practice to sell the home and assign the agreement to anyone. In that way, sale to the site owner becomes the only practicable option. The site owner can then replace the old home with a new model, or do it up, to sell on at considerable profit. The Housing Bill introduces a contractual duty for the site owner to give approval to a prospective purchaser within a time limit of 28 days unless it is reasonable not to do so. If the site owner does not issue a decision within 28 days, or withholds approval unreasonably, the occupier can apply to the court and seek damages for breach of contract. The occupier can also seek an order from the court declaring that the prospective purchaser is approved.

The consultation paper for secondary legislation proposed further changes to aid the transparency of the transaction. The Bill will help to deter site owners from behaving in an unreasonable manner, by making them explain the reasons for withholding consent. However, the process could be made more transparent by the resident already knowing possible reasons for consent being withheld. The consultation paper asks site owners to specify criteria, which, although not exhaustive, would provide a useful checklist of standard criteria applicable in all cases for residents. We propose that it be made available to residents with the written statement.

The hon. Gentleman also raised a number of issues about the amendment of the park rules. That subject is well covered by the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, which provide that a term may be unfair if it has the object or effect of enabling the seller or supplier to alter the terms of the contract without a valid reason specified in the contract. Where park rules or other obligations are incorporated into the contract made between a park owner and a park resident, the Office of Fair Trading is likely to object to any term that allows the park owner to make substantial alterations that change the balance of advantage under the contract. The OFT takes the view that any such change should be made only with the genuine agreement of the park residents. The OFT is also likely to object to a term that enables the park owner, without a valid reason, to alter important characteristics of the way in which the service will be provided. Unfair contract terms are unlawful and the OFT will look into such matters and take action if necessary. Park residents are legally entitled to receive the service that they agreed to purchase, not one that is merely analogous or similar.

We are shortly to consult on some more recommendations from the park homes working party that deal with site licensing and the recognition of residents' associations. In January next year, we will consider the recognition of residents' associations in park homes; that will an important area for the hon. Gentleman to look at when we publish our consultations in a few months time. We will also consider the reform of the payment regime—the 10 per cent. commission—early next year. Those recommendations will help us to take forward the measures that we have already put in place.

As the hon. Gentleman said, we should not allow the obvious and well-known problems, which are so distressing for individuals, to affect the reputation of all operators, because we know that there are good operators who run parks effectively and we do not want to do them an injustice. Park home living is attractive to many people: it offers a freedom that other forms of occupancy do not, and it provides a livelihood for many responsible site owners who care for their sites and for the residents of the homes on such sites. We have no will to curtail park home provision, and indeed we are happy to encourage more.

I hope that I have answered most of the questions raised by the hon. Gentleman. We are making significant progress and I congratulate him on bringing this debate to the Chamber. It is an important one, and I hope that the measures that we are introducing will be an important first step. We shall press ahead with secondary legislation at the earliest opportunity.

Seafarers' Employment

2 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): Before I call the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell), let me say that he has been courteous enough to tell me that he has not been particularly well over the past couple of days. He has been suffering from flu and various associated things, and I am sure that everyone will understand if he needs to take a drink of water during his speech.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have isolated myself in the corner to avoid passing any contagion to you or other Members.

I am grateful for the opportunity to raise this important issue on behalf of the large group of Members who have expressed concern about the tonnage tax and seafarers' employment. I should mention that my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) is currently chairing a Select Committee, so he cannot be with us. However, he wants me to mention his support for the debate and for our proposals on reforming the tonnage tax. I should also declare an interest as the chairman of the RMT—National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers—parliamentary group.

It is important that we are debating this issue today, because the various Government reviews of the tonnage tax have reached a key stage. We hope that the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson) will listen, as he always does, before taking away with him some of our messages about overall reform.

The United Kingdom is an island nation and is heavily dependent on ships for its trade, but the number of seafarers has declined dramatically in the past few years. The number of UK seafarer ratings has fallen from 30,000 in 1980 to fewer than 10,000 today. Furthermore, hon. Members on both sides of the House were recently shocked to hear the latest announcement by P&O, which intends to dismiss 1,200 UK seafarers as part of a wide-ranging review of its business. That will involve closing several key ferry routes.

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that the present proposal for 1,200 redundancies in Dover and Portsmouth comes on top of 800 redundancies at P&O less than 12 months ago?

John McDonnell: I am aware of the overall figures and I am sure that my hon. Friend will want to comment later on the impact of those redundancies on his and other Members' constituencies. What all of us find shocking, however, including the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), who has made representations on this matter, is the nature of the announced job losses. Rationalisation might be going on in the company, but many of us felt that at least there was an agreed process for taking it forward and that the company could be maintained in profit. We may return to that point.

In December 1998, in response to the fall in the number of seafarers, the Government published a policy document entitled "British Shipping: Charting a new course", which outlined a series of policy measures to address the decline in UK shipping. One of the key objectives that the Government set themselves was to increase the training and employment of UK seafarers. The centrepiece of their measures was the UK tonnage tax, which was eventually broadly welcomed by all parties, all sections of the industry and all organisations representing seafarers. So, we had an agreed way forward.

Currently, the Inland Revenue and the Department for Transport are conducting a review of the tonnage tax. One of the matters being examined is whether there should be a firm link between the tax concession and the training and employment of UK seafarers.

The tonnage tax is a special form of taxation that has been introduced for the UK shipping industry. Several other countries have also introduced tax concessions for their shipping industry in recognition of the competitive nature of the maritime sector. Indeed, the British tonnage tax evolved as a result of the evidence provided to the Government about what other European countries were doing to support their industry. Again, employers and employee representatives' organisations alike provided that information and lobbied on the basis of it.

The tonnage tax is a significant concession to the industry and is worth about £35 million a year. Initially, the Chamber of Shipping said that the cost would be between £10 million and £15 million a year. The RMT believed that it would be considerably more, as did the Government, who believed that it might cost between £45 million and £50 million. In fact, it has cost £35 million.

Shipping companies that enter the tonnage tax regime pay a notional tax levy according to the size of the company fleet, as opposed to the usual form of taxation, which is based on company profits. In addition to the lower tax burden, companies have far greater financial certainty, as they can plan in advance for the amount of tax that they will be required to pay at the end of the financial year.

When the tonnage tax was introduced, everyone believed that there was a real prospect of a win-win situation in which the industry would be made more competitive and tax efficient and that employment would increase. For many years, the UK shipping industry was in decline. That is not a new phenomenon: indeed, the Government deserve credit for taking time to consult industry representatives and formulating proposals to tackle the crisis in the industry.

As I said, the proposed policy measures were outlined in the policy document "Charting a new course", which pointed out that many ships deserted the UK flag throughout the 1980s and 90s and that thousands of UK seafarer jobs were lost. Estimates for 1980 put the number of UK seafarer ratings at 30,000. That figure has now fallen to less than 10,000. The Government and independent organisations have been trying to produce best estimates of how low that number could go. Many fear that a fall on the scale of that of the past two decades could mean that by the end of the next decade we would be left with no UK seafarers at all on British ships and elsewhere in the industry. That is a dismal prospect for a country, much of whose wealth was founded on the maritime trade.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich) (Lab): My constituency has a proud maritime history that dates back centuries. May I give my hon. Friend an example of the decline of our ship and seafaring industry since 1984? About 1,800 seafarers used to sail from the port of Harwich, but the number has now fallen to about 60. Is not that a sign that we must do something to retain what we have left and improve those numbers?

John McDonnell: Figures such as those shocked the Government into action and should motivate us to recognise that there is cross-party concern that the matter should be addressed. Cross-party work must follow the decision to retain a maritime industry. We must recognise that we are an island and thus do not want to become dependent on an industry that is controlled from other countries or other states. We must plan for the maintenance and development of a seafaring sector in this country.

Such figures have brought about today's debate. We can no longer stand by and watch the whole industry decline, observing its effect on particular constituencies and communities. Our experience relates very much to what is happening in the coal mining industry and the destruction of whole coal mining communities.

"Charting a new course" outlined a series of measures, but it is quite clear that the tonnage tax measure was very much the centrepiece of the programme to reverse the dramatic decline in numbers. There is little doubt that the tax has contributed to the reversal of fortunes on the UK register, and the maritime unions of course welcome the increase in the number of ships on the register. However, those ships must also provide employment opportunities for UK seafarers. We have a paradox: there is an increasing number of ships on the UK register, but no increase in employment overall. Unfortunately, the majority of the new companies on the register fail to employ UK seafarers.

Before I move on to the substantive issue for debate, I want to mention that the increase in the number of ships on the register is by no means as great as we expected. Between January 2000 and June 2004, the increase in the number of UK direct-owned and registered ships of 500 gross tonnes or more was just 57—from 241 to 298—which is hardly a dramatic return for the amount of money that is being invested in the tonnage tax.

Unfortunately, it is not a condition of entry to the scheme that shipowners register their ships under the UK flag, and current figures indicate that only 35 per cent. of UK-owned tonnage flies the red ensign. So entry to the tonnage tax scheme does not involve a requirement to register, although we accept that there is some incentive for it.

When the scheme was introduced, the seafarer unions pressed for a firm training and employment link for UK seafarers. The Government formulated a minimum training obligation, which required shipping companies to train one cadet for every 15 deck and engine officer posts in companies' effective officer complement. In certain circumstances shipping companies can avoid that requirement by making pilot payments in lieu of training to the Maritime Training Trust. That provision was intended for use only in exceptional circumstances, but unfortunately in practice some shipping companies have entered the scheme without training a single UK seafarer. That is contrary to the overall spirit of the charter for change and the introduction of the tonnage tax.

There is no compulsory commitment for seafarer ratings with respect to training or employment. The ratings' union, RMT, has pressed for a firm guarantee from the owners for a training and employment commitment, but that was not forthcoming. Instead, the minimum training obligation for ratings merely states that companies must review the feasibility of employing or training more UK ratings.

I want to correct a statement that my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister made on the Floor of the House of Commons. In response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser) he replied:

> "There has indeed been extra training for them"— that is ratings—

> "but I was disappointed that my union at the time, the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers, did not take up the training arrangements for all British crew members aboard the ships."—[Official Report, 9 June 2004; Vol. 422, c. 268.]

I am sure that my right hon. Friend did not want to mislead the House, but that was not an accurate statement, and the union's general secretary, Bob Crow, has written to the Deputy Prime Minister to say that at every opportunity the union has pressed the employers to seek training for ratings, and employment opportunities.

Far from training arrangements not being taken up by the union, the truth is that they have not been forthcoming from the employers' side. That can be discussed elsewhere, and we can go through the details of the offers that have not been made and the opportunities that have been missed; but it is certainly not for want of the union pressing for offers or wanting to take them up.

It is still hoped that the Government's firm policy commitment, which it was estimated would bring about millions of pounds in subsidies to shipowners and a much improved environment for UK shipping, will be enough to generate increased employment for UK seafarer ratings and officers. However, it is quite clear from the practice of recent years that without any firm training obligation companies have simply ignored ratings training and employment—with the sole exception of ratings-to-officers training schemes.

Latest figures from the Department for Transport for decisions to opt into the tonnage tax regime show a total of 758 vessels. Of that total, 408 are on the UK register. The number of companies attracted by the financial benefits of the scheme has increased from an initial 15 in 2001–02 to a current total of 67 companies with ships entered in the scheme for 2003–04. Unfortunately, the number of UK seafarers employed has declined in the last two years. That decline has been witnessed in both officers and ratings, and runs completely counter to the Government's four key objectives on shipping policy, one of which was increasing employment overall for UK seafarers.

Although the Minister will no doubt tell me that training places for cadets have increased as a result of the tonnage tax, it is also true that the yearly increase is modest. Last year's intake of cadets was only 622 and this year's figure is expected to be no more favourable. Indeed, the requirements for the UK economy that were outlined by the university of Cardiff in 1996 and confirmed in later studies indicate that current cadet recruitment is only about half that required for sufficient seafaring skills to be available on shore. Even with the narrow gain from the tonnage tax, its overall impact on employment has been remarkably limited.

For UK seafaring ratings the picture is without doubt grim. Employment continues to fall, and UK seafarers are being replaced by low-cost foreign nationals. The number of UK ratings in the tonnage tax scheme has also declined. In addition, the number of UK ratings being trained has fallen to an historic low of about 50 per annum. In 1998, the number was about 200 per annum, so current numbers are completely inadequate. The fact that the Chamber of Shipping has failed to honour previous commitments to increase training for ratings and officers by 25 per cent. year on year also graphically illustrates the depth of the crisis that the industry faces.

It is also of profound regret that in the last few years the standards under the UK flag have declined. Increasingly, maritime unions are uncovering instances of appalling low pay on board ships registered in the UK. For example, the International Transport Workers Federation—the ITF—recently uncovered the case of Lapthorn Shipping, which operates UK-registered freight vessels between British ports and Ireland and Rotterdam, and pays Filipino crews less than £2 an hour. The crewing agent pays the seafarers $775 a month, which is not only less than recognised ITF minimums, but less than the minimum standards stipulated by the International Labour Organisation.

The Minister will be aware of the continued discrimination against low-cost foreign national seafarers under the amended Race Relations Act 1976. The low standards of employment that are evident under the UK flag are largely a result of the discrimination against foreign-national seafarers that is specifically allowed for under that legislation, which we have discussed in previous Adjournment debates.

The Minister will recall that when the Government recently reviewed the legislation, discrimination against seafarers on the basis of colour, ethnic origin or race was removed. However, discrimination on the ground of nationality has been allowed to continue. In fact, the removal of the other grounds for discrimination has made no difference whatever, as shipowners can continue to discriminate against foreign-national seafarers recruited abroad, through low pay and worse conditions.

Due to the increasing difficulties experienced by seafarers on UK-flagged vessels, the UK maritime unions have taken the unprecedented step of passing policy that allows for the declaration of a flag of convenience on certain UK-registered vessels, which was confirmed in July 2004 at a meeting of the ITF fair practices committee in Singapore. Never before in our history have British ships been identified under flags of convenience. That is a step back in employment and training practices of almost a century. I sincerely hope that the Minister agrees that standards on the UK flag should continue to be a concern and that taxpayers have every right to question the substantial sums of money that the Treasury has allowed the industry, in the form of the tonnage tax.

The concession has been worth more than £100 million since its introduction in 2000. I believe that concession can be justified, but only if we can demonstrate that there will be sufficient all-round benefits to the UK economy. The generation of employment opportunities for UK seafaring ratings and officers is obviously foremost among those.

When the Government published "Charting a new course", additional training and employment opportunities for UK seafarers was one of the four key objectives set out in the document. It had been preceded by the White Paper on the future of transport in July 1998, which set out four aims for an integrated shipping policy, one of which was to increase employment for UK seafarers.'

The urgency of the training commitment is also illustrated by the increasing age profile of UK seafaring ratings. The last available analysis was provided by the Chamber of Shipping in its manpower survey published in June 2002. It informed us that the average age for UK deck ratings is 43, and for engine room personnel, it is 43.3. That is broadly in line with similar research presented by London Metropolitan university in 2002 in the UK seafarers analysis. The London Metropolitan analysis found that 65 per cent. of UK deck ratings were over 40, and the figure was 62 per cent. for engine room ratings. Given that the level of training for seafaring rating positions has declined since 2000, the age profile will further deteriorate unless corrective action is urgently taken by the industry. It is not an industry in which we want an ageing population.

In the light of those developments, the RMT has submitted a detailed proposal seeking an employment and training link for UK seafaring ratings. An early-day motion signed by a significant number of Members has been submitted in support of the proposal for such a link. At the moment, shipping companies are enjoying the benefits of the financial concessions without delivering training and employment opportunities for UK ratings.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): What does the hon. Gentleman say to the arguments put forward by the Chamber of Shipping that an employment link on tonnage tax would deter shipping businesses from either coming to or remaining in the UK?

John McDonnell: As in the earlier debates about the development of the tonnage tax, it is a matter of getting the balance right. I suggest that the RMT proposal, which I shall outline shortly, gets that balance right. We need a firmer commitment for UK seafaring ratings and all cadets. We should not impede or overload the industry with financial burdens, but we should get some return from the £100 million that we are investing in it through the tax concession.

Mr. Ivan Henderson: The argument put forward by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) was used for many years as a reason for not introducing tonnage tax to encourage the employment of British seafarers. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the comments made by one Chamber of Shipping member, Lord Sterling, when the Government introduced tonnage tax? He said that this Government had done more for shipping than any other. Respect should be shown to the shipping industry by returning British seafarers to ships, as the Government have done by giving those concessions and introducing the tonnage tax.

John McDonnell: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns about previous statements that have not been matched by company actions. In this debate particularly, I want us to demonstrate our willingness to work in partnership with shipowners. However, partnership is a two-way street. We lobbied together for the tonnage tax and won that argument, admittedly with a sympathetic Government, but in return we expect what was originally envisaged as part of achieving those objectives for the industry. In reviewing the tonnage tax, it is not too much to ask for some return in terms of UK seafaring ratings jobs.

Mr. Prosser: Does my hon. Friend agree that some of the statements made by the Chamber of Shipping are not helpful, especially the idea that the seafarers' unions aim for an absolute connection between the tonnage tax and British seafarers' jobs? They have never sought that. No one is saying that each ship that has tonnage tax facilities should employ only British seafarers; we say only that it should be a fair proportion.

John McDonnell: It is true to say that the unions, particularly the RMT, are asking for an approach that recognises the long-term development needs of the industry. The industry is not just about delivering profits for shipowners; it is also about delivering employment, and forming a stable sector of the UK economy in the long term. It is not much to ask, in return for taxpayers' money, that shipowners should deliver their side of the bargain, at least with regard to employment initiatives. We want to return to that partnership approach. It is hardly revolutionary; nor is it a flagrant attack on the Chamber of Shipping.

The RMT seeks to introduce two separate commitments—one for training, and one for employment. Both the experience of NUMAST—the National Union of Marine, Aviation and Shipping Transport Officers—and the figures on officers' employment demonstrate that the training commitment is not sufficient on its own. That is especially the case for ratings, when we consider that their training schemes are of much shorter duration than those of officers.

The RMT would include in the scheme a training and employment link for UK ratings and seeks a commitment from companies training UK ratings that at least one in 15 of the total ratings employed will be from the UK. That is hardly revolutionary; nor is it an overwhelmingly costly demand. It is remarkably conservative. In fact, I am beginning to worry that Bob Crow is softening up—no; I take that back, in case he is listening. However, it is a remarkably conservative gesture; the proposal would be practical in the short term and could be built upon in the long term.

The training commitment is followed by an employment commitment. It is calculated on the same basis as the training commitment—one in 15. Companies would be required to maintain the training commitment for at least the first three years of entry to the scheme, and to continue training as and when required in order to ensure compliance with the minimum employment requirement. Again, the concept is training and topping up as required; it would show a spirit of good will, and a joint commitment to ensure UK employment.

I know from discussions that I have already held with the Minister that he is concerned that changes to the scheme should not place in jeopardy the gains made in respect of the increased number of vessels on the UK register. That is why the RMT proposals are extremely modest and reasonable—and extremely pragmatic and practical. Ideally, the RMT and NUMAST, and perhaps the Minister, would like all ships to be crewed entirely with UK seafarers. Why not? However, the proposal asks only for a minimum of one in 15 UK ratings. That is not unreasonable when we consider the generosity of the taxpayers' provision.

The Government deserve credit for introducing a number of measures that have boosted UK shipping, but they must recognise that more needs to be done to increase UK seafarers' employment, especially for ratings. So far, 165 MPs have signed the early-day motion calling for a firm link between the tonnage tax concession and increased employment for UK seafarers, ratings and officers. I hope that the Minister can advise us that, following his review, he will introduce such a link.

We look forward to the outcome of the review, and we hope that today's debate, which takes place as the review is coming to an end, will influence it in a practical way and that it will promote the development of UK seafaring and the stable long-term employment of UK seafarers, which will provide benefits to many of our constituencies and to the UK economy.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is possible that Divisions could be called in the House during the course of our debate. I hope that hon. Members will agree that the sooner we can get back to the debate the better, so I suggest that if the Division bell rings, we should try to return within 10 minutes. If that proposal meets with the wishes of hon. Members, it would be helpful.

2.30 pm

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): I should start by declaring a number of non-pecuniary interests. I am a member of NUMAST, the merchant navy officers' union. I am also a member of the GMB, which is trying to save jobs in Dover along with the other seafaring unions, and a long-time friend of the RMT and its predecessors.

The seafarers' union campaign has gone on for more than a generation. For 25 years it has tried to revitalise the British merchant navy. During my 20-odd years in the service, in which I sailed deep sea, coastal and cross channel, I have been pleased to be part of that campaign. I remember during those difficult days wondering, along with the trade unions, whether any British merchant fleet would be left within a few years. We worried that the numbers of ships and the amount of British shipping activity would decline so much that it would drop over the edge and cease to exist. That would have been a sad story for a nation with such a proud history and proud heritage of ruling the waves and trading by sea.

We keep reminding ourselves in these debates that more than 90 per cent. of our trade still travels by sea. Some of us would like to see a lot more of the internal domestic trade carried by sea. There is much potential and lots to do, but we want to do it with a few more local jobs and a few more British seafarers' jobs.

During the 18 years of Tory Government, the merchant navy fleet was in continuous decline. The number of ships had fallen to just 226 by 1997. It was famously described as being on the point of oblivion. In the first years of this Government, the Chamber of Shipping and the trade unions lobbied hard for the introduction of the tonnage tax. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) referred to that in his speech. We wanted to arrest the decline of the fleet. We wanted to have more British registered ships and, we hoped, more ships under the red ensign, but we also wanted more British seafarers' jobs.

I was pleased to be part of the lobby that went to see Transport Ministers and Treasury Ministers. We spent a brief time with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer trying to put across the idea that a little help for the industry could see a large return for British shipping and a few British seafarers' jobs. It was not a massive manifesto, but a modest request. At the time, we were convinced that if the Ministers agreed and the tonnage tax came into place, the decline in British seafarers' jobs would also be arrested and we could start building up our seafaring numbers again. That was not simply a matter of employing more British seafarers. Although I am partial in these matters, they are considered the best seafarers—be they officers or ratings—in the world. Everyone wants British seafarers, but I suppose that the Minister would say, "If they can afford them."

I have described the background to my involvement, and we also had some useful meetings in my ports committee to which we invited members of the Chamber of Shipping and the seafarers' unions. It was a joint campaign. We all wanted the same thing, and I felt that we all expected to get the same or similar benefits from it.

My hon. Friend described the rapid turn around in the size of the fleet that resulted from those changes and the sad fact that the reversal in the fortunes of the fleet has not been matched by a reversal in the fortune of British seafarers. He also referred to early-day motion 880 in my name and that of other hon. Members present. It contrasts the huge difference in the reversal in fortunes of British shipping and the industry itself with the pretty abysmal results for British seafarers' jobs.

There has been a bit of an advance in training places for officers, but even that is set at a low limit. The legislation states that there should be one training job for every 15 British seafarers employed on a particular vessel. That is pretty small beer, but such modest stuff is appreciated as it has had an effect. However, it does not guarantee employment for the cadet or trainee at the end of their training, and there are many anecdotal stories about people who have gone through the scheme and who were looking forward to a career in the merchant navy.

We should remember the background to the debate: the trades unions and the Chamber of Shipping—both sides of the argument—have been putting resources into gaining young people's interest in a career at sea, because within seven or 10 years there will be a serious skill shortage as the average age of the British seafarer is over 40. They are coming to the age at which they will retire and there is no fresh blood coming in. There is thus a paradox: both the industry and the Government recognise the need for new entrants to fill the gaps and the add-on value that can be generated by British seafarers who are reaching the end of their seagoing careers. Whether they are officers or ratings, they are a versatile group who have transferable skills and can turn their hands to other things. Their work is diverse, from running Lloyd's of London to supporting the fish market up the road. Training seafarers adds value, as one can see from the insurance market and sea and ship broking. It is not by chance that the shipping sector in the City is full of people with former seagoing experience. There are many good reasons for bringing back a link between the tonnage tax and taking on British seafarers and providing more berths for cadets.

I want to re-emphasise the issue of proportionality. No one would suggest that every ship that comes back into the tonnage regime as part of the registry will take on only British seafarers. That would not be sustainable; it would not happen. However, there should be some feedback, at least, and a quid pro quo.

We have heard about the dramatic drop in the number of seafarers, and I want to re-state the figures in terms of the proportion of UK seafarers on tonnage tax vessels in the past few years. Tonnage tax was first introduced in 2000–01, when UK seafarers at rating level were 49 per cent. of the total; the latest figures, for 2003–04 show that only 28 per cent. are British. I contrast the rising fortunes of Lord Sterling and the profitable sectors of the industry with the reducing fortunes of seafarers.

The story is not much better for officers: in 2000–01, 80 per cent. were UK seafarers, and by 2003–04 the figure had fallen to under 50 per cent. Those are pretty stark figures and we should note that the tonnage tax has not necessarily generated additional jobs for UK seafarers, because many positions already existed in shipping companies prior to the change in the regime.

At the Labour party conference this year—you will have missed that, I suppose, Mr. Deputy Speaker—the Chamber of Shipping put on a fringe meeting. I have made a point of going to every one of those fringe meetings since the Chamber of Shipping started coming to the Labour party conference. It has not always done that, but I have gone to every one at which it has had a stand, and I have been joined by some of my colleagues here.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Mr. Henderson) mentioned Lord Sterling's famous intervention, which I remember. His words—paraphrased, but almost to the letter—were that the Labour Government have done more in the past 18 months for British shipping than the last Government had done in the previous 18 years. That was the background to the introduction of tonnage tax, and why we expected some benefit for the trade unions and their members.

At this year's Labour party conference, the Chamber of Shipping entitled its meeting "Tonnage tax and the creation of British seafarers' jobs". I suppose it labelled it that way to try to pull a few more members into the audience. Given the facts and figures outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington, such a title would be pretty ironic at any time. However, that meeting took place at the same time as P&O was announcing the sacking of 1,200 British seafarers, on top of the 800 British seafarers that it had sacked 12 months ago. That background made the meeting even more inappropriate.

Strong views were expressed on the floor of the meeting by officers, sailing ratings and members of the trade unions who had come along to see whether any good news could be related on the back of tonnage tax. From the floor we received stark evidence and stark views of the effect that tonnage tax has had on British jobs. It has been negative, not positive, and that is pretty certain.

I have been fortunate enough to follow my hon. Friend, who set out everything in clear terms. We have had the privilege of meeting the Minister about this very subject and have had correspondence on all the matters. The responses are all confined to a narrow channel, which concerns the wish to be flexible, to have a shipping industry that is open and receptive and can expand and grow, and for there to be no barriers to that. We do not want barriers; we want common sense and proportionality.

My hon. Friend referred to the ITF, which said that we would soon be at the stage at which the British flag—the red ensign of which we have all been so proud for so many years—will be described as a flag of convenience. A large proportion of the vessels that are shipping into the tonnage tax regime, but not under the red ensign, come from what I would describe as some of the saddest registries in the world. If someone registers a ship in such areas, they may get cheap registration, but they also get poor inspection and low safety standards, and that results in a poor safety record.

It is easy to correlate a ship's registry with the number of accidents occurring on those vessels. I had a quick look through the list today, and saw flags from countries such as Antigua, St. Vincent, Liberia, Panama and the Marshall Islands. When I was sailing on the deep seas under the red ensign, we would look at vessels from such registries and literally give them a wide berth. We would wonder whether anyone on the bridge knew where they were going or anyone in the engine room knew what they were doing.If we are not careful, we are in danger of being so flexible, open and receptive that we will allow the standards in our registry and those applying to the ships registered under the tonnage tax regime to reduce until we come to almost the lowest common denominator and have to share the low standards that I have described and that pertain under other flags of registry.

We look forward to the results of the Inland Revenue review. We want to continue the dialogue to find not a structure that straps all tonnage tax ships into 100 per cent. British employment, but a formula that recognises that if they are, in effect, receiving benefits from British taxpayers, British taxpayers such as British seafarers should enjoy some of the benefits too.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich) (Lab): I did not intend to speak, but I think that it is worth while to give an example of how a town has been decimated by the loss of the seafaring industry. We are proud of the history of the maritime industry in my constituency. This year, we are celebrating 400 years of the royal charter, and most of the celebrations have centred on the maritime industry, which has had a part to play in the Harwich area for centuries.

Let me give some background. It was so important to have people training for the seafaring industry that my secondary school—it was then the Sir Anthony Dean school but is now the Harwich secondary school—provided seamanship training as part of the curriculum. For most people, there was a natural progression from school to sea, whether they worked on the catering side, on deck or as officers. They would go to the Gravesend training school in Kent. People could also work locally for Trinity House.

The problem that we suffered started in 1984, when the previous Government privatised Sealink. At that time, 13 British-flagged ships were travelling out of Harwich; now there are only two. As I said earlier, at that time, we had 1,800 seafarers; now, there are just over 60 left, going out of, I imagine, Harwich International port.

Until a few weeks ago, the company Stena Line, which now operates out of Harwich International, was threatening to get rid of more British seafarers and replace them with cheaper foreign labour. Fortunately, I managed to talk to the director of Stena Line and he has now stepped back from that and has said that there will be another two years of replacing seafarer with seafarer on one ship and another five years on another, so we have a breathing space. Perhaps other shipping companies will take that on board and do exactly the same. Let us have a breathing space and leave the existing seafarers on the ships, so that we see how we get on with regard to training issues and the employment of more seafarers.

In Harwich, there is the possible massive development of a major port if the proposal goes through the public inquiry. My hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser) pointed out that many seafaring jobs are important for the future of shore jobs. Let us consider the experience in the dock industry. Most people employed on the docks have had seafaring time and some are ex-captains of ships. Indeed, the chief executive of Harwich Haven Authority is an ex-captain of a ship. We need the seafaring skills to continue, so that they can come ashore in future.

It is also important that we give future younger generations the opportunity to experience and enjoy a maritime career. We do not do that currently. We do not go into schools and offer seafaring as a career any more; that has not been an option because of the decline in the industry.

A few weeks ago, I took part in a scheme called "Get into maritime". It was headed by the Prince's Trust, which was working in partnership with Jobcentre Plus, Stena Line, DFDS Seaways, Trinity House and a maritime company in Ipswich called Fox's Marina. They all sponsored the scheme, which gave young people six days' experience of going to sea before putting them in the maritime industry for two weeks' work experience and giving them a taste of what the industry is all about. I met those young people after their six days spent tasting the adventures of going to sea, and they were really upbeat and wanted to go further in the industry. So, when the industry comes to us saying, "You want us to take on more seafarers, but they're not there," that is not true. Seafaring has not been offered in schools as a career for a long time; if it were, young people would come forward to get a taste of the industry.

As I said, I was not going to speak, and I shall not speak for much longer. Let me say on behalf of my constituency, however, that if the maritime industry were a building, it would be listed. Our country's maritime industry has a proud history; we can read all about it in the history books and see the famous people who have been involved in the industry over the years. It would be a disgrace for any Government to allow the industry to deteriorate and vanish from this country. The ships in my port have been given a temporary stay of execution for a number of years, but we need to ensure—with the help of the Government and the Chamber of Shipping—that the remaining jobs in my port are kept for future years. In that way, we can give other young people the opportunity to get a taste of what people have done in the maritime industry over the years.

2.52 pm

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): May I begin by expressing the hope that the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) enjoys a speedy recovery to full health? I thank him for having stuck to his last and for being here to introduce the debate, because he did so exceptionally well. I appreciated the measured way in which he put the case and the fact that he made it clear that we are seeking a balanced approach on which we can work in partnership. Had someone else introduced the debate, they may have demanded 100 per cent. British nationals on every vessel in the British fleet, which would have made it difficult for us to offer our full support. However, the measured way in which the hon. Gentleman put his argument allows us to support it fairly strongly. Indeed, I should say at the outset that I signed early-day motion 880 and encouraged as many of my colleagues as I could to do so.

In his closing remarks, the hon. Member for Harwich (Mr. Henderson) mentioned the proud history of the British merchant fleet, and we should bear that in mind. Three or four years ago, I had the singular honour of being asked to become the founder patron of the Caithness branch of the Merchant Navy Association. In preparation for the debate, I went to the association's website this afternoon and clicked on Scotland, only to discover that Caithness remains the only branch there. However, when I speak to some of the old sailors whom I meet and hear their tales about what they and their predecessors underwent in peacetime and in two world wars, I learn quite a lot. It is worth remembering that 36,000 seamen were killed in two world wars, which certainly puts the current number of about 30,000 ratings into perspective. With Remembrance day approaching, that should be at the back, if not the front, of our minds during the debate.

It is self-evident that the UK, as an island, needs a merchant fleet. The maritime industry will remain of the utmost importance. As has been mentioned, more than 90 per cent. of our freight by weight comes into the country by sea. A huge number of people are employed on passenger ships, which not only go across to the continent, but serve the northern and western isles and other parts of the United Kingdom. It is a matter of great regret that some of those jobs are now being threatened.

As has already been mentioned, we also have a coastal shipping industry, and I believe that that should be helped not only to continue but to expand. To those who are, like me, keen on the environment, using our coastal assets and resources for moving freight is important. There is much to be said for maintaining a sound merchant navy. That means making sure that British seamen and officers crew it. For those reasons, the Government were right to consider in 1997 what they could do to support the maritime industry. Without a shadow of a doubt the tonnage tax measures introduced in the Finance Act 2000 have made a significant contribution to rescuing the industry, and, certainly, to reversing its decline.

I was interested to note that the UK-based fleet has increased to 15 million deadweight tonnes from 7.2 million in 2000 and that the flag tonnage has risen to 10 million from 2.4 million over the same period. If those figures are expressed as ratios, one third was flagged in 2000, whereas now two thirds are flagged. There has been some movement to flag, which is important.

With the introduction of the tonnage tax, the principle of a link between employment and the tax concession has already been made. Placing the training requirement in that context has already established the principle that there should be a return, and some link to employment. Therefore, the argument is not, to my mind, about the introduction of a new principle but about how far the principle should extend.

It is clear that there has not, in the relevant period, been a corresponding increase in employment of UK nationals in the fleet. The number of officers and ratings has been in decline, and projections about further decline have been made. However, unless something can be done, decline is predicted. There is a clear consensus in this Chamber and probably throughout the House that it is desirable to reverse that trend. The question is how to achieve that. In particular, would further links between the tonnage tax and employment increase employment or decrease the prospects for British shipping overall? As I have said, I have already signed early-day motion 880, so I clearly take the view that further links with employment will not damage the

[John Thurso]

British shipping industry—particularly if they are introduced in the balanced and moderate way that is being espoused in the Chamber this afternoon.

The key issues include the employment of senior UK officers but not junior officers. The average age of officers in the merchant navy is 44, but 40 per cent. are over 50. Clearly, the moment is rapidly approaching when the number of senior British officers will diminish as those currently employed at sea either find shore jobs or retire. Finding employment for junior officers is also an issue. Cadet places are available and the training scheme has clearly increased the number of cadets undergoing training, but a lack of junior officer places for them to take up on finishing their training is a matter of concern.

It is a curious imbalance at a time when the world shipping industry is highlighting a worldwide lack of officers that, in this country, we cannot provide places for the junior officers who are being trained. That sends out the message to people who might be interested in entering the industry, "Yes, you can get trained but, no, we can't employ you at the end of the training." A cadet came to see me at a surgery in Invergordon about precisely that worry. He was employed but very unsure of his prospects, and he was certain that he would have to go abroad for much of the early part of his career to gain employment.

There is an imbalance between the training of officers and the training of ratings. In that regard, the training requirement has not been successful. We need measures that increase the training possibilities for ratings. The one-in-15 proposal made by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington is very conservative; that is the word that he used, but I never thought that I would find myself taking part in a debate in which the RMT's Bob Crow would be described as conservative.

Clearly, it is important that we find training for ratings; there is genuine consensus regarding objectives, but the problem is working out how to achieve them. Further links would strengthen employment without detracting from the ability of the shipping industry to act in a cost-effective manner. Let us consider, for example, the one-in-15 proposal for ratings. I believe that the rate for a deck hand from a foreign country may be as little as £2 an hour. Let us say, for the sake of argument, that a UK national in training is paid £5 an hour—there is a £3 an hour differential. If one took the cost of one in 15 at £3 an hour and came to a total cost for a voyage and compared it to the total profit generated through the tonnage tax concession, I suspect that one would find it a remarkably small percentage. It is a small return to ask for from a reasonably large concession, which has been effective.

I am reminded of debates that I attended in another place in which we discussed the minimum wage. That would have been in 1997 or 1998, when I was surrounded by employers who said that the minimum wage would decimate my industry—the hospitality and catering industry—and have appalling consequences. I was told that we would all be out of business within a year or two. In fact, the reverse was true. The fact that we introduced more reasonable conditions enabled more people to come into the industry, and allowed better employment conditions. For that reason, I supported the minimum wage as an employer and chief executive. I see the same long-term issue here. In the short-term, employers can say, "Oh dear, look at this cost that has come on us," but the industry should be looking at long-term trends and how we will get the necessary people into the industry in 10 years' time.

The hon. Gentleman will know from my comments that I stand fairly much in support of what he said so eloquently at the start of the debate. It would be impossible to have a British fleet that is manned 100 per cent. by British nationals. No one is asking for that. The balanced approach that is being asked for is a way forward, and I hope that the Government will consider it seriously. A British merchant navy consisting of no British merchant seamen is wholly unthinkable. We owe it to the proud tradition of which I spoke earlier to ensure that there is a proud future.

3.3 pm

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) on securing this important debate, and join the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) in wishing him a speedy recovery. One would not know from his speech today that he is ill. He put his case very well, and spoke with eloquence and passion, as did the other Labour Members who spoke.

The shipping industry plays an important role in the economy of our island nation, especially with ever-increasing global trade. The case for a tonnage tax was first made in earnest back in 1997 by the Chamber of Shipping, and later by the Select Committee. I agree with the comment in the Treasury report that considered the possibility of a tonnage tax. It said:

> "Our shipping industry and the skills of our seafarers have long been part of our success as a trading nation."

Opposition Members certainly want the shipping industry to go from strength to strength. We supported the introduction of the tonnage tax and continue to support it—I believe that the decision on that matter was right.

The hon. Members for Dover (Mr. Prosser) and for Harwich (Mr. Henderson) made great play of the fact that this Labour Government introduced the tonnage tax. That is technically correct. However, I have no doubt that, had we been in office in 2000, when the case for a tonnage tax was focused and well made, we would have done the same thing.

Mr. Prosser: Does the right hon. Gentleman not recall that, for many years before 1997, the industry—the Chamber of Shipping and others—was pressing the Conservative Government to introduce a tonnage tax?

Mr. Knight: I think that the case developed. As it became focused and clear that worldwide pressures meant that the tonnage tax was a fair way to proceed, I have no doubt that a Conservative Government—had we still been in office—would have accepted that case.

Mr. Ivan Henderson: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Knight: This is history, and I would rather look to the future, but I will give way again.

Mr. Henderson: The right hon. Gentleman probably would not remember the fact that, in my port, seafarers were replaced by Dutch seafarers on some of the main ships. That was because, in Holland, an incentive for ship companies to employ Dutch nationals had already been introduced. The previous UK Government, however, ignored the calls to go down the same road in helping our shipping industry to retain British seafarers.

Mr. Knight: I do not accept that point, because I had a conversation with the hon. Gentleman's predecessor just before I visited his constituency, and that issue was raised. The issue was actively discussed in the Conservative party at the time.

I was pleased to hear that NUMAST and others who are concerned with the industry met at this year's Labour party conference. May I invite them to attend next year's Conservative party conference, when we will be the party of government? I will be happy to welcome them to our proceedings.

Today's debate has focused on the question of employment, but it is also appropriate to acknowledge the economic benefits that tax concessions have brought.

There has been a huge increase in seaborne trade over the past few decades. The number of tonnes transported more than doubled between 1970 and the end of the last century. The International Monetary Fund and the World Bank predict that world seaborne trade will rise to 45,000 billion tonne-miles by 2012. As the hon. Member for Dover correctly said, international shipping is responsible for the carriage of 90 per cent. of world trade. It is therefore not surprising that the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development estimates that merchant shipping generates an annual income of more than $380 billion in the global economy.

Despite the success of the shipping industry and its importance to world trade, the number of seafarers has been decreasing. It is understandable, therefore, that groups such as the RMT and NUMAST are campaigning to protect their members' interests. Indeed, NUMAST's campaign literature states that it is > "working to develop a new national awareness of our Merchant Navy and to create the conditions in which the industry will flourish and prosper on the back of a core of skilled and experienced professional personnel."

Those are laudable aims.

Figures published by London Metropolitan university show that the number of UK seafarers fell from 30,000 in 1997 to 25,000 in 2001—the year after the tonnage tax was first announced—but that, by 2003, the number had increased to 28,000.

The campaigns being run by the RMT and NUMAST have been successful in raising the profile of the issue. I am sure that many hon. Members on both sides of the House will have received postcards and other correspondence from constituents who are concerned about that matter. We know that representatives from NUMAST have met Ministers and I hope that when the Minister replies to the debate, he will be able to tell us what conclusions he drew from those discussions. NUMAST's principal concern, and that of hon. Members who have spoken today, is that although tonnage tax has led to an increase in British shipping, it has not led to a corresponding increase in employment opportunities for British seafarers. I understand from parliamentary questions tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) that 12,500 seafarers are employed on ships in the tonnage tax scheme. Some 39 per cent. of all seafarers and almost 50 per cent. of the officers are UK nationals.

The White Paper, "Future of Transport", which was published in 1998, stated that two of the aims of an integrated shipping policy were:

> "To promote the employment and training of British seafarers in order to keep open a wide range of job opportunities for young people and to maintain a supply of skills and experience vital to the economy", and

> "To encourage UK ship registration, to increase ship owners identification with the UK, to improve our regulatory control of shipping using UK ports and waters and to maintain the availability of assets and personnel that may be needed in time of war."

The Government have been partly successful in delivering some of those aims, but there are questions still to be answered. Documents published by the RMT on the tonnage tax state that when the RMT expressed support for the idea, following the publication of the Department for Transport's policy paper "Charting a new course", it was expecting more than 200 new ratings to be trained under the new scheme each year. The RMT recently stated:

> "Latest figures on ratings trainees disclosed at the shipping task force would seem to indicate that approximately 50 new ratings trainees are being trained every year."

That is well short of the figure for which it was hoping. It continued:

> "This is less than the number of ratings who were being trained at the time of the discussions on the tonnage tax."

It is not hard to understand its frustration.

It is important for us to recognise that global competition remains tight despite the growth of the worldwide shipping industry, and continues to force costs down. The Select Committee on Transport found that crew wages amount to as much as 70 per cent. of the cost of running a ship. It is therefore unsurprising that operators want to minimise those costs, although I am sure that we would all agree that cost savings must never be allowed to compromise safety. I know that many hon. Members have continuing concerns about that.

I believe that British officers and ratings are among the best trained in the world, and I agree with the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington that it is important that we encourage shipowners to offer them opportunities. However, it is also important to remember that the president of the Chamber of Shipping, when giving evidence to the Transport Committee, said that > "many ship owners have the intention of training British seafarers but that any compulsion to do more might frighten companies away from Britain."

I am sure that none of us wants that outcome.

The Chamber of Shipping went further in its press release of 26 August this year, in which it said:

> "A mandatory linkage as proposed by the seafarers unions would deter companies from opting for the tonnage tax or from basing a shipping business in the UK . . . This would be likely to threaten rather than support jobs . . . The tonnage tax is not a subsidy; it is an internationally competitive tax arrangement. The UK is but one of many countries to have adopted a tonnage tax; indeed the only thing unique about the tax here is that it has a training link."

[Mr. Knight]

The Opposition do not want shipping business to go overseas, with the consequent loss of related support jobs. I suspect that the Minister does not want that either. I wonder whether introducing a rigid link that tied tonnage tax to the employment of British personnel would be lawful under EU law. Will the Minister say whether he has considered that?

I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say on this important issue. I hope that what he does say will give heart to officers and ratings. More importantly, I hope that it will not frighten away from these shores the job providers and wealth creators—the shipowners.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of State will respond.

3.14 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker for the promotion. Alas, I am still the Under-Secretary, but I jolly well ought to have a higher rank. I must declare an interest. As well as being Under-Secretary, I am a member of the GMB.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) on securing this debate. I form the third part of a three-pointed parliamentary cross-party accord by wishing him an early release from his illness.

I am pleased to say that much of the public discussion on these issues has been promoted by the maritime trades unions, and I congratulate them on doing so. My hon. Friend asked me to take away his comments and consider them; I assure him that I shall consider carefully not only his comments but those of other hon. Members.

The hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) reminded us that it will be Remembrance Sunday this weekend. I shall be in my constituency on that day. I shall remember not only those from the armed services who gave their lives but, at the huge memorial on Plymouth Hoe, the many merchant seamen who died. The latter gave their lives in large numbers on the Atlantic convoys and in other parts of the world, but I think particularly of those who died on the Arctic convoys. They lived through the most appalling conditions and died in the most dreadful circumstances. We must remember their contribution to our nation's liberation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser) and others reminded us that, by weight, about 96 per cent. of all goods are imported and exported by sea. We have one of the longest coastlines in Europe—second only to that of Greece—and it is a sensitive coastline. We have to look after the environment, but it is also important to keep the safety of seafarers at heart. We share with the French one of the most dangerous and hazardous sea lanes in the world—the channel.

The issue is being discussed at two other forums. The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) referred to the Transport Committee inquiry into tonnage tax; I gave evidence to the Committee in June, and we await the report with interest. The Inland Revenue's post-implementation review into the tonnage tax drew to a close in September, and I look forward to the Paymaster General speaking on that matter shortly.

A number of hon. Members, particularly my hon. Friends the Members for Harwich (Mr. Henderson) and for Dover, have strong constituency links with the sea, and so do I. I am instinctively attracted to the idea that we should do everything possible to attract and retain UK seafarers on UK ships. We have a long and honourable seafaring tradition. The Government continue to take pride in all that has been achieved since 1997 in trying to reverse the fortunes of the UK fleet. The White Paper "British Shipping: Charting a new course" set out a comprehensive strategy to reverse the long decline of the UK shipping industry that occurred during the previous two decades.

In answer to a point made by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire about protecting jobs, within the context of our membership of the European Union, those jobs would be available to people in the European economic area, not to UK residents only.

We now have a thriving and high-quality shipping register. I reject the idea that our register, either by flag or by tonnage tax, is a flag of convenience. It is not. The UK-registered fleet, with our flag, is the sixth largest in the world; and we are at the top of the Paris memorandum of understanding white list. That enables us to punch above our weight in the maritime world. Last week, I had the pleasure of attending the ministerial conference on port state control in Vancouver. I am pleased to report that the United Kingdom is held in extremely high regard on maritime matters. I do not know what sort of accolade it is, but I think that I am now one of the longest serving maritime Ministers in the world. That probably says more about how short a time the others serve than about how long I have served.

In considering whether to introduce an employment link into the UK tonnage tax regime, we must be aware that the issue is finely balanced. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington alluded to that. We want to improve opportunities for employment for seafarers, but we must be careful that, in doing that, we do not jeopardise the progress that we have made in reviving the UK merchant fleet. Increasingly, other countries are introducing tonnage tax regimes. The reduction of the relative competitiveness of the UK tonnage tax scheme might result in shipping companies electing to enter schemes in other countries or leave the UK flag. That would ultimately further reduce employment opportunities for UK seafarers and the shore-based staff who are so important, and, equally important, reduce our control over safety and standards. While we have a fleet of some size, we have some control over the quality of not only the ships themselves, but the employment conditions on board them.

From 2000, when the tonnage tax regime was introduced, to the end of June 2004, deadweight tonnage increased from 5.2 million tonnes to 12.3 million. There has also been a healthy trend in the profile of the register, towards larger and younger ships. Although the number of ships on the register might not be so large, some are very big vessels indeed, and carry a lot of goods and employ a considerable number of people.

Although the tonnage tax has undoubtedly played an important part in the increase of the UK merchant fleet, it is only one of a package of measures. Other factors have also helped to create a highly favourable environment for UK shipping, including the registration reforms that the Maritime and Coastguard Agency instituted. We cannot say that there is a direct causal link between the tonnage tax and the growth of the register, but 54 per cent. of the ships in the scheme are UK-flagged, and the UK-registered fleet is the sixth largest in the world.

I should like to say a few words about the importance of the tonnage tax to the UK economy. London is the world's largest provider of maritime services. The UK is an attractive base for overseas ship managers, with the well known assets of the time zone, the language, stability and the culture. Overseas owners with agencies here sustain more than 4,500 jobs, contributing around £1 billion in overseas earnings and bringing work to City firms that specialise in services related to shipping. The introduction of the tonnage tax is important because of the support that it provides for our shore-based industries.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington talked about shipping companies avoiding paying and the taxpayer making an investment. If we have given tax relief, it is taxation forgone, rather than an investment that the Government have made. If the tonnage tax regime was not attractive to a company, it could easily switch to somewhere else or decide not to come under our regime. That is why we have been so careful to ensure that coming under our tax regime is attractive to companies.

John McDonnell: What will attract companies to remain and to engage with the tonnage tax, and therefore to employ UK seafarers, is clearly a matter of balance. However, when Lord Alexander made the last independent assessment of the issue in 1999, he made clear his concern at the inadequacy of the commitment to the link between what we gain from the tonnage tax and the employment of UK seafarer ratings. We need to take heed of that independent assessment, because it has proved accurate.

Mr. Jamieson: If we can make that link in a way that ensures that we carry on getting ships on to our flag and under our tonnage tax regime but that does not damage our prospects, we will do just that.

Flags of convenience are usually for ships that will find a country where the inspection level is poor or little regard is given to it. If a ship comes on to our flag, it is given the most rigorous inspection by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency, and it would not be allowed to fly the UK flag if it did not meet those high standards. An assessment is made by the Inland Revenue as part of the process of identifying vessels and companies that qualify for tonnage tax.

The International Transport Workers Federation made an allegation about ships operated by Lapthorn, saying that they do not comply with parts of International Labour Organisation conventions 147 and 178. Those allegations were investigated by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency, which found that, with the exception of a few minor issues relating to ILO convention 178, the vessel was well maintained and had an apparently contented, motivated and industrious crew. If there is any evidence to suggest otherwise, I will be pleased to receive it and will pass it on to the Maritime and Coastguard Agency to ensure that a further inspection takes place.

Mr. Prosser: Is it not the case that a company currently registered in, say, the Marshall Islands—wherever they are—which elects to come under the tonnage tax regime rather than the registry and the flag, can maintain its standards under the original registry, which we all agree are second class?

Mr. Jamieson: But also, to come on to tonnage tax, the company would have to demonstrate that a large part was run from the United Kingdom. It could not simply come under our tonnage tax regime.

My hon. Friend made a sensible and pragmatic contribution to the debate, particularly in mentioning the one in 15 training commitment for officers. After three years, three lots of one in 15 make one fifth. So once a company has been under the tonnage tax regime for more than three years, the training commitment is more than one in 15. The challenge is finding jobs for those trainees.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harwich, as always a strong advocate for his constituency on maritime issues, made the powerful case for employing young people and set out the desperate need to replace some of the older generation working shore side. Young people need experience at sea if they are to be the best people to work shore side in the future. It is important to get people to sea so that they have the relevant experience to maintain the shore side industry, which is equally as important.

We have also seen an encouraging increase in seafarer training. The support for maritime training scheme—SMarT—has been running since 1998. It provides support for the training of officers and ratings, and has a budget of £9.4 million a year. There were 621 new starters during 2003–04. That is not enough, but it was an 11 per cent. increase on the previous year. We are doing all that we can to increase training, but we have started from a low base.

I am sympathetic to the idea of improving our flag and getting more vessels on to tonnage tax. I am also attracted by the idea of getting more UK people on board ships and working either as officers or ratings. It is not only vital for the merchant fleet, but for jobs on shore. We will look carefully to see how we can create an employment link that does not deter new ships from coming on to the tax or our flag.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the Minister for his reply to that important debate.

Police (Arrest and Charging Times)

3.30 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): It is my view that we could effectively increase the amount of time that police officers currently spend on the street by 25 or 30 per cent., and today I should like to explain how. First, I pay tribute to the people who work as police officers and prosecutors for the Nottinghamshire constabulary and the Crown Prosecution Service. They do an excellent job and I am indebted to them for their advice in briefing me on this speech; any mistakes and the policy I am about to articulate remain entirely my own.

I come to the subject as the result of a specific incident. As part of my police parliamentary scheme, I did a shift—7 am to 4 pm—in a Nottinghamshire police response car. During the day, which I understand was typical, we dealt with just two cases. The first was a minor neighbours' altercation, which I was surprised to see given the priority of a response vehicle visit. However, the second case was responding to an emergency call to arrest an 18-year-old who had smashed a window in a hostel. The officer located the youth on the street and with great skill calmed him down, persuaded him not to run, and put him in the car under arrest. The arrest was made at 11.43 am. That was the end of the officer's day on the street. He spent the rest of his day until he finished his shift at 4 pm processing the arrest.

Surely the role of an expensively trained, experienced response officer using a costly vehicle—I understand that it is £38,000-worth of Volvo plus all the kit—should be to arrest the individual, bring him to the custody section and give a full statement relevant to his specific involvement. The prisoner and the consequent development of a prosecution file should then be handed over to an appropriate responsible individual so that the front-line officer can within no more than an hour or so be back on the street, using his skills and equipment to do the job we all expect of him or her.

Instead, in this instance, the officer had to do the following—I accompanied him every step of the way, so this is a first-hand account. First, he presented the prisoner to the custody section, helped to fill out the appropriate forms, removed possessions and put the offender in a cell. Secondly, he requested a colleague to get a statement from the people at the scene of the offence. He later had to chase this up and, at the request of other individuals in the chain, require further details on the colleague's statement. Thirdly, he had to type up his own statement. No copy typist is employed. At one point, three fellow response officers, out of four on duty in the division that day, were doing similar tasks in the police station—one-fingered typing while their vehicles remained parked inside the police station. An experienced copy typist, picking up procedural niceties as they went, could retrieve hours of street time for officers.

The statement, which was now one of several pieces of paper beginning to form a prosecution file, then had to be checked by the largely civilian case progression office. Those working in that office do not take responsibility for a case; they critique the paperwork, requesting additions and changes. That necessitated the officer in this instance revisiting the prisoner downstairs in custody and contacting colleagues to collect and collate further information—including, remarkably, being asked to provide the precise dimensions of the window that had been smashed. We then had to visit the arrest investigation team, which is composed of police officers. They, too, requested the officer to undertake various actions.

I was never given a convincing explanation of why a separate CPO and AIT were needed, especially since neither relieved the officer of responsibility for the case. The officer then had to wait in a queue of other officers, who no doubt could have been better employed, to present the file to the Crown Prosecution Service. At that point, the shift ended. I am therefore not sure whether further work was requested by the CPS on another day, or whether there were additional links in the chain that we were yet to reach, because we all went off duty at 4 o'clock.

Police officers have told me that that was a typical experience—indeed, most cases are far more time consuming than that one, which was a very straightforward case, in which the individual had admitted his guilt on arrest and there were no time-consuming care or medical issues. I shall write to the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety about the care and medical issues rather than delay the hon. Members by detailing them today.

When my colleagues and I say to the public that we have more police officers in Nottinghamshire than ever before, which is absolutely true, the public respond, equally correctly, by asking, "Well where are they?" Perhaps the case I have outlined provides part of the answer. It also raises a number of questions.

First, let me say that CPS charging in stations is a very welcome development. No one was satisfied with the previous charging regime, in which the preparation of case papers was often sloppy, many cases were lost when they went to court, and an incredible amount of time of officers, prosecutors, witnesses and others, including victims, was wasted. However, in putting the process right, we must be careful that the pendulum does not swing too far the other way. Why do the police have to complete such a full file in cases such as the one I described? Do regulations need to be made more flexible so that the CPS is empowered or instructed to do a minimal fast-track file in such cases? Lengthy processes might mean fewer arrests and fewer cases going to court. If only those cases with a 70 per cent., rather than a 50 per cent., chance of winning go ahead, the objective of a higher percentage of cases being successful in court will, of course, be achieved; but if that Government target is achieved at a cost of fewer criminals going in front of the courts and of taking more police off the streets, it will be too high a price to pay.

Secondly, what is the Home Office's expectation of front-line officers? Should we, as one senior police officer told me, expect arresting officers normally to be their own case progression officer? If so, we should be frank with those officers and the public and stop pretending that more officers mean more visible and active street policing, when it does not mean that.

Thirdly, what is the cost of police time? Let us suppose that every officer uses half of his or her time in the way that I described—I was told that the case was typical. If so, of Nottinghamshire police's £168 million budget, how many millions go on getting case papers "CPS ready", as the jargon goes—£20 million, £30 million? Perhaps the Minister can tell us how much it actually costs in Nottinghamshire. I am sure that she will write to me if she does not have the figure to hand. Should the CPS be billed for such work or continue to get a massive hidden subsidy from the police budget, suffering no financial cost and therefore having no incentive to speed up or shorten the process when appropriate, as some police officers contend it does. Let us face up to and allocate the real financial costs as well as the operational costs of running the system as we do, so that we can at least make honest judgments about whether it should be done like that, whether it happens by accident, or whether there is a better way to do it if we intend to release the time of front-line police officers.

When the constabulary asks for yet more officers, it seeks public support by implying that extra personnel would be out there on the estates, tackling antisocial behaviour or arresting villains. If, in fact, half of any additional officers' time is to be spent on file preparation, we should be told; otherwise such a claim could be portrayed as an inadvertent manipulation of the local press. If, however, we expect police station managers to get arresting officers back out on to the streets at the earliest opportunity, the Home Office and the Department for Constitutional Affairs need to be very clear about who takes responsibility for case progression once an arresting officer has made his statement and put the offender in custody. Should that responsible person be a civilian, a retired police officer, or some sort of specialist police case progresser?

No national blueprint has been developed for how to do the administrative support work in the custody suite, so all forces have to invent their own wheel. Most of the work does not need police officers, but chief constables are severely constrained from reducing the number of police officers to pay for more people to work in that field. A specialist grade of professional investigator seems to be an obvious solution. Alternatively, might the CPS itself take on the task after arrest and be directly, honestly and openly funded to employ its own staff for case progression?

Before any of the more radical solutions are considered, the Home Office and the Department for Constitutional Affairs must now demand that better informal liaison be created between local police officers and local CPS prosecutors. Both sets of people whom I encountered were working incredibly hard and are deeply committed to their jobs, yet the degree of misunderstanding between them is massive. Although much can be done at county and divisional level, real progress will be achieved by informal interaction in the canteen and the corridor, which must be generated and promoted.

My attempts to facilitate that at local level have drawn the response that this is "political interference." However, the consequences of failures in the criminal justice system are simply too important to my constituents to be allowed to escape effective scrutiny and accountability, not least by Members of Parliament. The criminal justice system is not some private club of professionals who hide behind professional or judicial independence whenever a question is asked, instead of confidently engaging in dialogue and explanation. Recently, the criminal justice system has been most successful where it has a human face: beat officers, the drug abuse resistance education project and community-nominated work for young offenders have all been fought for or developed locally, all have a human face, and all involve someone who is known to the public. The least successful aspects of the criminal justice system are those where public interface is shunned or resented. However, public involvement and consultation will fail if they are centrally imposed targets—boxes to be ticked rather than deeply felt and systematic local engagement.

All those involved in the criminal justice system are facing massive cultural change. It is often deeply uncomfortable, but at least we are trying at local level. I commend the efforts of all those on the local criminal justice board, the Crown prosecutor in Nottingham, the chief constable of Nottinghamshire and many others who are at least trying to come to terms with the problems. I wonder if the centre can say the same. The criminal justice system must be re-united with the public whom it is meant to serve, just as police officers must be enabled to do the job that we expect of them.

3.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) in thanking his local police, Crown prosecutors and the whole team who keep the community that he represents safe. My colleagues and I welcome his efforts to shed the light of public opinion on community safety and to form and build relationships between partners in community safety.

I am very glad that my hon. Friend secured this important debate on the day that the Home Secretary announced the White Paper on police reform, in which we make clear our commitment to spreading effective neighbourhood policing. That type of policing engages not only the officers but the community and community support officers—some of whom, as my hon. Friend knows, I met in Beeston police station—in providing a service that is focused on the needs of us, their customers. We also make clear our determination to modernise the work force—my hon. Friend made some proposals in that respect—and our recognition of the fact that we need greater involvement of communities and the public in holding the police to account. My hon. Friend has described his efforts to obtain that, and I hope that he will be reassured that that is a clear and substantial part of our ambition set out in the White Paper announced today in the House.

Part of my hon. Friend's concern is about administrative burdens—the paperwork and inefficient working practices that keep police officers away from their fundamental job. Although we must emphasise that keeping records is an essential safeguard in the criminal justice system, providing protection for practitioners and the public, we must consider how we can ensure that process-driven requirements place the minimum burden on our police officers. That is why we are establishing a strategic framework to enable police officers to focus on their key role of tackling crime and providing reassurance to the public.

My hon. Friend raised several important points about the statutory charging scheme. The first phase of a new scheme that requires Crown prosecutors to make the charging decision in all but the most minor cases is in many places beginning to replicate the significant benefits achieved in the pilot scheme. According to the latest data from the Crown Prosecution Service, the scheme is demonstrating the potential to bring a further 30,000 additional offences to justice each year. I know that my hon. Friend is concerned that that might not happen in his area. I am citing national data, but we need to make sure that we achieve our ambitions in every area.

Charging is just the first step in the new prosecution team approach being adopted by the police and the CPS. The prosecution team ethos means a joint approach by both agencies to improving performance and bringing more offenders to justice. The shadow scheme, under which CPS duty prosecutors have provided advice to police officers on how an offender should be charged, has been judged a success. Measures introduced in the Criminal Justice Act 2003 mean that it is now a legal requirement for the CPS duty prosecutors to make those decisions as police force areas migrate to the statutory scheme. My hon. Friend's area is at a relatively early stage of that migration.

Police have generally welcomed the opportunity to work with the CPS at the early stage of investigations. They see the value of the development of a prosecution team approach with colleagues in that service to ensure that they have the strongest possible cases to present to them. However, I recognise that the processes and the way they work are the real test of whether every area is delivering value. The aim is to establish processes for referral to senior managers in both police and the CPS in the event of disagreement, and those processes are designed to work speedily, but the key consideration is ensuring either that offenders are brought to justice, or that the appropriate method of disposal is achieved.

The aim of early consultation with the CPS is to add value to the charging process. My hon. Friend rightly raised his concerns about the engagement of police officers in what he referred to as getting case papers "CPS-ready", but I would like to think that we have introduced an important structure of closer working for the benefit of the criminal justice system. Its aim is to improve efficiency and effectiveness and, crucially—I know that my hon. Friend and the police and the CPS in his area share this ambition—to bring offenders to justice. I acknowledge that my hon. Friend has constructive proposals on local case handling, involving clarity of responsibility between police and the CPS, case progress support, and specifying a defined point at which cases should be handed to the CPS. Those are important views, which support the concept of team working that I know he welcomes.

My hon. Friend sort of asked us to produce a blueprint for how the system should work everywhere; he is frustrated that police areas sometimes feel as though they are reinventing the wheel. However, one of the things that pilot schemes have shown is that one size does not fit all. We need to ensure that the impact that charging has made on performance is developed area by area. We want every area to increase the number of cases in which detection leads to successful prosecution. We do not want things to fall off the trail or cases not to be pursued. We want to make it easier to achieve success: from the moment that a police officer engages with a criminal, we want to move as fast as possible from detection to successful prosecution and sentencing.

Like me, in 1997 my hon. Friend put through many of the doors in his constituency a pledge card committing us to bring offenders to justice more speedily. We have made significant progress on that pledge. The scheme has the capacity to make much more progress, but we must be sure that it works in detail. In my hon. Friend's area, there will be an assessment of the data in January 2005 to determine the impact of statutory charging on sanction detection rates—that is, what number of cases are successfully prosecuted.

My hon. Friend made a number of proposals about work force modernisation. Our prisoner processing units aim to provide an appropriate level of expertise in dealing with arrests, including specialist prisoner handling staff who can be assigned to receive prisoners from uniformed officers, who will then be free to return to normal patrol or to conduct specific enquiries regarding the suspect. In some cases—for example in the Wiltshire constabulary, which piloted the scheme—the increase in officer availability through their not having to deal with so many detainees reveals that the time spent on preventive street patrols was increased from 22 per cent. to 27 per cent. When well handled, it can work. I understand that my hon. Friend is concerned that it has not worked well enough. However, while I was in his area, I met a number of CSOs. One powerful feature of that team was that they are not withdrawn from the street. While we are getting the process right, we are ensuring that street patrols are being delivered in his area.

We are committed to reducing unnecessary paperwork of the sort that keeps police off the streets. As I have indicated today, that is being taken forward in a number of ways. We are looking at ways in which officers can remain on the street and deal effectively with offenders, including the introduction of fixed penalty notices to allow the officer to get back on to the street more quickly.

In Nottinghamshire, the police and the CPS went live with the new charging arrangements in July. The new arrangements represent a significant cultural shift for both organisations. The charging programme board remains fully engaged with each of the statutory charging police forces and CPS areas, and is engaged in post-implementation reviews in each area. As my hon. Friend knows, when we met officers last week, we found that many of them thought that the CPS was prosecuting only those cases with a realistic prospect of conviction, and that much of the officers' time was spent queuing up for CPS consideration. On that latter point, Beeston and a number of other stations in the Nottingham area use the central Bridewell court. That results in officers travelling from their station to the Bridewell court from several locations, and there are delays while waiting to discuss their case with the prosecutor. It is an accommodation problem that has resource implications in terms of the number of prosecutors available, but I know that the police and the CPS are looking closely at how to resolve it. The CPS is considering making visits to outlying police stations, but we must ensure that it does that regularly enough so that it can provide the accessibility that the officers require.

The second and crucial concern is that the CPS is being overselective in the choice of cases to proceed to charge and that further inquiries being made at the request of the CPS are on behalf of that agency. I have mentioned the assessment process that will be conducted in January 2005 to consider the impact, both positive and negative, in different parts of the country. We know that new arrangements can result in more efficient use of police and prosecution time and that they can increase the number of offenders brought to justice. We must work together on the board, all of whose members are committed to the process, to ensure that that happens in Nottinghamshire. The issues that my hon. Friend raised, which I know are prevalent in Nottinghamshire, will be considered by the policing bureaucracy steering group on 9 December. There are burdens associated with the charging scheme. That is why the steering group will, with the police, the CPS and the courts, examine how best to deal with those issues.

I galloped through those points because I wanted to make it clear to my hon. Friend that his voice, and that of the people who spoke to me and other Home Office Ministers while we were in Nottingham, play a substantial role in ensuring that we engineer the detail of our ambitious programme to bring more people to justice and get more police on the beat in a way that fits the situation on the ground. My hon. Friend suggested that clearer central guidance might help to achieve that. I suggest that an approach that focuses on key themes and clear central relationships being built up and that draws on the experience on the street, which he so clearly described, is genuinely the best way to deliver the efficiency and effectiveness that we want.

We have ensured that there are more police than ever before in Nottinghamshire. We have added to their number CSOs. We have created a structure that brings together the police, the Crown prosecutors and other aspects of the criminal justice system more closely than previously. We are in the early stages of some new parts of that relationship and it will not always go wonderfully in every respect. However, we know from the pilots that they can produce radical change that means more offenders being brought to justice and more police having more time on the streets. That is what we are seeking to achieve. Our visit to the east midlands proved my next point more powerfully than all the speeches that Ministers can make: it is from the bottom up, by testing new procedures, that we can guarantee that our ambitious plans are delivered in practice. Creating a single central blueprint creates the risk of not policing individual communities properly.

Mr. Allen: The Minister is being generous in her reply. I know that she is not suggesting this, but it would be perverse if we had less well trained CSOs on the front line because trained police officers were tied up with duties in police stations. Might it not be a good idea to have relatively untrained officers doing the investigation in stations on behalf of the CPS, and fully fledged, well trained officers out on the ground, where we have paid them to be?

Fiona Mactaggart: There is a team approach. On work force modernisation, I accept my hon. Friend's point that civilians could take over some roles that are currently undertaken by police officers. We have made substantial improvements in civilianisation, but we should not reduce the value of CSOs, who have a special relationship with the neighbourhoods that they serve.

NHS Funding (Cornwall)

4 pm

Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): I welcome the opportunity to have this debate and I appreciate the fact that the Minister met my colleagues and me earlier this year to discuss some of the issues. There are at least two areas on which we certainly agree, and one on which I hope to be able to persuade the Minister to agree with me.

The first area on which we agree is that there are outstanding staff in the national health service, not least in Cornwall. They do an extremely good job in conditions that have traditionally been difficult, and that work is appreciated both across parties and across Cornwall. I get a lot of letters from people expressing their appreciation for the work of staff, particularly at Royal Cornwall hospital, and their concerns about the pressures under which staff work. The second area on which the Minister and I agree, is the Government decision, since the last general election, to raise taxes to increase investment in the NHS. The Liberal Democrats argued for that, so we welcome it and acknowledge that investment in the NHS has increased as a result. It is important to put that on the record; otherwise it might sound as though I do not acknowledge that when I voice my concerns.

The area on which I wish to concentrate—I informed the Minister's office of this in advance—is the concern in Cornwall and Devon about two coming changes in the way in which the Government propose to fund the NHS in future. They are, first, the combination of changes to the market forces factor that have been introduced over the past couple of years and, secondly, the implications for formal NHS funding for the future, particularly once it is formalised into the new tariff system, if it is done in the way that is currently planned.

The market forces factor has been in place for many years. It dates back to 1976. The great majority of its purpose is to adjust funding to allow for the realities of differing local costs in delivering health services in different parts of the country. Some 70 per cent. of it relates to an adjustment to take into account local wage rates, but that adjustment has, until recently, been modified in two respects. First, there was a dampening, so that areas of high wages did not get the full implied benefit in extra funding, and areas of low wages did not get the full implied disbenefit, in recognition of the fact that people in the NHS operate on national pay scales, so, although there may some link to local earnings outside the NHS, it is far from a complete one.

Secondly, and perhaps more significantly from our point of view as MPs representing the poorest county in England, the lowest 47 of the 117 wage zones based around counties, unitary authorities and metropolitan authority areas counted as one block, so, as the poorest, Cornwall was, in effect, raised 47 places in the assessment, the result of which was that the notional funding impact on the NHS in Cornwall was much less than it would have been had there been a direct link to local wages outside the NHS. Although everyone might have argued about it, no one disagreed with the fundamental principle that there should be adjustments to reflect local costs. However, I am not aware of anyone arguing that the NHS costs should directly reflect local wage rates.

Under the old system, the Royal Cornwall Hospitals NHS trust was assumed to be able to operate at 4 per cent. below the national average in funding terms—indeed, it was regarded as efficient because it was operating slightly more cost-efficiently than that. However, a year or so ago, a new system was introduced in relation to the market forces factor. That system introduced a direct 1:1 ratio in respect local wages, with no dampening for low or high-wage areas and, perhaps even more significantly, taking into account all 117 wage zones. In effect, Cornwall dropped 47 places and then got no help in acknowledgement of the fact that the impact of those low wages would not directly transfer into NHS costs.

The result of the introduction of that new system was a huge increase in the range between the highest and the lowest, with the Royal Cornwall Hospitals NHS trust, for example, which is in the lowest-pay county, being at minus 12 per cent. of the level at which it could notionally operate compared with national average funding needs, and the highest hospital in London being at plus 28 per cent. That is a full 40 per cent. range in the levels of costs at which hospitals were assumed to operate, despite the fact that they continued to work on the basis of national pay scales. That change in reference costs meant that, in one year, the RCHT moved from being patted on the back for being relatively efficient against the reference costs, to being told that it was performing very badly, despite the fact that its actual costs had not changed at all.

The basis of the change is questionable. It is hard to see how it can be assumed that the difficulties of recruitment and retention in high-wage areas and the costs of extra agency nurses, and the ease of recruitment and retention in low-wage areas because of the NHS being relatively well paid compared with those outside, could lead to the costs in the NHS being directly related to average wages. It would be a bit of a coincidence if there were a 1:1 link. It is hard to see how there could be.

When I asked where the notional link came from, the first answer that I received was that it was based on research data from Warwick university. However, the university applies only the wage data; it has not done any research that indicates what effect that has on NHS costs. I then asked who had done such research. However, as far as I can determine, there is no independent academic research that verifies the link, nor has there been any internal, Department of Health research that verifies it. It seems to be no more than a theory.

That theory would not matter too much, if it did not relate to the funding that our hospitals will receive in future. However, with the introduction of the system of tariffs, funding will be adjusted over time—it will not happen overnight—to bring the amount that hospitals get for each operation in line with the tariff, and it seems that the tariff is to be directly in line with the notional link between wages outside the NHS and inside it, despite the fact that in my area, we have the lowest wages in the UK outside the NHS, whereas inside the NHS we operate on national pay scales.

As that system is brought in, other areas will receive funding increases, but we will not share equally in the increase, because the aim is to bring the tariff into line with the idea that hospitals' costs are linked to local wages. Cornwall's will then fall gradually to become the worst-funded health service in the UK because, outside the NHS, we have the lowest wages anywhere in the country, and Devon will not be far behind us. The new system assumes a direct 1:1 link between local wages and NHS costs despite national NHS pay scales. The full impact will be a downward adjustment of Devon and Cornwall funding of £102.3 million in 2003–04. As I said at the start, I am not saying that there should be no adjustment to take account of local costs, but it is hard to understand why it is believed that there should be a direct link with our very low local wage levels.

Ms Candy Atherton (Falmouth and Camborne) (Lab): I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's argument and have been following it carefully. What does he think the adjustment should be?

Matthew Taylor: Since 1976, when the last detailed academic research took place, we have operated on the system that I described, which would result in a much smaller adjustment. That is what happened before. In those circumstances, the RCHT was operating at lower costs than expected; now, it is argued that its costs are higher than expected, but the difference for the trust is the difference in funding from a 4 per cent. negative to a 12 per cent. negative compared with the national average. I would certainly prefer the old system—I might argue that even that was ungenerous, given the other costs of operating in a wide geographic dispersed area, the cost of tourism, and so on.

The question for the Minister is why the Government have decided to change from a system that existed until a couple of years ago at the very moment that they are introducing a tariff system that will have a maximum impact on our hospitals. I hope that the hon. Lady will join the Liberal Democrats, who are opposing what, if implemented, will be a huge smash-and-grab raid on Cornwall NHS funding.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): Is my hon. Friend aware that the movement towards greater dependence on the market forces factor contradicts the outcome of a meeting that I had with the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), in June this year? He acknowledged that Cornwall's NHS funding was below national averages and that in the review of formula the intention was to bring Cornwall's funding closer to national parity, because he thought that Cornwall was being underfunded. My hon. Friend seems to contradict what the Minister assured me back in June.

Matthew Taylor: The Government have some history of that, because when the former Secretary of State for Health, the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), intervened to keep the cottage hospitals open, he promised that we would get a review of funding that would result in increased funding. He did so precisely because he accepted that the problem in maintaining hospital services in the county was caused by fair money not being made available. However, he was replaced and we heard no more about the change. We now face radical change in the opposite direction, which will mean that Cornwall's NHS will get the worst funding in the country under the Labour Government, because we have the lowest wages outside the NHS. To be frank, that is hard for people to understand and accept. It is particularly hard to accept from a Labour Government who, in many other Departments, are trying their best to improve the situation in Cornwall and to put in increased investment precisely because of our poverty.

In Education questions the other day, I asked the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg), whether there were plans to introduce the same crazy system in education, where there is a broad area cost adjustment, and therefore more money for high-wage areas than for the rest of the country, but nothing that ties funding directly to local wages. He ruled it out. It is hard to see why it does not apply in education, but does apply in the NHS. That shows a lack of joined-up government—at least I hope that that is the explanation; if not, the implication is that we will see the same trend in police funding, education funding and local government funding. It is hard to see why the Government would not do that if they believed that it was right for the NHS.

The crucial point is that the final decisions have not been made. The Government have said that they will apply a market forces factor and that the principle of that is not open for negotiation. As I have said, we are not arguing that it should not apply. It has for many years been accepted in broad terms across the parties that some kind of adjustment needs to be made. The issues still up for decision are how great the impact will be on individual trusts and whether it will be fair to individual trusts, which I take to mean that the link to very small-scale changes in wages will go all the way through the system so that Cornwall will get the least help of any area. I hope that I can persuade the Minister to go to her colleagues and argue that that cannot possibly be right.

I have some specific questions for the Minister, of which I have notified her. First, I would like an answer to my question about the academic research underpinning the theory. I cannot establish that there is any. If the Minister says that there is, I hope that she will place it in the House of Commons Library so that hon. Members can see it—after all, Cornwall is not the only area affected by such issues, even if it is the worst affected. Secondly, if we are going to base figures on local wage rates, even if only partially, what is the date of the pay survey currently being used and how often will it be updated? Wages can change rapidly, and the anecdotal evidence suggests that they are changing rapidly in Cornwall; public sector employers such as the county council and the hospitals used to find it easy to recruit administrative staff, for example, on relatively low local government and NHS pay grades, but they are now finding it very difficult to recruit or retain staff because private sector salaries are rising. That is a sign of the success of policies such as objective 1 funding in improving the economy, but it suggests that if out-of-date figures are adopted, the results will be very unfair.

I understand that Devon and Cornwall will be the areas worst hit by the change. That would be quite out of line with the effects in most areas. Can the Minister confirm that? When will the final decision on tariffs be taken? My hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall

[Matthew Taylor]

(Mr. Tyler) wrote to request a meeting through the Secretary of State for Health with one of the departmental team, and we would still appreciate such a meeting. Although I would be grateful to hear from the Minister what was said, we would like to talk the matter through in detail before a final decision is taken.

To be blunt, it is extremely unfair of the Government, and wrong in principle, to assume that there is a direct link between local wages in the poorest parts of the country and the ability to deliver health services in an NHS that still operates on national pay scales. I hope that the Minister can see that, and that although she may not be able to give a final verdict on the decision, she will agree to take the issue back to her colleagues.

4.17 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) on securing the debate. He and other hon. Members with constituencies in the south-west peninsula have raised the topic in the House on several occasions. Before I speak to the specific issues, I thank the hon. Gentleman for drawing attention to the very good work that is being done by NHS staff throughout the peninsula and the fact that they are delivering good-quality services. I join him in paying tribute to all the staff, who are dedicated and committed to the process. Ministers from the Department of Health spent a day in the area recently; unfortunately, due to parliamentary business, I could not go, but I know that my colleagues were most impressed by the range of projects and facilities that have been developed across the peninsula. They saw for themselves the commitment of NHS staff in the area.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for acknowledging the Government's increased spending in the NHS. He described concerns about funding, but between 2003 and 2008, in addition to the increased expenditure in the NHS, it will be improved even further, by about £36 billion. That means that NHS organisations in the south-west peninsula are receiving record funding increases. Altogether, primary care trusts in the peninsula will receive a cash increase of nearly £390 million over the three-year period. The three PCTs in Cornwall will receive an increase in funding of more than £125 million—a cash increase of 30 per cent. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman agrees that funding has increased that that it reaching the local level. Some real changes are resulting: waiting times are falling; patients with suspected cancer are seen by a specialist very quickly; 96 per cent. of patients are in and out of accident and emergency within four hours; and new buildings and new facilities are coming on stream .

The hon. Gentleman touched on some of the problems that the area faces in achieving financial balance. Obviously, I am sure that all hon. Members agree that the annual expenditure of the NHS must remain within the resources allocated by Parliament. NHS organisations, including those in Cornwall, receive a fair share of resources and have a corresponding responsibility to manage them effectively. If they do not do that and we have to wipe the slate clean in one area, the money has to come from another area within the NHS.

That is not to say that I do not recognise some of the challenges facing the south-west peninsula. The strategic health authority and the Department's recovery and support unit are working closely: the unit meets the SHA monthly to discuss its progress against key requirements and performance targets. Following representations from local Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton), about the problems sorting out the deficit within the one-year target that was set, we advised the South West Peninsula SHA that we would allow it a maximum of two years to repay the debt and return to recurrent financial balance. That means that the SHA as a whole is working to a maximum deficit control of £15 million for the current year, but must deliver recurrent balance by the end of next year. The latest information from the SHA shows that it is working toward delivery of that control total. Regular meetings take place and we are giving all the central support that we can.

In the past, the weighted capitation formula was criticised for failing to get health services to the areas of greatest health need. We therefore undertook a wide-ranging review of the formula before the latest allocations round. The new formula provides a better measure of health need in all areas. In calculating health needs in rural areas, it takes account of the effects of access, transport and poverty. It also uses better measures of deprivation, which are capable of being updated regularly.

I turn now to the concerns that the hon. Gentleman raised about the workings of the market forces factor. Again, as he acknowledged, the market forces factor is not a new concept. All versions of the allocations formula in the past 20 years have had a market forces factor weighting to recognise the different costs of labour and land across the country. The need for that was identified by the resource allocation working party in 1976 in recognition of the fact that the costs of care may vary from place to place. The current approach has been in place since 1996 and is based on wage rates in the external labour market that are adjusted for occupation, so that they are on a like-for-like basis. They are not based on whether an area is poor or well off: for example, the more deprived areas in central London have some of the highest market forces factors.

There is substantial academic research to support the market forces factor. The current approach was adopted following a 1996 report by academics at the university of Warwick, which was reviewed in 2001. That research is in the public domain and a link was placed on the Department of Health website when the reports were published. However, if the Library does not have copies of the report, I undertake to ensure that it is given them.

Matthew Taylor: I appreciate that, but will the Minister confirm, first, that the full 1:1 link has been made in assessments of local expenditure only in the last couple of years, and that only when the tariff system is introduced will the full impact on the moneys received be seen? Secondly, can she confirm that the Warwick work is an analysis of the distribution of pay on the basis that she described, not an analysis of the way in which that has an impact on NHS costs? The latter is purely a theory, not something that is backed up by academic research.

Ms Winterton: Two changes were made to the market forces factor for the last allocations, which were based on recommendations made by the advisory committee on resource allocation. The 1:1 factor and payment by results will not have an impact on how much funding is directed into an area by the market forces factor, because that is already used as a mechanism to set the general allocations for PCTs.

To answer the hon. Gentleman's question about where the latest evidence comes from, it is based on the last three years of the new earnings survey, so for the 2003–04 to 2005–06 allocations the relevant years are 1999, 2000 and 2001. The hon. Gentleman asked when the data would be updated. I can confirm that we will do that as and when we need to. As I said, we have received advice and recommendations from the advisory committee for the forthcoming allocations round. Although the hon. Gentleman would like us to confirm today what those allocations are, I am afraid that that announcement will have to wait.

I end by saying that I would be more than happy to meet hon. Members from Cornwall and, I hope, discuss even more of the issues that have been raised today. NHS resources are increasing, but there are financial challenges. My Department is working closely with the SHA and others to ensure both that the difficulties being faced do not cause problems for services, and that financial balance is achieved in the local health economy.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Four o'clock.

Medicines and Healthcare Products Regulatory Agency

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Margaret Moran.]

9.30 am

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): First, may I thank you, Mr. Taylor, for chairing the sitting? It is the first time that we have crossed paths like this, and I welcome the chance to discuss such a subject with you in the Chair. Secondly, although we are few this morning, that does not reflect on the importance of the issue, and I hope that that fact will come out during the debate.

The Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency—MHRA for short, although not many people know what the acronym stands for—is an executive agency of the Department of Health with trading fund status. It replaced or merged with the Medical Devices Agency, or MDA, and the Medicines Control Agency, or MCA, on 1 April 2003.

The MHRA's aims are to ensure that medicines for human use, sold or supplied in the United Kingdom, are of an acceptable standard of safety, quality and efficacy; to ensure that medical devices meet appropriate standards of safety, quality and performance; and to promote the safe use of medicines and devices. That is a sterling task. Its stated objectives are to make a major and effective contribution to public health, to provide authoritative and accessible information, to influence international regulation, to support industry and scientific innovation, to operate a successful and fully integrated business, and to minimise the cost of regulation.

The agency's many activities include overseeing those notified bodies that audit device manufacturers, regulating clinical trials of medicines and medical devices, and promoting good practice in the safe use of medicines and devices. Those are some of its functions.

My interest in this area stems from a visit I made to the MHRA during the summer. As a result of that meeting, I felt that not enough people were aware of its work, or of how medicines are regulated. Not enough is being made of its work on public health policy and it could have a far more extensive public profile. I am concerned about the bad press it has attracted recently, which is the result of underlying problems in the organisation and how it functions. Those problems must be addressed before an increasingly bad media reputation damages its future credibility. In short, the agency could be a disaster waiting to happen.

There is nothing more damaging to public trust than a regulatory system that is seen to have no clout, or that seems unwilling to use its power effectively. As the chief executive of the MHRA recently told the Health Committee,

"our prime responsibility is to ensure we protect public health".

With that stated priority, and with a forthcoming public health White Paper, it seems timely to take a look at one of the major agencies charged with safeguarding it.

As I said, I decided to raise the issue in Parliament following a visit to the MHRA to see how it works and what it does. I was enthused by the resources and data that its staff had at their fingertips, but thought that much more needed to be made of it. My concern is primarily to raise the profile of the agency and to see it impact more effectively on public health policy.

I have not been impressed by the agency's communication skills since I secured today's debate. Given its recent bad press over issues such as Seroxat and the Chiron flu vaccine, I would have expected it to take the chance to come forward with some positive messages. However, it sent me a briefing that left me with the impression that it is not interested in putting its name out into the world, or simply that it does not know how to do so.

The agency points out in its briefing that it has just appointed a director of communications—a 21st century activity, and I would not argue with the need for it. I hope that the appointment is not merely cosmetic and that it is backed up by a well thought through communications strategy that can help to build public confidence and improve the flow and exchange of information. That is vital, given the growing public perception that the workings of the drugs industry and its regulators are clouded in secrecy and governed by behind-the-scenes manipulation—a well-nurtured view in communities across the country. It is also vital given that the MHRA is the only regulatory agency that is fully industry funded.

It is a difficult task to convince people that a regulator entirely funded by the industry it regulates is completely impartial. That is why transparency should be at the heart of its agenda. The MHRA is gaining a reputation for not giving out information. It suspended Chiron's licence at the factory at Speke in Liverpool because of concerns about a bacterial contamination blocking half the United States' vaccine supply—48 million doses and 2 million United Kingdom doses. It was alleged in The Times that that had happened and that inspectors had been aware of potential problems for some time, but had done nothing about it.

Let me put the matter straight: I do not believe anything much that I read in the press, but I have not read any robust replies to the accusations. On 4 October, The Guardian revealed that the relationship between the industry through its organisation, the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry, and the regulator might be too close, with evidence of a joint lobbying campaign in Europe, a blueprint by industry for how the MHRA should be run and higher board level representation. Most notoriously, there has been a continuing controversy surrounding the drug Seroxat, the alleged withholding of clinical trial information by GlaxoSmithKline and questionable analysis of the data by the MHRA, as exposed and documented by "Panorama".

Most recently, claims of increased suicide risk in young adults led the European Agency for the Evaluation of Medicinal Products, which licences drugs for use in the European Union, to recommend that Seroxat be prescribed with extra caution for 18 to

[Dr. Ian Gibson]

29-year-olds whose treatment should be monitored closely. The MHRA endorsed those findings, but has dragged its feet over issuing the necessary warnings and information to GPs and the public.

It is time for the culture of secrecy to be dealt with. The legal basis for the giving and withholding of information by the MHRA will change with the implementation of the Freedom of Information Act 2000, but the damage done by the public believing that they have been lied to or defrauded is extremely difficult to repair. The workings of the agency need to be reviewed thoroughly. There should be more lay involvement on the committees, openly published minutes and a greater engagement with the public.

I should acknowledge that there is lay representation on the Committee on Safety of Medicines, which advises the MHRA and runs the yellow card scheme for reporting suspected adverse drug reactions, in which most GPs are involved. I have examined the system and there are piles of yellow cards. The Government have just announced direct reporting by consumers, but, as Mind has stated,

"consumer representation and the championing of consumer rights is not built into the MHRA's structures and processes".

There is a legal requirement to protect genuinely sensitive market information, but sharing information as openly as possible is of optimum importance. People should be able to find out easily what the organisation does, readily access its services and find out what decisions it is taking and how it is taking them. It seems that the MHRA adopts a restrictive approach to sharing information. As the 2003 National Audit Office report on the MCA pointed out, its public profile is weak compared with that of the Food and Drug Administration in the United States of America. That limits its ability to communicate safety messages to the public and engage with them as a source of information on the effects of medicines.

The exemplary model of best practice in this country is the Food Standards Agency, which states on its website that its aims are putting the consumer first, being open and accessible, and being an independent voice. It holds its board meetings and key committee meetings in public, which it advertises well in advance. The independence of the agency is reinforced by its arm's-length relationship with the Government. The FSA website states:

"Although the FSA is a Government agency, it works at 'arm's length' from Government because it doesn't report to a specific minister and is free to publish any advice it issues."

Therefore, I am inclined to support Mind on that issue. It calls for a drug regulatory system that puts consumer safety before commercial pressure and cost. Such a system would require agency access to all trial results, which should be put in the domain of researchers and reviewers and, once a drug is licensed, made available to all.

There should also be a well-supported consumer committee and consumer representation on other MHRA committees. Also, membership and operations should be transparent and accountable. People should have no personal—or even non-personal—interest in the industry that they are reviewing and regulating. The information on which decisions are based should be made available in suitable form.

Such a drug regulatory system should have sufficient legal powers to ensure access to all drug trial information and adequate funding to verify the accuracy of that information. It may need enhanced legal powers to obtain the information it needs from companies and better funding to ensure it has the resources to use the information fully, act promptly on it and publicise any safety messages effectively. Trial data should be provided as soon as they are available. Finally, the system should give consumer experience of drugs comparable weighting to information from drug trials.

I am encouraged by initiatives such as the extension of the yellow card system to include direct reporting of adverse effects by patients and the new paediatric medicines initiative, but we probably need an independent inquiry on the workings of the MHRA. That is a priority. I do not in any way want to suggest anything about individuals, but I and others have looked at the records of heads of enforcement who had long careers with GlaxoSmithKline. There is also a head of licensing who held a major post with that firm. We need to ensure that the workings of the agency are investigated externally as independently as possible.

I want to discuss a few further issues related to the MHRA's remit. The greater emphasis, in terms of discussing its work, seems to be on the medicines side; the medical devices side has been somewhat sidelined since the merger and may well have suffered from it. The MDA was once a leading organisation in Europe, but a senior person has just left it and there is no independence in that area. There is a problem as regards the two arms coming together and both parts having equal weight. It would be interesting to know why there is no head of devices services and diagnostics, and what the agency's intentions are in that regard.

I want to talk briefly about drug reclassification, because it is part of the choice agenda. The Government, in their December 2003 report "Building on the Best: Choice, Responsiveness and Equity in the NHS", make a commitment to doubling the rate of medicine reclassifications from five to 10 a year, which is welcome. However, that should be driven by strong evidence of efficacy and safety, and should not be seen to boost industry's profits in any way—that is a problem—or to shift the cost of treatment from the NHS to the consumer. The process needs to take into account possible consumer detriment resulting from reclassification. I would like to hear something about that from the Minister.

I have looked at some advertising overseen by the agency. In particular, I have a personal interest, as do many others here, in the drug simvastatin, a statin, which has been available in a 10 mg dose over the counter since July 2004.

I do not believe that clinical trials have been conducted in over-the-counter conditions on people deemed to be at moderate risk of coronary heart disease. The public are being subjected to a world-first experiment, as there is no evidence on the safety and efficacy of a 10 mg daily dose of simvastatin for the target group under those OTC conditions. The public need to be alerted to that, although I know that general practitioners have already been alerted. There needs to be a real opening up.

In relation to the drug, we have heard about the issues to do with drinking grapefruit juice and the likelihood of severe muscular damage and so on. Again, although those claims have appeared in one or two newspapers, it is not generally known whether there is good solid evidence for them. Let us hear from the organisation.

Decisions should be based on adequate data and data on efficacy, and nothing should be reclassified if there is doubt about the safety of the target population at the dose specified. It is essential that we have a robust, transparent, impartial regulatory process.

Perhaps we should think seriously about having an inquiry into this organisation. Is it, for example, best equipped to vet pharmaceutical advertising? There are some wonderful advertisements about heart conditions, which I find vague. I know that the words have been changed over the past few months, after various protests but, again, it is the public who see those adverts and think, "I'll have that drug." Sometimes the evidence changes in midstream, or there is no evidence. We need to know that there is good solid evidence and where we can get it.

Are the organisation's aims and objectives beyond its means and is it being pulled in too many directions to be effective? Where do its priorities lie in practice? Is it serving commercial interests and arbitrary targets, such as in reclassification, at the cost of public benefit? We need to know. Do the public even know what it is and what it does, or is that brought to their notice only when things go wrong? In fact, do many MPs know about it?

9.46 am

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on securing this important debate. I question one thing that he said. When he referred to the credibility of the organisation, one was tempted to ask, "What credibility?" Recent events have proven that it is not a watchdog; it is a pussycat that purrs in front of the pharmaceutical industry and does what it is told. It has an incestuous relationship with the big pharmas and has a close association with the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry. It has a disgraceful recent record. We can look with gratitude to the work not of the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency in protecting the public, but of people such as Sarah Boseley of The Guardian for her exposé of the organisation, the television programme "Panorama" and Richard Brook of Mind, who courageously resigned from the MHRA in disgust at its activities.

It is a matter of enormous importance that, in recent history, the regulator is not protecting the 25,000 people who suffered heart attacks and the 7,000 who died from taking a painkilling drug for arthritics that was withdrawn by Merck Sharpe and Dohme in September after being promoted by the regulator and by organisations that exist to defend arthritics. I had a conversation the day that it was withdrawn with one of the executives of Arthritis Care—a splendid organisation that I have worked with for many years. It has done pioneering work for people with arthritis, particularly in promoting the real beneficial therapies for arthritis, such as exercise, losing weight and displacing the pain through coping mechanisms: all the non-drug treatments. On the day that Vioxx was withdrawn, it was interesting that those who should have been defending the patients suggested that those who were taking the drug should not panic. I should have thought that panic was the appropriate response when someone was taking a drug that was likely to kill them.

The organisations advised people not to panic, but to find another drug. Over my lifetime, 50 per cent. of medicinal drugs have had nasty, unpleasant side effects, and the other 50 per cent. have nasty side effects that are yet to be discovered. That has been the continuous history of medicinal drugs over the years. Protection did not come from the MHRA.

Neither did protection come with Seroxat. When business collapsed in the House on one day in March, we had an hour and a half to discuss Seroxat at some length. The contribution of the regulatory body has been derisory. Given the lamentable performance of its group when it gave evidence to the Health Committee, I hope that the Committee will produce a hard-hitting report that will finally put the last nail in the coffin. I do not think that the body can be reformed. We have to set up another. We cannot have the public exposed to the greed of the pharmaceutical industry any longer without protection.

That is not a criticism. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North is a distinguished scientist. There is no criticism of the science or the quality of the miraculous discoveries that have been made over the past 200 years in pharmaceuticals. However, there is serious criticism of the marketing of those products, which has been based on obtaining maximum profits, with only a cursory glance at safety.

Seroxat is a licensed drug that is proved to have significant side effects and to induce suicide, particularly in young people. Data have been held on this since 1990. We now know that the MHRA reviewed it five times and always gave it a clean bill of health. However, that organisation, which treats itself seriously and is proud of its qualifications, held information on Seroxat for 10 years, which suggested that dosages above 20 mg were unnecessary and possibly dangerous. Consequently many people may have been wrongly prescribed. It did not do anything about that until 2003.

We believe that 17,000 people were prescribed doses above that level and advice was given very late in the day to doctors to remind them of the recommended dose. It was not the official watchdog that caused something to be done; it was publicity by energetic, intelligent, resourceful journalists—people we often criticise. The real watchdogs are those journalists and organisations such as Mind. It is not an insignificant consideration that Mind does not take a penny in support or sponsorship from the pharmaceutical industry.

It is interesting that Arthritis Care, which promoted Vioxx over the years, states on its website:

> "The redevelopment of Arthritis Care's website has been made possible with support from Merck Sharp & Dohme Limited."

The Depression Alliance Cymru takes very little money from the drugs industry, but the Depression Alliance nationally takes 80 per cent. of its funds from the pharmaceutical industry. As far as I can see its mouth has been bandaged against any criticism of any drug. I have never known it to criticise any drug at any time. That incestuous relationship is something else that the Health Committee is examining.

[Paul Flynn]

It is almost laughable to see the interests of the members of the MHRA. They will all tell us that they are professional people and that they can be regulators at one moment and servants of the pharmaceutical industry the next. However, it is difficult to believe that they can carry out their jobs independently when we look at the relationship of the committee and its sub-committees with the pharmaceutical industry. In the 2002 annual report, 17 of the 34 members of the main committee declare personal interests, which include receiving travel expenses and fees, employment as consultants and the ownership of shares. Fourteen declare non-personal interests such as the receipt of research grants.

All the main pharmaceutical companies are represented, from AstraZeneca to Roche and the trend continues through the sub-committees of the committee on the safety of medicine. The biological sub-committee has 11 members: 10 of them declare personal interests and three declare non-personal interests. These interests run to several pages. I do not want to weary the Chamber, but the chemistry, pharmacy and standards committee has 14 members, seven declaring personal interests and nine declaring non-personal interests. The pharmacovigilance committee has eight members: two have declared personal interests and six have declared non-personal interests.

The whole body is part of the pharmaceutical industry, an industry that has a dreadful record of overselling its products, of disease mongering, of trying to encourage a therapy culture in society by convincing every human being that for every moment of pain, boredom, distress, anxiety they feel in their life, they should take a pill of some kind. The whole myth has been built up, not to help humanity, but to serve the greedy interests of the pharmaceutical industry. Many of the marvellous advances that have been made have been damaged by the overselling of many dangerous and damaging drugs. The problems that we now have with selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors reveal how the system has not worked in the interests of patients and how the agency has been colonised by the drugs companies, whose commercial interests have been protected as a result.

The agency has shown itself not to be worthy of our respect or of continuing in its role. At best, it is ramshackle and ineffective; at worst, it could be corrupt. We cannot give examples by which we can say, "Things haven't happened." I do not think that my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North mentioned any names, although I am sorely tempted to. In a newspaper article on 4 October, Sarah Boseley mentioned the name of someone who was in the extraordinary position of advising and serving a drugs company while working for the agency at the same time. That cannot be right. However, the issue would have remained unnoticed had it not been brought to our attention by that newspaper.

Almost everyone in the country relies on medicinal drugs at some time in their lives, and we deserve protection. We deserve a body whose independence is beyond question, but we do not have one now. We have been badly served by the MHRA.

9.56 am

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I, too, welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Taylor. This is the first time that I have spoken in Westminster Hall under your chairmanship.

I thank the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) and congratulate him on securing the debate. He has given us the opportunity to explore an important watchdog regulatory function, which perhaps does not get enough attention in the House, although one or two hon. Members question the agency closely about its work. It is useful to have this debate and to have quite a bit of time to go over the details.

I want to pick up on several points. In opening the debate, the hon. Gentleman made some powerful points about the remit and work of the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency. He posed important questions, which the Minister needs to answer, about the degree of transparency and the nature of the engagement between the regulatory agency and the industry, and between the agency, consumers and their interests. We need to ensure that the agency is not only seen to be acting independently, but that it is acting independently. I shall return to that point in a minute.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that there needs to be an inquiry. It is worth noting that the Health Committee is conducting an inquiry into the pharmaceutical industry—it is attempting to paint a very large canvas. I have read the report of some of the evidence sessions that it has conducted so far, and it is clearly looking at the agency's role. Only time will tell whether it concludes that it or someone else needs to do more work and whether it makes specific recommendations about changing the agency and tipping the balance somewhat in favour of the consumer. However, some of the strong points that have been made in the debate lead me to the view that we need to look again at the balance of interests in the agency.

We need to ensure that the public interest is seen to be properly reflected in how medicines are made available to the public. In particular, we need to ensure that the industry is properly involved in the process. We need to consider the large sums that it invests in the development of drugs and in trials and examine how information about such issues is made available in a timely fashion to the regulatory bodies. Furthermore, I take the hon. Gentleman's point that we need to think about how consumer interests are represented. In answers to parliamentary questions, Ministers have rightly made the point that lay people have been involved in the agency since its inception. However, it is important to be clear about how much the lay and consumer interest permeates the whole organisation and its culture. That is the question being asked today and it would be useful to get a response from the Minister.

Reference has already been made to Richard Brook, who served on the Committee on Safety of Medicines working group on SSRIs—selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors. In his evidence, he said:

> "The last point I would make, which I think is a very relevant point, is it takes 40 days for the MHRA on average, in the last annual report, to license a drug and yet it takes two years to review antidepressants; and so there is something about the balance that Andrew was talking about that raises a real issue. If it takes eight weeks to get a drug into the market, why does it take two years to sort out its safety afterwards?"

Some may question whether it really takes eight weeks, but it is relevant to note that Risperidone, a strong anti-psychotic drug that caused concern earlier this year—the hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) has taken a close interest in anti-psychotic medication—was being used unlicensed in the UK to treat older people with dementia. The relevant Government watchdog received information in 2002 that the risk of strokes was three times higher among older people prescribed this medication, but it finally warned that the drug should not be used only on 9 March 2004. Patients in Canada were warned of the risk of strokes two years earlier. In an answer I received from the Department of Health on 24 March, it was said that:

> "The MHRA is represented on the CPMP and its Pharmacovigilance Working Party (PhVWP), which meet monthly and provide a regular forum for discussion of drug safety issues within the European Union. An electronic communication system allows rapid exchange of drug safety information between member states."—[Official Report, 24 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 825W.]

The point is that mechanisms are supposed to be in place to allow our regulator to be aware at an early stage of concerns and of the weight to be attached to them. The pharmacovigilance working party is apparently in regular video conference contact with the US Food and Drug Administration yet it took two years for our agencies to come to a conclusion that had already been reached across the Atlantic in Canada and the United States, and to take the necessary protective measures. How many elderly people in care homes or elsewhere suffered strokes or great disability or even lost their lives as a result of being prescribed this drug?

Dr. Gibson: Why does the hon. Gentleman think that it takes two years? Where are the pressures?

Mr. Burstow: I am drawing attention to Richard Brook's contribution and the questions he asked about pressures. I was going to end with this point, but it is worth bringing it up now to respond to that question. Brook's argument, which the Minister must address, is that the organisation is risk averse and is constantly looking over its shoulder, fearful of being a victim of legal action or a challenge in the courts for acting peremptorily.

In his evidence to the Select Committee on 14 October, Richard Brook said:

> "Every time we made difficult decisions, there was always this issue of: 'We have got to be very careful because the pharmaceutical companies will sue us if we get this wrong; they will take us to court and take us through legal processes'; and it was very clear that the MRHA officials were very mindful of the whole time of that dimension, to my view, more than the dimension of public health and public responsibility of the public."

He continued that

> "it is a very difficult thing to be confident about the transparency of the regulator when so many people have got long histories, career histories, in the pharmaceutical company."

That pressure, real or imagined, is clearly having an effect—certainly in Mr. Brook's view.

Dr. Gibson: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that he could never foresee a situation arising in which John Humphrys faced up to Sir John Krebs of the Food Standards Agency and asked, "Come on, have the sheep got BSE?" and Krebs said, "Quite honestly, I really don't know."? Is the Committee on Safety of Medicines so frightened to tell the truth about the accuracy of the data or does it dodge giving any messages at all? Has it ever appeared on Radio 4?

Mr. Burstow: I listen to Radio 4 quite a bit, but not enough to say whether the CSM has appeared on it. The hon. Gentleman's point about a communications director having only recently been appointed says a lot about the organisation's posture. Is it a public-facing organisation or is it an industry-facing organisation? Perhaps it urgently needs to take advantage of that appointment to ensure not only that it informs Members of its work more effectively, but that it makes the public more aware.

To come to my second point, the Government have indicated their willingness in principle for the patient—the consumer—to be much more directly involved in the reporting of adverse reactions, through the yellow card system or a parallel system. That has to be welcome. A number of those who submitted evidence to the Select Committee said that the best way to ensure that more information about adverse reactions was captured in the system would be to involve the person affected directly. The people concerned have the greatest vested interest in reporting, but they are outwith the system.

We know from parliamentary answers that more than 150 people a day are admitted to hospital because of bad reactions to medicine. Approximately 20,000 adverse drug reactions a year are reported to the MHRA and the CSM through the yellow card scheme, of which approximately 3 per cent. are suspected adverse drug reactions with a fatal outcome.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman is making an important point about communication with individual patients, but does he not also think that the organisation should liaise more closely with the user groups that have sprung up to draw attention to the SSRIs that my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West mentioned? For instance, the Seroxat group is keen for the new body to take cognisance of its troubles when it regulates new drugs.

Mr. Burstow: The organisation must be seen as genuinely even-handed in its treatment of all parties. It must be more permeable and open to engagement with consumer and interest groups of the kind that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. His point is fair and must be part of any review of how the new body works. That is something that I hope the Select Committee will consider carefully, especially given the recent experiences that the hon. Member for Newport, West described.

I was outlining some of the figures. There were 722 fatal suspected adverse drug reactions in 2003, the last year for which figures are available.

Paul Flynn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burstow: Let me finish the figures, then I will be happy to give way. Back in 1997, the figure was 446, so there has been a 62 per cent. increase in the number of reported adverse drug reactions with a fatal outcome. That is a significant increase. Adverse drug reactions make up 6 per cent. of hospital admissions, but they are, according to a study by researchers from the university of Liverpool in the British Medical Journal earlier this year, in most cases avoidable. Nearly 10 per cent. of adverse drug reactions were definitely avoidable through drug treatment procedure that is consistent with knowledge of good medicine practice, whereas nearly two thirds—63 per cent.—were possibly avoidable.

I recently asked a parliamentary question about what plans the Government had to introduce a system to use the yellow card system to learn about correct dosage and prescribing methods, particularly for children. The answer that I received said:

> "The yellow card scheme is not designed to enable lessons to be drawn about correct dosage or prescribing methods for medicines for children. There are no plans to introduce a system of learning in this context."—[Official Report, 3 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 319W.]

However, the research shows clearly that an awful lot of poor prescribing practice results in people being admitted to hospital. Surely the Government have an interest in reducing inappropriate admissions as a result of such prescribing practices. Will the Minister say whether the Government might still consider action on that?

Paul Flynn: I remind the hon. Gentleman of a previous Minister's answer to my question about the number of deaths from a particular drug. He might be pleased to know that the yellow card figure showed that the number of deaths went down last year from 62 to 48. However, the true figure obtained from coroners' courts showed that the number of deaths had risen from 580 to 640. The yellow card scheme has never given anything but a ludicrous underestimate—a snapshot—of the figures. The system has no credibility.

Mr. Burstow: I am not sure that it has no credibility. The hon. Gentleman is right that it is probably not used anything like as much as it should be, and that there is significant under-reporting. The question that I have to ask the Minister—I believe that the hon. Gentleman has also asked it—is how data collected from the system are analysed and used in the public interest, and who has access to them. The Government have said that they are carrying out a review about who might have access to that data and how and when they are used.

That data could and should be a valuable tool. Some 500,000 records are kept of adverse reactions over the years, which researchers should use much more effectively to obtain a much clearer picture of why there are adverse reactions. I accept the hon. Gentleman's point that often only what amounts to the tip of the iceberg is reported, but the data could be used far better, and I hope that the Minister will say where the Government have got to with the review and when they intend to publish its conclusion. I hope that the conclusion will be that the process will be far more transparent and open.

The hon. Member for Norwich, North referred to access to information, and I was struck by some of the comments made during the Select Committee's consideration of the matter about the difference between the attitude in this country to the control of information and access to it by the public and consumer groups, and the attitude across the Atlantic in the United States. The Federal Drugs Administration has a website that will put almost all this information into the public domain.

We can access the information on the FDA website, but we cannot see it on a website provided by our own regulatory agency. That is an anomalous position in a world that has the internet, which has no such boundaries. The public should be able to see our own agency providing the same sort of service to them. Will the Minister comment on that?

The problem of capturing only the tip of the iceberg needs to be addressed. The National Audit Office carried out research on this a few years ago and recommended that we need to move from a non-mandatory to a mandatory system of reporting. There is certainly a very powerful case to be made for that. France has a mandatory reporting system. When will the Government decide whether we should move away from the current voluntary arrangements?

The expansion in the number of people who can report—the inclusion of nurses and the plans to include patients—is welcome, but when will the reporting system become mandatory, given that GPs in particular say that one reason why they do not submit yellow cards is that it never comes to mind at the right time? They say that they are not sure what should be reported, that it takes too long to fill out the form, that it is not easy to find a yellow card when necessary, and that reporting generates too much extra work. Those are just some of the reasons that GPs give for not submitting their yellow cards. That cannot be an acceptable basis for a system that should be about giving clinicians information about what works and what is risky.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that these vital forms might not be filled out because what is really important is sidelined in the great welter of paperwork with which GPs now have to cope?

Mr. Burstow: The hon. Gentleman makes a very fair point about the ever-growing burden of form filling and paperwork on GPs and others, and about the consequences of the target and tick-box culture that drives that. That means that yellow cards are missed on the radar, which is another reason why they must be made mandatory to ensure that more information is captured.

Only 74 incidents were reported in the first year of the electronic yellow card system, which was introduced back in October 2002. It would be useful if the Minister could tell us what is being done to promote wider use of that service and to publicise it. That uptake is surprisingly low for what should be a much simpler way of providing information to the MHRA.

I want to conclude by mentioning the relationship between the MHRA and the pharmaceutical industry. At the beginning of the year Mr. Brooks said to The Guardian:

> "At present the MHRA listens far too closely to the concerns of major pharmaceutical companies and not nearly closely enough to people experiencing side effects from drugs that should be making them better, not worse."

His criticism came two months after he resigned from the MHRA experts group on selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors, claiming that it failed to protect patients from potentially harmful doses of the antidepressant Seroxat.

The debate today is about whether the agency, which is funded solely by the industry, provides the safeguards and reassurance that the public should have about the medicines being made available to them. The hon. Member for Newport, West described in very strong terms the concerns that those outside the agency have about its role. It might be characterised as a paper tiger, or a toothless tiger—he described it as a pussycat.

Whether it is a pussycat or a watchdog, there are serious concerns about the fact that two years are spent on some matters by an agency that can give a licence in 40 days; that will not necessarily carry public confidence. The example of the Food Standards Agency given by the hon. Member for Norwich, North is a good one. It has set a benchmark for credibility and confidence building that other Government agencies should perhaps be trying to reach. We need to maintain confidence so that the industry and the public will benefit and, as a result, society as a whole will benefit from medicines.

10.17 am

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Taylor. As is the case for other hon. Members, I think this is the first time I have done so. I congratulate the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on obtaining the debate. Although it is sparsely attended, this is one of the more memorable debates that I have attended here and I am sure that the Minister will take home some important material to reflect on.

I confess that, before doing my research for the debate, my knowledge of the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency was perhaps a little sketchy. Perhaps the sketchiness of my knowledge will shine through in my remarks.

Dr. Gibson: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he was a GP before he became a Member of Parliament?

Dr. Murrison: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, which rather underscores the one I was about to make—if I, as a shadow health spokesman and, indeed, an ex-GP, know little about the organisation in question, perhaps the general public know even less. That is dreadful, particularly when we compare it with knowledge of the equivalents on the continent and in America. The relevant bodies there are well known and well respected. Importantly, they are listened to.

I suspect that what is already emerging in our debate is the fact that the agency has very few friends. It appears not to be on particularly good terms with patients and the organisations that represent them. Indeed, it seems not to be on particularly good terms with the industry, despite the apparent over-representation of the industry on its board.

I am reluctant to lay into individuals, however. When organisations are being considered, I prefer to examine their structures and how they are constituted. The fault in that context lies with the Government, Ministers and, ultimately, Parliament. We need first to look to ourselves to discover why the organisation, which is apparently failing rather badly, is as it is and how we can either reform or replace it so that it can carry out its stated functions more effectively. I sincerely hope that after this debate, given the strength of feeling that has legitimately been expressed, the Minister will think about the organisation and how to improve it.

I want to focus on some structural problems that I believe have inhibited the agency from doing its job properly. The hon. Member for Norwich, North mentioned my background. My dealings with the MHRA and its predecessors chiefly involved the yellow card system. I was rather horrified to hear him describe seeing piles and piles of yellow cards when he visited the MHRA recently. What were those cards being used for? How was the information on them being collated and transformed by the agency into useful information that might inform any decisions or recommendations that it makes?

Under-reporting is a feature of our health care system. Indeed, the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), admitted in a recent parliamentary answer:

> "The number of reports received via the yellow card scheme does not directly equate to the number of people who suffer adverse reactions to drugs for a number of reasons including an unknown level of under-reporting."—[Official Report, 19 April 2004; Vol. 420, c. 222W.]

That is a gross understatement. A small minority of adverse reactions to medicinal products are reported through the yellow card system or in any other way. To be fair to the MHRA, if it is basing what it does on inadequate information input of that sort, it is hardly surprising that it is failing.

I am very concerned about Seroxat, which is the flagship product that has drawn attention to the MHRA in a negative way. There appears to have been a significant delay after concerns were initially expressed, which perhaps stem from the excess of suicidal behaviour among those taking the product over and above what one would expect from people on a placebo. Such a delay is unacceptable, which is what set alarm bells ringing in relation to the agency.

Paul Flynn: Does not a significant criticism of this body relate to its competence, because in its examinations of Seroxat it did not get into the raw data from the trials that took place? All the agency looked at, and all it had in its possession, were the conclusions. We now know that had the data been looked at, it would have been known that the firm, GlaxoSmithKline, suppressed information. The trials showed that the drug had no utility; it was no better than placebos. Furthermore, it increased suicidal tendencies in the young. This is a question not just of delay, but of whether this body is competent, given that it looked only at the conclusions, not the raw data.

Dr. Murrison: I am grateful for that intervention. I intend to raise the difficulty that we have with the publication of negative conclusions. I think that 38 per cent. of independent studies of medicines produce unfavourable conclusions, whereas only 5 per cent. of studies funded by pharmaceutical companies produce negative conclusions. That is published information. So, there is a problem with negative reporting. The Minister must think carefully about how we can encourage negative reports to appear in the literature and require pharmaceutical companies to publish all data, whether negative or positive, because clearly the pharmaceutical industry has an interest in suppressing information showing that its products have a negative or neutral effect. I suspect that some difficulties surrounding Seroxat revolve around that.

These problems do not stop with Seroxat, however, as 3,000 children in this country are on a product that is marketed here as Effexor. Again, that product can cause suicidal and aggressive behaviour. In that connection, we are worried about trialling the product specifically on children—an issue that others have raised—and the possibility of suppression of negative reporting. It is extremely important to realise that the medical press favours positive reports; it does not particularly like negative ones. However, if we are to get a true impression of whether a product has a positive effect that outweighs the negative effects, which I have to say most products have, it is vital that negative reports, as well as the positive ones, are in the public domain and accessible for those such as the MHRA, which, in a reformed state, one hopes would consider all the evidence available when making its recommendations to Ministers and others.

The system for reporting adverse effects stems from the 1960s and relates to thalidomide. At that time, GPs were very willing to report adverse effects and it was assumed that they would report them all fairly rigorously. That practice has fallen away dramatically and we need better surveillance methods to determine whether a product has adverse effects.

I am pleased that the yellow card system has been extended to other health care professionals, principally nurses, and that it is easier for patients to report adverse effects. I am interested in the use of NHS Direct in that connection and I hope that the Minister tells us the early results of that initiative, as they would be useful to know. I am doubtful that it will be particularly effective, given my experience of telephoning NHS Direct: I was kept on hold for 20 minutes. My strong suspicion is that most people who telephone the service, especially those who want to report minor adverse effects, would probably give up in half that time. Nevertheless, it would be interesting to know what part the Minister thinks NHS Direct can play in reporting adverse effects.

Dr. Andrew Herxheimer said recently in the International Journal of Risk and Safety in Medicine that the yellow card system is "chaotic and misconceived". I know from my own experience that that is the case. The fault lies with those who are tasked with reporting using the yellow card system. However, the paperwork and bureaucracy—the tick-box culture—among which practitioners now have to work do not help, because they dilute what is essential in reporting.

The yellow card system was set up a long time ago in a different environment, in the downdraft from the thalidomide scandal, and it has perhaps become less important in the minds of many practitioners. However, it is vital that it is brought to the fore. Making reporting mandatory may be a way ahead, but that would be difficult to police. The current system is not acceptable, although I do not entirely share the view expressed by the hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) that it is pretty useless.

Paul Flynn: I know of no academic researcher who takes any notice of the yellow card system. If people want data on the side effects of medicines, they go elsewhere for them. The system has never had any such reputation. The Library never quotes the yellow card system when asked for information. In the example I gave, not only did that system underestimate the number of deaths by 90 per cent., but it also gave the wrong trend.

Dr. Murrison: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that information, which perhaps accounts for the piles of yellow cards that the hon. Member for Norwich, North saw and the implication that they were sitting there unattended. I hope that that message does not go out to GPs. I have filled in yellow cards and if I thought that they were not being attended to, I would be even less likely to do anything about them. I suspect that they are filled in if there are severe adverse effects, but not if there are lesser ones.

I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Newport, West that the system is likely to be flawed, but I hope that it is not fatally flawed and that it flags up some serious side effects. I filled in the yellow cards when I was a GP; if I was being honest, I would have to say that I did so when there was a severe side effect, rather than something I was uncertain about.

That is important, especially in the context of side effects associated with the underlying condition, particularly when one is dealing with mental health, for example. Indeed, one side effect of Seroxat appears to be suicidal behaviour, but some would say that that is a feature of the underlying condition for which Seroxat is being prescribed. In those circumstances, one has to feel sympathy for the doctor, who is trying to disentangle what, on the balance of probabilities, is due to the drug and what is due to the underlying condition. I say in all candour that it is often very difficult to determine that.

The cases that I remember reporting using the yellow card system were reasonably barn-door. There were, for example, cases in which hyperkalemia—raised potassium levels—occurred in relation to a drug for which that was a reported known side effect, and in which there was no other particular reason for the patient to have a raised potassium level. In such cases, I suspect that the yellow card system is used reasonably well and in a way that might be effective and might prompt the MHRA, with all its faults, to take some note—providing the data are being collated. However, for the rest, I agree that if the system is to be useful it must be radically overhauled. We need to ensure that all practitioners are aware of it, have confidence in it and feel that the data they are submitting will be useful and used.

I am also concerned about the proliferation of agencies in the field. I wonder whether some problems that the MHRA experiences are related to confusion about the boundaries. We now have, in addition to the National Patient Safety Agency in the immediate area, the National Coordinating Centre for Health Technology Assessment, the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and the Committee on Safety of Medicines. I am confused about the boundaries between those various organisations. There are many different voices—that does not tend to be the case in other countries—and I wonder whether that dilutes the voice of the MHRA in performing its important function. Will the Minister comment on that?

I said earlier that the MHRA has few friends. The industry—particularly small-scale industry—seems not to be particularly impressed with it. It involves cost that does not apply on the continent. I have been contacted by someone in the field who works across the European Union. He says that in no other health economy is there quite such a burdensome system that applies particularly to small organisations and start-up organisations working out of universities and that that is causing a real problem for those who are trying to bring innovations online.

We need a rigorous way to regulate the industry—one of our tasks in this place is to ensure that public health is protected—but I worry that we have an organisation that is both burdensome to innovators and failing to protect the public adequately. I hope the Minister takes away the comments that have been made in the debate and has a serious look at the organisation.

10.33 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): I am pleased to answer the points raised in the debate and to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on raising the topic of the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency.

As patients and carers become increasingly aware of their own health care choices, it is important that the impact of the work of the UK regulator of medicines and medical devices is better known. Having access to information, in this case about medicines and devices, is at the heart of patient choice, which is a Government priority for the NHS.

In my opening remarks, I want to underline a number of key points about what the agency is, what it is responsible for and the impact that it has. Without doubt, products regulated by the agency have a major impact on all our lives. I will try to give hon. Members a sense of the scale of that impact. In 2001, nearly 600 million prescriptions were dispensed in the UK and some 700 million packages of non-prescription medicines were supplied. Those range from innovative products designed to treat major, life-threatening illnesses to generic versions of common painkillers. Devices ranging from walking aids and examination gloves to radiotherapy machines and resuscitators are used in our hospitals, care homes and, increasingly, in our homes. It is estimated that more than half the UK population has contact with a medical device in any one day.

The MHRA is an executive agency of the Department of Health, which employs some 750 people, and it has an annual budget of about £65 million. It was created on 1 April 2003 from the merger of the Medicines Control Agency and the Medical Devices Agency. Most of its staff are medical, scientific or technical, but the MHRA is also responsible for providing policy advice to Ministers on medicines and devices issues.

The merger was a logical step in the development of the two agencies. Hon. Members have not particularly touched on this, but the boundaries between medicines and devices are blurring: we already have many drug-device combination products such as drug-eluting stents on the market, and emerging technologies, such as nanotechnology and tissue engineering, will require a new approach to regulation. Ultimately, patients, users of medicines and medical devices, and health care professionals who rely on the safety advice of the agency should benefit most from the merger.

I will briefly explain what the agency does. To put it simply, medicines have to be authorised before they can be placed on the market in the UK or European Union. The regulator must be satisfied that the product meets set standards of safety, quality and efficacy. The MHRA also regulates the manufacture of pharmaceuticals, and ensures that rules governing the sale, labelling and advertising of medicinal products are followed. Crucially, it operates a system for the surveillance of products on the market, in which suspected adverse reactions are reported and stored on a database on which more than 500,000 reports have been collected over 40 years. That is the yellow card scheme to which my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North and other Members referred.

Devices are regulated quite differently in many respects. I have already mentioned the diversity of products; that diversity influences the way in which the sector is regulated. For most products, the system involves the monitoring of safety in use, rather than pre-authorisation, and is based on the CE mark, which is awarded by a notified body in one of the member states. The regulator audits the notified body to ensure that its decisions are correct.

Before I address the specific issues raised by hon. Members, I will briefly touch on the role of stakeholders. A body with such diverse functions has a wide range of stakeholders. First, of course, come members of the public, patients, clients of social services departments, carers, and all users of medicines and medical equipment, but stakeholders also include professionals in health and social services who need to act on the safety advice broadcast by the agency. Manufacturers of pharmaceuticals and medical devices also have a right to expect high standards of service from the agency.

I turn to the impact of the agency on public health and point out that it regulates products that are in common use. It is therefore of crucial importance. Protecting public health is at the heart of the regulation of devices and medicines. The yellow card scheme is the cornerstone of the UK monitoring scheme. The agency has recently reviewed its policy in that area, and is considering, on behalf of Ministers, ways of increasing access by researchers to the yellow card database.

Monitoring systems for devices, and the system of liaison officers set up in NHS trusts, ensure that any devices issues can be resolved through prompt action by the agency. Surveillance programmes have allowed the agency to lead the way in several high profile areas of drug and device safety to ensure that there is a consistent approach to important issues for public health.

Mr. Burstow: Will the Minister give way?

Miss Johnson: I will in a moment, but I have not addressed any of the points that have been raised. If the hon. Gentleman raised one such point, perhaps he will give me the chance to get to it.

The surveillance programmes include hormone replacement therapy, which has not been mentioned, anti-psychotics, which have the risk of stroke, and selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors, or SSRIs. I will come to those specific points.

The agency uses other resources to protect public health: another key database is the general practice research database, which holds anonymised clinical records supplied by GPs. The database, which has not been mentioned much in the debate, is used by the MHRA and internationally for regulatory pharmacovigilance decision making. The value of such a unique resource has been recognised by the United States Food and Drug Administration, which hon. Members have cited as an exemplar in such matters. The FDA is using the MHRA's database, by acquiring a five-year licence to use the data, to support its own drug safety monitoring programmes, which I hope brings a little doubt to the minds of hon. Members about some of the aspersions that they have cast in the direction of the agency.

Seroxat and selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors have benefited millions of people. I thought that the account of my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) rather neglected the benefits of medicines and drugs, although he made a passing reference to them, as well as the occasional risks and difficulties—some serious and some not so serious—that are experienced by people who take such medicine. Serious side effects are rare in the case of Seroxat and SSRIs. Seroxat has been used by more than 160 million people worldwide. Suicidal behaviour during treatment may be linked to illness and may not necessarily be due to the drug. However, the Government and the MHRA take such issues seriously.

All medicines, including Seroxat, are licensed on the available data at the time, but their benefits are kept under constant review. Seroxat and the other SSRIs are associated with an improvement in safety in overdose and are better tolerated by patients than other main classes of medicines used in the treatment of depression, the tricyclic antidepressants. An expert working group of the Committee on Safety of Medicines is undertaking a comprehensive, independent scientific assessment of the available data relating to the safety of SSRIs, particularly withdrawal reactions and suicide behaviour.

The expert group sought and considered evidence from a wide range of sources, including a specific objective to listen to the patient voice. I hope that hon. Members know that it has already reached conclusions on the use of SSRIs in children and the Government have published the findings on that, including the results of the clinical trials. That unprecedented step goes further than any regulator has ever done and demonstrates our commitment to being as open as possible in drug regulation. The expert group is now focusing its attention on the use of SSRIs in adults and hopes to conclude its full and thorough review before Christmas. No doubt hon. Members will be interested to receive that information when it is published and to examine the findings.

I want now to discuss the withdrawal of Vioxx and point out to the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) that the Canadians took action on Risperdal, which is an anti-psychotic drug, not the drug Vioxx that was withdrawn worldwide in September. The United Kingdom acted on Risperdal as soon as the evidence was available. The drug was licensed for different uses in Canada and was licensed specifically for use by elderly people. That was not replicated in this country. From the advice that I have received, the hon. Gentleman gave the wrong impression about the time scale. The company, Merck Sharp and Dohme, withdrew Vioxx based on the emerging findings of clinical trials, which showed an increased risk, as hon. Members have said, of coronary heart events when people had taken the drug for more 18 months.

We thought carefully about the advice given to patients, but the advice that we received both from the MHRA and our advisers within the Department about the time scale of withdrawal was to allow patients to spend a week or so to see their GPs before they were taken off the drug and put on to another one. The risk was not great enough to necessitate more rapid action. Had it been, we would, of course, have given different advice.

Paul Flynn: Has the Minister communicated with Merck Sharp and Dohme about claims that it knew of the side effects as long ago as 2000?

Miss Johnson: I have not. My noble Friend Lord Warner deals daily with these matters in the Department, but I cannot tell my hon. Friend whether he has communicated with the company on this matter because I have no briefing on it at the moment.

Mr. Burstow: Will the Minister check again and write to me about the chronology of decisions taken by this country's regulatory agencies and the Canadian regulatory agencies? The latter took their decisions some two years ago, or possibly even earlier. The answers that I have so far received to parliamentary questions led me to make the comments that I did. The period of two years seems relevant.

Miss Johnson: All I can comment on at the moment is the advice that I have received and relayed to the hon. Gentleman. I will, of course, reconsider the issues that he raises, and see whether a further point needs to be made. He will not necessarily learn anything new from our simply standing by our answer to an earlier written question.

I will make a point about the agency's relationship with industry that I believe hon. Members will be keen to hear. The working relationship that the agency needs to have with industry does not inhibit the scientific and regulatory independence of the MHRA. Industry representatives do not participate in any management, executive or advisory functions, with the exception of the statutory representation on the agency's medicines commission bodies.

A significant proportion of the MHRA's senior scientific staff are, of course, recruited from, or have a history in, the industry. That is necessary, as they make up the largest single pool of specialist advice for effective drug regulation. They must be drawn from the industry; there is no other source. We do not operate the sort of secondment programme operated by other bodies because of the relationship between the two.

I alert hon. Members to the fact that the agency has been reviewing the advisory committee structure, and has taken the opportunity to reconsider the arrangements in place for managing interests—an issue that my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North and others have raised a great deal. Proposals are being drafted that will bring UK policy into line with new EU legislation, which requires that experts should have no financial or other interest in the pharmaceutical industry that could affect their impartiality. My noble Friend Lord Warner will make a more detailed announcement on the issue very shortly. Members will therefore appreciate that there are other issues that I cannot discuss this morning.

Dr. Murrison: I am little confused. I believe that the Minister said that there were no sources other than the industry for the expertise that the MHRA needs. I dispute that.

Miss Johnson: That is not quite what I said.

Dr. Murrison: The Minister can correct me in a minute. She then said that the new EU directives would mean that we will ensure that there are no conflicts of interest of the sort that I believe she was describing. Will she clarify that?

Miss Johnson: We need to accept that the pool of people who may have a background in the drugs industry and who understand how it works are likely to be from the industry. The question is where Members believe we would acquire experts who at no point in their past have some sort of background connected with the drugs industry. The second question relates to the nature of their ongoing relationship. My noble Friend will make an announcement on that point. I repeat for the hon. Gentleman's information that we will bring UK policy into line with the new EU legislation on these matters, which requires that experts should have no financial or other interest in the pharmaceutical industry that could affect their impartiality. That is what we will elucidate soon.

Paul Flynn: The Minister made an appalling statement to back up the nonsense that only people with years of experience in the pharmaceutical industry should police it. That does not happen in any other body—there must be lay members on regulatory bodies. Someone does not need years of experience in an industry to decide to work on the raw data rather than on conclusions provided by the industry to reach life-and-death decisions for millions of people.

Miss Johnson: If I am to make progress, I need to continue without too many interventions. However, in response to my hon. Friend, I am not saying that those are the only people who should be involved with a regulator, but that the expertise should come from those with a background of experience. Lay members are, of course, crucial—we accept and welcome lay involvement. The MHRA seeks to engage patients as stakeholders in a number of ways, including formally through the Committee on the Safety of Medicines and its sub-committees, and in less formal ways that I do not have time to go through. Both the CSM expert group on patient information and the recently established group on patient reporting of suspected adverse drug reactions have lay chairmen and are heavily weighted towards lay membership to reflect medicine users' views. The crucial role of lay people is well accepted; I was making the point that the expert view will often come from people with a background in the industry.

In addition, the agency is seeking to be more transparent in its working, and I point out to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North that it already publishes details of all complaints received about medicines advertising and of the outcomes of its investigations, as well as being more open about how such decisions are made. It has also published summaries of clinical trial data to support key communications on drug safety, when it has been in the public interest to do so—the public interest being an overriding demand.

Freedom of information legislation will make such arrangements even more open from January, and my noble Friend indicated that section 118 of the Medicines Act 1968 will be repealed as part of the preparation for that. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North made a specific point about minutes being published, and I am advised that those minutes are published and will continue to be.

Dr. Gibson: I want to ask my hon. Friend about advertising. There are some very glossy ads for statins. People go to their pharmacies, get statins and are advised by the pharmacist, but many of the adverts are misleading. What does the regulator do to control those advertisements? Should it not publicise what it does? As I said, it changed one advert, but only in a small way. We need to know what the regulator does in terms of its influence on the public buying drugs.

Miss Johnson: I am happy to write to my hon. Friend about advertising, partly because of the growing pressure of time, but also to give him more detail on that subject. As I said, lay members are involved in that work and play a key role in considering those questions.

The points made in the review about a lack of understanding of the role of the agency and the fact that more work has to be done on communications have been accepted. The National Audit Office made a number of recommendations in its value for money review of the agency. Those are being taken forward, including work on communications and more engagement with the public.

We can only consider whether the agency's communications are effective if the safety messages that it generates are properly communicated and acted upon. I hope that the fact that we are having this debate is a sign that the profile of the agency could be, and is being, further improved.

On the creation of the MHRA, as I mentioned, a review was carried out on, among other things, the agency's external profile. The findings are being implemented. For example, work is being done on the redesign of the agency's website to make it more accessible and usable by a range of stakeholders.

[Miss Johnson]

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North asked about the role of the agency in relation to wider public health. Before I come to that, I shall touch on the issue of secrecy and openness and point out that the principle underpinning the existing code is that information should be released except where disclosure would not be in the public interest—for example, on the grounds of personal or commercial confidentiality. In fact, information can be released if that is done in performance of the MHRA's duty. Where there is a risk to public safety or health, the MHRA has an overriding obligation to remove or reduce the risk, even if confidentiality is broken. As I mentioned, that provision is effectively being strengthened by changes under freedom of information that will be implemented from the new year. Of course, there remain some common-law protections in relation to confidentiality, but otherwise the provisions I mentioned are all that would in any way impede the publication of a lot more information.

Regulation does not happen in isolation, and I was honestly confused by the remarks of the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) on the subject. On the one hand, he alleges bureaucracy and complaints about under-reporting on health care; on the other, the official Opposition, for whom he is a spokesman on the subject, believe in no targets, and hence, presumably, on no reporting on many subjects. They also believe in removing bureaucracy—as, indeed, do we where it is pointless.

Dr. Murrison: Will the Minister give way?

Miss Johnson: No, I have only three more minutes to make my closing comments. The hon. Gentleman is giving a confusing message on whether he would welcome a strengthening of provisions.

Dr. Murrison: Will the Minister give way?

Miss Johnson: Very quickly, so that the hon. Gentleman can clarify his position.

Dr. Murrison: That is a disgraceful thing that the Minister said; she must know that reporting adverse affects is completely different from setting central targets. I hope that she will withdraw her comments.

Miss Johnson: I am afraid that I have no intention of withdrawing them. The under-reporting point sounded very much like a desire to have more information at the centre about what is going on. That is exactly what has led us to set targets, which have already lead to huge improvements of more than 12 per cent. in respect of cancer mortality, and to improvements in relation to coronary heart disease of more than 23 per cent. We must recognise that we are making huge progress as a result of the developments that the hon. Gentleman is criticising.

Ministers have been strong advocates of policies to broaden the range of products available over the counter. We believe, importantly, in the concept of patient choice. At the time of the adoption of the NHS plan, there was emphasis on smoking cessation products to support our initiative to reduce coronary heart disease, and on emergency contraception in relation to the issue of unwanted pregnancies. On all those matters, we had the possibility of moving forward as a result of work done on the reclassification of medicines from prescription only to pharmacy.

Regulation can also be used to address the lack of availability of medicines in specific sectors, medicines for children being a key example. The European Commission has now formally issued a draft regulation with the aim of improving the availability of medicines licensed specifically for use in the treatment of children. The Government welcome that initiative, which will complement the work that the UK is already undertaking to address that important issue. We will play a leading role in negotiations on the regulation in the coming months to make sure that it meets the needs of the UK and addresses the points that hon. Members raised in relation to children.

To conclude, I would like to illustrate how regulation really does contribute to the protection of individual patients. In September 1998, the MCA, as it then was, moved to restrict the pack size of paracetamol and aspirin through a change in legislation. Research just completed by Oxford university researchers has shown that suicides have been reduced by 25 per cent. in three years.

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. We now come to the debate on the closure of the Birds Eye factory in Grimsby.

Birds Eye (Grimsby)

11 am

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): I rise to draw attention to the closure of the Unilever-Birds Eye factory on Ladysmith road in Grimsby, which will mean the loss of 620 jobs. In its last year, the factory has had sales of £56 million and it brings about £10 million a year into the Grimsby economy. It produces frozen prepared meals and boil-in-the-bag meals, both of which are profitable.

I do not want to begin this major complaint about Unilever's behaviour without paying some tribute to the company. Unilever-Birds Eye has done well by Grimsby and the town has done well out of the company. It has been a model employer, and I pay tribute to its sense of social responsibility, which it has demonstrated through cultural sponsorship and in many other ways. However, it has blotted that copybook with what amounts to a betrayal of its work force, its management and the town of Grimsby, which has always worked closely with it.

Unilever is a big corporation, but it is gripped by a corporate panic. That is what led to those betrayals, which have made a mockery of the partnership that has existed between Birds Eye and its workers over the years. Birds Eye has invested in training, and its staff at the plant are active and enthusiastic. It has upgraded standards all round and invested well in health and all the other things that a co-operative work force need. That partnership is now to be rewarded with a P45 for the employees. That is an appalling way to behave.

I understand the problems of big corporations, which cannot behave with the youthful enthusiasm of small, thrusting, dynamic companies or achieve the same rates of return. That would be like a mature person such as me desperately stuffing himself with ginseng and going to the gym to make himself as virile and active as a superstud of 20. Of course, I have high hopes in that direction, but I do not think I will achieve it. In the same way, a big corporation will not achieve the rates of return that Unilever has been seeking.

In 1999, Unilever produced a report called "Path to Growth" to inject a new dynamism into the company and increase profitability and returns on assets. The company, which is, in effect, an amalgam of brands, reduced its 1,600 brands to about 400. It also shed workers, and there was a major reduction in the work force at Grimsby. The plan produced greater profits in 2002–03 and bonuses were paid to the Grimsby work force. Then, all of a sudden, there was a reversal. In October this year, Unilever issued a profit warning.

The plan was a failure because big companies cannot produce the same rates of return as smaller companies, nor should they try to. That is especially true when markets move against them. In Birds Eye's case, supermarket cost-cutting moved against it, there was growth in the chilled food market, rather than the frozen food market for which the Grimsby plant produced, and boil-in-the-bag became less fashionable. However, all those lines were profitable and sold well. In that situation, the correct response of any capitalist organisation that is attempting to revivify itself and cope with market difficulties is to compete and fight back, not to submit to trends. Birds Eye should invest and re-equip. Much of the Grimsby plant is 20 years old, and some was brought from Kirkby. The company can fight back by involving the workers, who want to keep their jobs and keep production going, and by investing in the plant.

Birds Eye can also fight back through promotion. Companies of this scale have enormous power, particularly when it comes to advertising their brands. Advertising was cut back, however, and we have not seen Captain Birds Eye on the television as much. I love Captain Birds Eye. Why do we not see him like we used to? Birds Eye has cut back on advertising, which brand sales depend on, but the correct response is to fight back with new products.

Birds Eye introduced some new products, but, as far as I can see, enjoy! was one of the biggest disasters in food marketing, as it was designed for a yuppie market that did not exist. The employees in Grimsby told the company that enjoy!, which was produced in Germany as far as I can gather, would not sell and did not appeal to the company's basic market. They warned that enjoy! was headed for failure, and so it failed, losing the company some £25 million.

If a company with a strong marketing department, strong brand loyalty and strong advertising cannot devise successful new products, the correct response is to fire the marketing department, not close the plant and fire the workers who produce the products. That would have been one response. Birds Eye should also have looked at new value-added lines, own-label production for supermarkets—anything to use the surplus space in the factory and spread the overheads through bigger production. However, Birds Eye decided that it could do that only by getting somebody else to take over the factory.

A further response could have been to produce for Europe. We are talking about a huge multinational with marketing power all over the place. The pound is coming down and the euro is becoming stronger, increasing the prospects for production and sales from this country, but there was no attempt to produce for a wider market, as a successful and competitive company would have done.

The factory was profitable, as I say: the gross margin was 27 per cent., although Unilever wanted 35, whereas the profit was 13 per cent. and Unilever wanted 16. Those are marginal differences, yet on the basis of them Unilever decided to sell the plant and get rid of it. Those difficulties could have been overcome with the co-operation of the work force and investment in the plant.

Unilever, in the grip of financial panic, decided on a review, which was largely dedicated to trying to get somebody else to take over the factory. Various people were sounded out and came to visit. The effort to sell went on for a whole year, preventing any further action to deal with the problem. That attempt came to an end in September this year. The betrayal—that is, the decision to close—came immediately thereafter, in early October, which was far too quick to allow the consideration of investment and alternatives that should have been used.

James Hill, the managing director, told me that a report on investment would be submitted to the board and that it would be well considered and well put together. I dreamt that I saw James Hill last night, but unfortunately it turned out to be Joe Hill, who represented another tradition. However, the company cannot have considered investment in the way I have described.

An investment plan was developed by the GMB in co-operation with local management, who think that the plant could and should be kept open. The cost in that investment plan was £10 million. The plan would have been eligible for grants for new investment and new production, so the cost would have come down after making inquiries with the Department of Trade and Industry and Yorkshire Forward, but they were never made. The cost of investment would therefore have been less than £10 million, whereas the cost of closure is £21.4 million, so why is Birds Eye opting to close and waste its money like that? The accusation is that Birds Eye never seriously considered the investment in the plan. Was the plan pushed before the board? Why was closure rushed through in that fashion?

The closure betrayed the work force and the local management. I pay tribute to Roger Norrington, the local manager, who has kept us in close dialogue—I hope that does not imperil his job—and has been helpful in dealing with the situation. The closure betrayed Grimsby as well.

Instead of considering the alternatives, it has been decided to outsource the bulk of production to Rye Valley in Ireland and escape the responsibilities of an employer to the work force, in the same way that Nike has pioneered outsourcing production to south-east Asia. I have a wry view of Rye Valley, because the plant was built with £30 million of European aid to take jobs from this country. It benefits from 15 per cent. corporation tax, as all Irish plants do. The race to the bottom is beginning, and it will get worse, because Estonia is considering corporation tax of 0 per cent. to attract businesses.

In effect, through Europe, the British taxpayer is paying money to Ireland to invest in production that will take jobs from this country because the Irish Government are imposing such a low corporation tax rate to make it attractive to invest in Ireland. Mr. Sarkozy, France's Minister for the Economy, Finance and Industry, argued that > "if Ireland was unwilling to fund its public services by levying taxes on profitable companies operating here, then it should not get handouts financed by the taxpayers of the rest of Europe."

It is unusual for me to agree with a French Minister, but I agree wholeheartedly with that. It is iniquitous that we should be paying both to lose jobs and in aid to Ireland, which benefits from various tax concessions, to establish a plant that takes those jobs.

A United States Government report indicates that in four years, US multinationals have boosted their profits from £13.4 billion to £26.8 billion by establishing in Ireland. They have absolved themselves of all responsibility, they have an easier life and they do not have to get involved in the messy business of production as it has been transferred to Ireland. That restores the gross margins to the 35 per cent. they want, plus 7 per cent. for marketing, even though the goods are produced by another company.

We have the spectacle of a Labour Government—a Labour Government, to use Neil Kinnock's intonation—using taxpayers' money to clear up the mess and pay the unemployment benefit of the workers in Grimsby who will be out of a job, and allowing the company to transfer jobs to Ireland, without penalties. I draw that to the Minister's attention: something must be done about that outsourcing. We cannot just sit there and say it is inevitable. It is a loss of British jobs.

Under the Companies Act 1985, the directors have a responsibility to have regard to the interests of their employees. In other words, they have a duty of care to them. Is that exercised by closing the factory? I wrote to all the directors of the parent companies, who have that duty of care, pointing out what they were doing and saying that a brand holder divorced from production and relying only on advertising is doomed to failure.

The supermarkets have their own labels, but they have a base in the market and a marketing ability, while brand masters who just produce brands and demand a high rate of return on them have no strength in production or marketing. Effectively, they are doomed to exploitation and they put themselves at the mercy of whoever produces the goods. The have no control over quality. All they are doing is advertising the product, hoping that the returns roll in to finance their comfortable existence without the messy business of production and having to co-operate with the workers, who have given them so much in the case of the Grimsby plant.

Production is power; there cannot be brands without companies having the power to produce them. This is a squalid end to what was a good relationship. There was 40 years of co-operation between Birds Eye and Grimsby, but that co-operation has been rewarded by betrayal.

The workers have been loyal and supportive—I regularly awarded certificates for training and other schemes developed by the union and the company together—so no wonder they feel betrayed. In some ways, this is almost a family plant. Mothers and daughters, husbands and wives—they all work there and they all feel angry and betrayed. They are being asked to continue production until the end of February, when the factory can be handed over to someone else. I thought better of Unilever and Birds Eye than that.

I must ask the Minister whether we can intervene at an earlier stage to make the company aware of any alternative and of what investment the Government might make. Why cannot we penalise the extravagant destruction of British jobs by outsourcing? I am grateful that the Department of Trade and Industry has set up the task force that I asked for, so that employees can be helped into new jobs. I am grateful also that the Department will consider alternative uses for the factory. The closure will have consequences for the Hull and Lowestoft plants, which have so far escaped that fate.

It is essential that the Department intervene to get a better deal for the local work force, as unemployment in Grimsby is higher than the national average. Most of all, Mr. Taylor, I want to say to Unilever, "It is not too late. Nothing becomes you so badly as the leaving of Grimsby. Think again."

11.17 am

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab) rose—

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. It is important that the Minister has adequate time to respond, as we are debating an important subject. I call the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac), but I ask her to be brief.

Shona McIsaac: Thank you, Mr. Taylor. I shall certainly be brief. The essence of what we are debating was well articulated by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who represents a neighbouring constituency.

Grimsby and Cleethorpes form one urban area, and the workers come from both towns, so the closure also affects many of my constituents. As my hon. Friend said, we are calling upon the company to think again. Even at this late stage, we want the Department and the Government to work with the company if they can—for example, by examining the grants that could be made available to modernise the plant—to protect the 600-plus jobs. What we are asking for is not difficult, we believe.

I want the Government to consider future prospects should those jobs go. The Minister must be aware that the area of Grimsby and Cleethorpes is remote. It is a large urban area, but it is remote from other urban centres. The result is that many of the workers will have to move to other cities and towns should they lose their jobs, although we obviously want the company to think again. It is an isolated area.

We must also consider the fact that many of the workers are women, that our area has a high number of part-time workers and that, as has been said, unemployment is higher than the national average in the constituencies of Grimsby and Cleethorpes. The role of the task force is therefore crucial. We obviously hope, through my hon. Friend the Minister's intervention, that Unilever will think again about closing the Birds Eye factory in Grimsby. However, should the worst come to the worst—I honestly hope that it does not, for the well-being of so many families in our communities—the task force should do all that it can to ensure that those people secure other jobs in our community.

11.19 am

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on securing this debate, and on raising the important issues surrounding the closure of the Birds Eye factory. As a constituency MP, it is right that he should bring it to the attention of the House. It is also right that my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac), whose constituents are also affected, should be able to come before the Chamber and raise enormously serious issues that affect the whole area.

The Government certainly want to extend our sympathy and concern to members of the GMB, a union of which I am also a member. I am concerned that they have been put in this position. It is not a matter for the Government to speak for Unilever; it is big enough to speak for itself. However, we have approached Unilever and discussed the situation.

Unilever announced its intention to close the factory on 7 October. The decision, it says, was an extremely difficult one. It explored all the alternatives to closure. It tells us that it considered the possibility of selling to a third party and the viability of retraining its work force and investing in developing new opportunities and products. It explored the various financial sources that might be available. None the less, it concluded that it needed to find a far larger and more flexible plant—in its terms—to be competitive in the industry. Longer-term investment in the Grimsby plant did not match up to the scale and innovation capabilities already available from third parties.

It is remarkable, given the difficult circumstances that we have heard about today, that my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby was able to pay the tribute that he did to Birds Eye as an employer that has shown a sense of responsibility until now. It is right that the company should explain to the work force why it made this decision. It is regrettable that it has taken the decision as part of its review. I understand that two other sites, in Lowestoft and Hull, are to remain unchanged for the foreseeable future.

There has been great concern about the impact that the loss of 620 jobs will have on Grimsby. The departure of Birds Eye is a huge loss for the town. We fully recognise that. Department of Trade and Industry officials at the Government office for Yorkshire and the Humber have made contact with Unilever and early dialogue has begun. That has been assisted by a group of local and regional partners, including Yorkshire Forward, Jobcentre Plus and North East Lincolnshire council officials, to see what can be done to talk through the issue with Birds Eye and about any job losses.

One hope, I am told, is that there are significant job opportunities still in the Grimsby area. In the food industry alone, there are opportunities for 200 jobs. That falls short of the 620 jobs lost, but at such a time 200 jobs are welcome in themselves. A recent press report suggested that local food firms are struggling to fill vacancies. Bizarrely, given the circumstances, North East Lincolnshire council reported that there would be a trade mission to Latvia and Lithuania to try to recruit workers to the area. I suspect that those undertaking the journey may feel that there are opportunities to employ people in the local area, rather than going further afield. They might want to reconsider going there in these difficult circumstances.

The company tells us that it will provide assistance for retraining and skills for new avenues with an offer of between £0.5 million and £0.75 million to be made available. The regional development agency, Yorkshire Forward, has agreed to consider meeting costs to undertake an impact assessment study and has confirmed funds up to £30,000. It is not for the Government to intervene in business decisions, but they will, along with Yorkshire Forward, work closely with the local authority and the appropriate agencies in the remaining months, to secure a more co-ordinated approach to the handling of the circumstances and their immediate impact on the area.

[Mr. Mike O'Brien]

I know that my hon. Friend's constituents will be enormously concerned about the closure of the factory. I assure him that despite that very bad news, the Government remain firmly committed to manufacturing, which is a vital part of our economy. It accounts for one sixth of our national wealth and it is also part of our history. More importantly, it must be part of our future. We want a successful manufacturing sector, encompassing food production, which makes value-added products and involves well paid, highly skilled jobs.

My hon. Friend raised the issue of offshoring. The difficulty is that Britain benefits enormously from offshoring. I remind hon. Members of the factories from other countries that have been set up in the UK—Nissan from Japan and many companies from the USA have located here. They all offshore production into the UK. The UK, as the director general of the CBI, Digby Jones, said a few days ago, is made for globalisation. We are in a very competitive position and we benefit enormously from offshoring into this country—or inshoring, from our point of view. That is one reason why we would not want to take protective measures. The damage to our overall economy and to jobs would be enormous throughout the country.

Mr. Mitchell: There is no reason to believe that taking measures to stop the export of jobs, or to penalise it through the tax system, as Senator Kerry proposed to do during the American election campaign, would deter new companies from entering this country.

Mr. O'Brien: We need to make sure that companies choose to come here because they know that they will not be subject to vast numbers of restrictions. Otherwise, they will not come. We must get the balance right. We need to remain in our present position. We are in second place out of the whole world, behind the US, as a location where people are investing. We are well ahead of many other countries—certainly all our European partners—in getting jobs and investment from abroad.

Those jobs come here because of the infrastructure, the skills of the work force, the stability of our economy and the fact that our public finances are properly managed. All that my hon. Friend's party—and mine—has been so busy doing to manage the economy in the past seven years has contributed to making Britain a place that attracts inward investment.

I appreciate that it is frustrating—it makes constituents like those of my hon. Friend very angry—when jobs go to other countries, and particularly when they go to another member of the European Union that may have received financing for part of the building of the factory. I understand the view that people take in such circumstances. There are, of course, instances when British companies have benefited from EU finance. None of that mitigates the serious problems faced by members of the GMB because of Birds Eye's decision.

All I can say to my hon. Friend is that we will continue to engage with Unilever and to see if there is any way we can assist. We will provide whatever is available to encourage it to look at its decision. We will provide what assistance we can towards dealing with job losses and making retraining available. We will encourage the company to continue, even in these difficult circumstances, to adopt a socially responsible approach to skills retraining and helping workers relocate.

We will do all that we can to work with my hon. Friend. I shall be happy to meet him and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and the Regions will be pleased to do the same, if that helps, to talk through the issues and seek a way to mitigate something that is regarded as very damaging for the town of Grimsby.

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

Police Funding

2 pm

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): I am pleased to have secured a debate that I hope is timely and of great importance to all our constituents throughout England. I am also pleased that the three major English political parties are well represented by hon. Members here today. No doubt they want to raise concerns that exist in their police authority areas and constituencies.

Crime and policing issues are probably among people's principal priorities and concerns, whether in the south-west and the Avon and Somerset constabulary area, which I represent, or others parts of the United Kingdom. No doubt such issues will be prominent in the forthcoming general election. I hope that the Government's mind is focused in particular on the 2005–06 police settlement for England and the concerns expressed recently by chief constables and police authorities about the settlement and its implications for police staffing.

I shall start by talking about general resourcing issues for the police and how those issues have changed in recent years, and go on to describe changes in manning levels that the Government have overseen in the past couple of years. I shall then discuss funding concerns and problems relating to the 2005–06 settlement, before commenting on proposals that the Government should consider if they are to try to avoid a severe funding squeeze next year. That squeeze could reverse the increase in police numbers in recent years.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Laws: It is rather early to accept interventions, but I will give way to the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). I must then make some progress.

Vera Baird: In the light of the serious attempts in the consultation document yesterday to ensure more diversity in recruitment and more family-friendly training and working hours for the police—I imagine that most people would commend that—is the hon. Gentleman not the slightest bit embarrassed to talk about "manning", as if only males were in the police force?

Mr. Laws: No, I am not. I wish that I had not given way now. I shall make some progress.

The concern throughout the country about policing levels is based not just on an irrational fear of crime but on developments that have taken place in the past few decades, including the increasing volume of crime and the increasing responsibilities that have fallen on our police forces. In 1979—a useful benchmark date—there were about 2.5 million notifiable offences throughout England and Wales; that figure more than doubled to 5.6 million by 1992. There are big debates about the validity of crime statistics and problems with them, but even if we take a category of crime such as burglary, the statistics for which are more reliable than others, we can see that although the figures peaked in 1993 and have fallen for many years since, they are still significantly above 1979 levels.

If we consider other pressures on the police in the past few years, we see that there is a series of areas that require a great deal of money, but that is not necessarily reflected in police numbers. They include the cost of DNA testing, the increasing cost of call handling given the more extensive use of mobile phones by the public, and the inexorable rise in IT costs in the police service as elsewhere. There has been a significant increase in the volume of crime in every category, which has not been reversed to the levels that we experienced in the 1970s. As I said, there have been cost increases in a host of areas, including call handling, DNA technology and other technology. Set against that, the increase in police officer numbers in the past few decades has been quite modest. We started with about 111,000 police officers in 1979 and hit a temporary peak of 127,600 in 1992. There was a small reduction in police numbers during the 1992–97 Parliament, which continued when Labour came to power in 1997 and stuck to Conservative spending plans, so that the police numbers continued to fall to about 124,000 in 2000. It is only in the past couple of years that there have been significant increases in police numbers to just below 140,000. The pressures on the police and the costs of running the police force have increased significantly over the past few decades, but the number of police officers has increased by only 25 per cent.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): My hon. Friend is talking about a range of different cost pressures on the police. I may be pre-empting him, but does he not agree that there is another significant cost? A blip in the number of officers retiring in the coming year will significantly increase the pension bill, and police forces across the country are concerned that that will have a significant impact on budgets, resulting in officers coming off the front line to fill the positions of civilians who have been made redundant.

Mr. Laws: My hon. Friend is right. I want to look at some of the pension pressures that have been affecting police authorities across the country for a number of years, but which will increase particularly in 2005–06.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Will the hon. Gentleman include in his litany of pressures the political pressure from the electorate, who have seen police precepts balloon because of an inflexible method of finance? Was he, like me, disappointed yesterday not to see in an otherwise excellent White Paper any reference to the possibility of direct billing from police authorities, rather than wrapping it up with all other forms of local authority provision?

Mr. Laws: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman's initial point. Hon. Members are successfully anticipating my speech. I shall therefore push ahead rapidly before I have nothing left to say, and shall allow time later for people to make points about the experience in their areas.

Turning to more recent progress—at last, police numbers have started to rise—we acknowledge that there has been an improved environment over the past couple of years. Police numbers in Avon and Somerset have risen from just under 3,000 in 1998–99 to just over

[Mr. Laws]

3,400 in August this year. At the most local level in the Somerset east police district, police numbers have risen from 241 in 2001 to 278 today. There have been the additional allocations of money for the police community safety officers who are beginning to be deployed by the Government.

The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) made an important point when he said that the Government must not forget that many additional police resources have been paid for not out of the Government's central resources, but by people in their local area through significant increases in the police precept. In my area, for every £100 that was spent on policing in 1995–96, less than £15 was raised locally. That figure has now roughly doubled to just under £30. The increases in the police precept in Avon and Somerset were 15 per cent. in 2002–03, 34 per cent. in 2003–04 and 12 per cent. for 2004–05. The police precept has therefore increased by over 60 per cent. in the past three years alone, which is broadly representative of the experience of many areas of the country. Indeed, there are some areas that have experienced even bigger rises—there was a 52 per cent. rise in Gloucestershire in one year alone.

Many people across the country have somewhat begrudgingly paid more in their local police precept over the past few years, because they were convinced by the local police authority that additional police officers and staff would be deployed. People who have paid more in their local taxes would be particularly concerned if the ultimate settlement for the police budget in 2005–06 reverses the recent expansion of staff. Over the past few weeks, we have all been successfully lobbied by our local police forces, who have expressed concerns about the 2005–06 settlement. I suspect that the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety has received representations from the Association of Police Authorities. I met the chief constable of Avon and Somerset constabulary, Steve Pilkington, who described the experience in his area, and I have no doubt that other Members will have been briefed by their police authorities and chief constables.

There is serious concern that the nature of the settlement that the Government envisage for next year will leave a funding gap of up to £350 million in the budgets of English authorities, and that that gap can only be closed with a reduction in police officers or police staff. The driving concerns—and I will return to the Home Secretary's statement yesterday on the White Paper—are fear that next year's Government grant for police authorities could rise by as little as 3 per cent., and the associated fear that increases in the police precept will be kept down by Government diktat to the low single figures suggested by Ministers in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in a county such as Hertfordshire the standstill pressures on spending are about 6 per cent., and the new spending pressures are about 1 per cent. as a result of the cost of police surgeons, criminal record searches and so on? If the grant were 3 per cent., and there was capping of the sort to which he referred, Hertfordshire would have to make a saving equivalent to the cost of 170 police officers. That would be extremely unpopular, given the need for a visible police presence in our market towns and villages.

Mr. Laws: The hon. Gentleman is right. I have seen the representations from his authority, which are typical of the concerns expressed across England. That brings me neatly to my next point. The Association of Police Authorities has calculated that if the precept is kept down to 3 to 4 per cent. to paper over the fact that the Government have not yet been able to put in place a fairer mechanism than the council tax to raise local funding, and if there is a lower Government settlement, there will be a shortfall of about £350 million in the funding that police authorities have calculated that they need for the standstill budget. They need an average of 5.7 per cent., but the figure is higher for authorities that are experiencing the pension problems to which my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) referred. In Avon and Somerset, pension funding is a problem, because a large cohort of officers will retire next year, so the standstill settlement for Avon and Somerset has been calculated at 7.7 per cent.

The first point to make about individual areas of cost pressure and the scope for efficiency savings is that pension costs are increasing significantly across the country. In Avon and Somerset, they will go up by 50 per cent. between 1997–98 and 2004–05, from £25 million a year when Labour came to power to £37.2 million this financial year, and they will continue to rise. We appreciate that the Government are trying to tackle the historic underfunding of the police pension scheme, but that will not have any effect on the situation next year, when there will be a particular problem, as the large cohort of police officers who were recruited in the mid 1970s, are coming up for retirement, resulting in a surge of retirements in most authorities. The Minister may be interested to know that Avon and Somerset anticipates that there will be 150 retirements in 2005–06, compared with just 73 in 2004–05.

David Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one problem with public sector pension schemes—this does not apply to the local government scheme, but it does apply to the police scheme—is that they tend to be pay-as-you-go schemes, and are particularly vulnerable to surges in employer requirements, as certain events must be reflected actuarially in the demands on the fund in the years to come?

Mr. Laws: Yes, I agree. It is fair to point out that while individual employees pay contributions, which are obviously not ring-fenced, there is no specific employer contribution. The Government are seeking to address that matter, but they will not have done so by next year. Pension pressures are therefore a significant problem, and they could account for about £100 million of the £350 million gap.

Police authorities are examining other parts of their budgets to see where there are cost pressures and where savings could be made. More than 80 per cent. of most police authorities' costs will be staff or pension costs, so it will be difficult to cut a large proportion of costs without reducing police or staff numbers. In addition, there is the growing cost of technology. DNA technology has been introduced in many areas, and there are attempts to improve telephone centres to make it easier for people to contact the police, thus addressing a problem has caused a great deal of frustration throughout the country.

Many police authorities have made efficiency savings year on year for a number of years, but the proportion of efficiency savings that can be achieved in a cashable way has been reduced. Avon and Somerset has been successful in achieving its targets over recent years, but the proportion of cashable savings has gradually reduced. It therefore anticipates a funding gap of about £10.4 million in the coming year.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): If, as my hon. Friend says, the police settlement is limited to 3 per cent., and if there is a cap on the 3 per cent. precept and a standstill in the number of police officers, cuts must be made in the civilian force, which is almost a reverse of the civilianisation that is taking place at present. Police officers will be back in the office doing administrative jobs when we want their presence out on the street.

Mr. Laws: Perhaps unauthorised copies of my speech have been circulating among hon. Members, because every time they speak they anticipate what I am about to say. Given the circumstances, the only mechanism for saving money available to most chief constables is to reduce police staffing—that is certainly the position that the chief constable of Avon and Somerset has described.

There are limits on the areas of staffing that can be reduced without losing ring-fenced funds. The number of police community safety officers cannot be reduced without cutting ring-fenced money from the Government. If the police authorities decide to target back-office staff rather than police on the beat, they risk losing staff who have taken the place of the police officers whom they are trying to deploy on the beat. Consequently, even if they try to protect the number of front-line police officers, those officers could be drawn back from the beat to undertake back-office responsibilities, as my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) pointed out. One must therefore conclude that if the budget is anything like the one that is expected, there will be severe pressures on police authorities next year.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I shall make a point that my hon. Friend may not be going to make himself. Certain authorities need to increase their expenditure because they are on the front line in the war against terrorism and drugs. Merseyside, in particular, has special pressures and needs to increase expenditure, which are an additional reason why it cannot make cuts this year.

Mr. Laws: My hon. Friend is to be congratulated because I was not going to make that point. I am particularly grateful to him for raising the interests of Merseyside, as he always does so effectively.

There is always scope for examining whether the claims made by any organisation about how cuts will fall are borne out in reality or whether they are worst-case scenarios. However, there is no doubt that if the assumptions about the grant from central Government and from the police precept are borne out, budgetary pressures would result in reductions in staffing in most police authorities. There would be anger throughout the country at any such staff reduction, given that people have paid much more in their police precept over the past few years.

What should the Government do about the situation? The first and most obvious point is that they must look closely at the level of settlement from central Government for English police authorities for 2005–06. I was cheered, but only slightly, by the Home Secretary's response yesterday to a question that followed his statement on the policing White Paper. He said:

> "On spending and the police grant, police authorities believed that they were to get a 3 per cent. uplift. On that basis, they have been lobbying that that is insufficient for them to meet the future demands of the service and they have been demanding 5.7 per cent. Let me make it clear: there is no way that I can deliver a 5.7 per cent. uplift across the board, and I do not believe that the police authorities truly believe that that is feasible. However, I will make sure, along with my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Deputy Prime Minister, that the uplift that we deliver in a few weeks will ensure that the programme that we have set out, and its supplementing in the years ahead, will deliver the neighbourhood beat police officers and the 25,000 support officers to which we have committed."—[Official Report, 9 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 711.]

In one sense, that is cheering, because the Home Secretary does not seem to be intent on a settlement as low as 3 per cent. The band seems to be between 3 per cent., which he says is too low, and 5.7 per cent., which he says is too high. Part of this debate is to try to force the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety and her colleagues towards the upper end of that spectrum.

The central Government settlement should not only deliver the specific and limited targets to which the Home Secretary referred in his statement—for example, ring-fenced police community safety officers—but protect existing staffing levels and additional police that have recently been taken on. I hope that it will at least deliver the existing level of services and the increase in officers that the Government have promised without the need for staff savings elsewhere. To do so, the figure must be closer to 5 per cent. than to the rumoured 3 per cent.

There must be specific provision for pensions. Those of us who represent police authority areas with difficult pension outlooks next year would like a supplement to the police settlement next year that reflects those pressures. There should be an amount additional to the standard uprating of the police central grant. The pension pressures will be severe next year for many authorities because of the retirement bulge that we face, so I hope that the Minister is examining that problem seriously.

I hope that the Government will consider providing greater flexibility in Home Office ring-fenced grants that, for example, pay for police community support officers. Many people will not have found entirely credible the implication in the Home Secretary's statement yesterday that the Home Office is giving more power to police authorities and that there is earned autonomy. The statement implied that authorities can do what they wish and deploy resources as they wish provided that they are not failing police authorities. However, at the same time, there is a whole list of ring-fenced central Government schemes, and additional targets are being introduced. The Government and the Home Office do not appear to have decided whether they believe in localism and letting people decide their priorities, or whether they want to nanny police authorities and tell them how to deploy resources, which may lead to a bizarre situation in which police authorities seek to make savings, but are penalised as a result of the ring-fenced budgets that the Home Office has earmarked for specific purposes. I therefore hope that there is additional flexibility.

Finally, if the Minister helps to secure a fairer central settlement and fairer funding for police authorities next year, I hope that instead of trying to cap local police authorities, she will, in the spirit of localism, allow them to decide their priorities and the way in which they set the local police precept in the interests of their areas. I have no doubt that after the huge increases of recent years, many police authorities will want to keep their police precept rises in low single digits, but some may not. Some may wish to make higher increases to fund additional police officers, and that should be their right and choice.

A year or so ago, after the Government had made some progress on education, especially on funding, their policies suffered a fall in credibility. There was growing public discontent because of a funding problem that hit many schools throughout England, not least in the south-west. The Government's reputation for delivering better education suffered a hard knock, and I hope that the Minister accepts that after a couple of years of progress, the Government face the self-same risk in policing and crime. Police chiefs and police authorities have warned them of the problems that they face next year. They will pay the political price in the next general election if they fail to deal with the issue in time.

Miss Anne Begg (in the Chair): I intend to begin the summing-up speeches at 3 o'clock. Eight hon. Members have indicated that they wish to speak, and I have done a quick sum showing that they have about four minutes each. If hon. Members keep to that, everyone will have a chance to speak.

2.26 pm

Mr. Alan Campbell (Tynemouth) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to the debate and I congratulate the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) on securing it. I shall try to be brief, although I do not know whether four minutes is realistic.

I shall limit my comments to the situation facing the three main police forces in the north-east of England. I acknowledge that the wider debate about the settlement for 2005–06 comes in the context of very good settlements in recent years. A record number of police officers has meant more than 700 additional officers in the Northumbria, Durham and Cleveland police force areas and a continuing fall in crime. That is all the more impressive when one considers that they are additional officers, because throughout the period people have left the force because of retirement, ill health or family reasons or to do other jobs.

In the Northumbria police area alone, funding has risen from £126 per head of population in 1997–98 to more than £166 per head last year. That has meant more police officers in every command unit and in every constituency. I agree with the hon. Member for Yeovil that that makes it more, not less, important, to sustain progress and ensure that the necessary resources are available.

The Minister will have closely studied the case being made by police authorities and chief police officers who have been lobbying Members of Parliament and the Government. That is their job and they have a right to do it, but just as police authorities and chief police officers are doing their job, I would expect the Minister to do hers, which is to ensure that additional resources are available and that they turn into officers on the streets. She must ensure, too, that civilian support staff are available to allow officers to do their job. Ministers have a responsibility to ensure that the taxpayer gets a fair deal for the resources being expended. It is hard to believe that future savings are not possible in the north-east, which has about £0.5 billion in police funding every year.

I shall say one or two things about those savings and changes in the Northumbria police area to illustrate my point. With Government help, Northumbria police has moved to civilianise many posts, which has meant more police officers on the beat; it has also reduced the number of police command units to six, which means that chief officers in those areas can use officers under their command more efficiently and effectively. In that regard, I mention the excellent work of Chief Superintendent Jim Peacock of north Tyneside command unit. He is busy establishing community teams of officers, which will bring them nearer to the community, and allow the better use of resources. We need to avoid undermining those efforts with cuts to civilian staff, which could reverse the trend of constables leaving their offices and going out on to the streets.

The community teams are to be strengthened by community support officers. I hope that the Minister will take this opportunity, in the light of comments made in previous debates—not yet in this debate, I am pleased to say—to pay tribute to community support officers and emphasise the key role that they can play. They provide a uniformed presence on the streets where people want to see it. They also tackle antisocial behaviour. Whatever disputes we may have about crime statistics, antisocial behaviour is the reality for many people in our local communities. It seems that that is what community support officers are there to tackle.

In the light of the comments made by the hon. Member for Yeovil, if the price of getting rid of ring-fencing is that chief police officers reduce the number of community support officers, I would not favour going down that route. Even at this late stage, as my hon. Friend the Minister deliberates on such matters, I lobby her again for more community support officers for Northumbria police. I hope that they will come.

I encourage the Government to begin, or to continue, to think innovatively about future police funding—perhaps not for 2005–06, but beyond. My constituency has what is known as an evening economy, which is a mixed blessing for a seaside town such as Whitley Bay. The downside is alcohol-fuelled disorder, which requires an enhanced police presence. Is it unreasonable to ask businesses that profit from such alcohol sales to contribute towards alleviating the effects? I welcome the press reports today that suggest that the Government are considering such an idea and hope that the Minister will keep an open mind. Although a voluntary scheme may prove the best step initially, it may require legislation. I hope that she will continue to consider that. If football clubs are asked to contribute towards policing costs, it is not unreasonable to ask nightclubs and club owners to make a contribution.

When it comes to the balance between council tax, the precept and central funding, I, like others, have received letters about high council tax. I cannot recall a single letter about the high level of police precept or the increase in police precept, because people see that turning into police officers on the streets, which they want. When the Government consider what powers may be brought to bear on that precept, I ask that they first look carefully at what local authorities are doing. It is the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister that brings those powers to bear.

When a local authority, such as North Tyneside, has a high council tax but is closing centres such as the Linskill centre, we should look at the local authority rather than concerning ourselves too much with the police precept. That is particularly the case in my local area. If the police are recruited locally and are accountable locally, there should be an element of local funding.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that one option not mentioned so far, which is the restructuring of police authorities, could be dangerous if it makes the relationship between local funding and local policing even more indistinct ?

Mr. Campbell: Yes, I do. I am not sure that it is wrong to consider the issue and to look continually at whether there is a better way to deliver services, but the trend in public services is that people are looking for them to be delivered locally. They are concerned, first, that they should be delivered, but they also want them delivered locally. We should think carefully before going down the route that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) warns us against, not least because local authority changes in the past have often come back to bite us.

I re-emphasise the point made by the hon. Member for Yeovil about police pensions. Clearly, they have a distorting effect on the police budget and will continue to do so if, as the Durham constabulary area advises, there is a 12 per cent. increase in the need to draw down from that pension in the next year alone. When will the Government say what they intend to do about that? Are they looking at a national form of funding?

I hope that the Minister will reassure me that there will be as fully funded a settlement as possible in 2005–06, that she will listen to lobbying and that she will appreciate that my comments come from someone who acknowledges the Government's good record so far.

2.34 pm

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) on securing this important debate, which enables us to question the Minister on the police funding settlement, as it affects our police authorities. I shall try to keep my speech narrow and examine what is happening in Norfolk. I understand that the provisional funding settlement has been deferred until late November or even mid-December. Can the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety give me some idea of when the provisional settlement will be announced?

Norfolk is not necessarily the centre of organised crime in the United Kingdom, or at least not until we have a large casino in Great Yarmouth. We have specific problems relating to the geographical extent of the area and its rural sparsity. We have crime that involves drugs and violence, and robberies in rural areas. People fear crime very much because of the sparsity of the population and the limited number of police. I am the first to acknowledge that Norfolk police, with support from the Home Office, have made a great effort over the past few years to concentrate on smashing criminal gangs, increasing the number of police and dealing with the fear of crime.

Norfolk is trialling two good initiatives, which are the use of mobile police stations and post offices, but there are still major funding problems that go back several years: first, the whole business of police communications and, secondly, the continuing dispute between the Home Office and the police authority about Norfolk police having a dedicated police helicopter. Given the size of Norfolk, the extent of the coastline and the fact that some points are vulnerable to terrorist attack, the Home Office must reconsider such matters. As the hon. Member for Yeovil emphasised, many grants are ring-fenced in police authorities and money is increasingly absorbed by nationally applied legal and efficiency targets.

The hon. Gentleman also said that it is acknowledged by everyone that, across the board, most police authorities need about a 5.5 per cent. increase just to stand still. They are between a rock and a hard place. The assessment carried out by Norfolk is that, if we are lucky, the increase will be between 3 and 4 per cent., which means that we will be out by about 1 per cent. As he pointed out, the options are limited. One example is efficiency savings, which, as other hon. Members have said, can be made largely in terms of manpower. Indeed, 85 per cent. of most police funding in police authorities goes on that. There is a threat to get rid of civilian staff, which all chief constables would be reluctant to do, with the absurd possibility that uniformed staff would have to go back into head office. That would undercut all the increases in uniformed policing. Another option is to raise the police precept.

Mr. Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that the logical conclusion of his argument is that, if police officers have to go back to civilian tasks, ultimately the Home Office grant will fall as the number of policemen falls?

Mr. Simpson: Yes, we are in a bad Catch-22 position. The alternative is that the police precept might have to be raised. The experience of people in Norfolk is unlike that of the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Campbell), as they knew only too well what part of the council tax was being affected by the rise in the police precept. There is no doubt that the Government are also determined to cap those areas that are thinking of raising the local tax.

I have a simple question for the Minister: if we are between a rock and a hard place, what are we going to do about it? The problem is not one for the police to solve and it is not particularly one for local councils. It is a problem that the Home Office has given us and we want an answer.

I have a final important point to make about Norfolk. Several grants are specifically ring-fenced and tied to the Home Office, and they can be applied to areas such as Norfolk and others. I refer, for example, to the crime fighting fund and to the rural policing fund, which is worth about £2 million per annum to Norfolk. The future of the RPF is still in doubt, so I would be grateful if the Minister said whether Norfolk is to continue to receive that important allocation. If not, Norfolk's problem is even greater.

2.40 pm

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): I am delighted to take part in the debate, and I agree with many of the wider points that the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) made about the challenge and costs of new technology and DNA testing, and about the real problem of pensions.

I want to be more specific: I will talk about the Nottinghamshire police because, as the Minister knows, resourcing Nottingham's police has been very controversial in the area. The Minister also well knows that murder and serious and organised crime, often drug-related, have been a big issue. The cold facts are that the number of offences per officer and per head of population appears to be the highest in the country, which has led to some disillusionment. Just a few days ago, the shadow Home Secretary compared Nottingham to Chicago in prohibition days. Gedling Conservatives are putting out a leaflet that says:

> "We are ashamed of where we live".

I am not ashamed of where I live; I am proud of the honest, decent Nottingham people, and I am backing their effort. My good friend and colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Vernon Coaker), and my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell) are also backing them in putting in place community safety initiatives to build partnerships so that our children are safe on the streets.

People who make such claims are ignorant of the facts. Again, I quote the Gedling Conservatives, who say that the chief constable is

> "having to spin the crime statistics to hide failure" and that the police and politicians

> "will fiddle the figures and spin deceit."

The facts are rather different, although there is no doubt that Nottinghamshire police have underperformed.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): I certainly do not want to discourage the hon. Gentleman from quoting the excellent literature put out by the hard-working prospective Conservative parliamentary candidate in Gedling, but surely he is shooting himself in the foot. He reads out literature that says that the Nottinghamshire police force is underperforming and then reveals that statistics show that Nottingham's force is indeed one of the least well performing in the country.

Paddy Tipping: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman has endorsed Gedling Conservatives' comments that they are ashamed of where they live. Given that he used to represent the area, that is quite disgraceful.

The performance of Nottinghamshire police is improving under the chief constable. In the past six months, crime has come down by 13.4 per cent. In particular, burglary and vehicle crime are down, and the number of offences in the past six months is down by 10,803 compared with the previous six months. That is the kind of performance that I applaud and I stick up for. I also stick up for the fact that Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary and the police standards unit have been working closely with Nottinghamshire police to achieve those results. That police authority is going forward; it should not be put down.

Of course, we need more resources. Only last Thursday, my hon. Friends the Members for Gedling and for Nottingham, East met the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety yet again to argue for extra resources for Nottinghamshire police. Again, I quote the excellent literature that we have talked about, which makes this accusation:

> "The Government refuses to give us more police and Gedling's MP has never even raised the issue in Parliament."

The number of police in Nottinghamshire is at a record level. In the past three years, an extra 303 officers have been recruited, backed by 71 new community support officers. In private—he cannot speak publicly in Parliament—my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling has been assiduous and robust on the issue. I must say that my view differs slightly from his in that he has campaigned vigorously for extra police for Nottinghamshire, and I back him on that, while I want improved performance, too. We are beginning to see the results of improved performance.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety will reflect on her visit to Nottingham only last Thursday and consider ways to reward Nottinghamshire police. I hope that she has listened carefully to the pleas that we have made privately about the need to tackle serious and organised crime in the county. In particular, there will be an opportunity fairly soon to make decisions and announcements on police community support officers.

People in Gedling, Nottingham and Hucknall—across Nottinghamshire—want a greater police presence on our streets. I applaud yesterday's statement and look forward to seeing more police officers and more community support officers in Nottingham so that we can all be jointly proud of Nottingham and of Nottinghamshire.

Several hon. Members rose—

Miss Anne Begg (in the Chair): Order. If all those hon. Members who want to speak are to be able to do so, speeches will have to be kept to three minutes. I would very much appreciate hon. Members' assistance in that.

2.46 pm

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) on securing the debate. There is no doubt that shortfalls in police authority funding are a problem throughout the country. Nowhere is their effect more pronounced, proportionally, however, than in the Bedfordshire police authority.

Let me say straight away that the force itself is not to blame. Early-day motion 1830 makes it clear that the force, although historically underfunded by central Government, has nevertheless > "achieved the highest level of cashable efficiency savings of any police authority in England and Wales over the last five years with the highest proportion of officers undertaking front line policing duties".

However, even with the expected increases in council tax and central Government funding, and despite raiding its modest £1 million reserves, which exist only because of the force's effective governance, Bedfordshire police remains set to suffer a £2.2 million shortfall—the equivalent of losing 75 constables.

That shortfall cannot be plugged indefinitely by using council tax to fund essential services, and nor can we reasonably expect the force to make further cuts when it is already operating at the top end of the range of efficiency targets set out by the Government. The only option is likely to be a cut in personnel. Although I accept that efficiency is a virtue and that more should be done with less, once a force is efficient, as the Government recognise the Bedfordshire police force to be, any new demands are likely to require extra resources.

As we know, Bedfordshire police authority has made the efficiency savings demanded by the Treasury, with 83 per cent. of its budget going directly on staffing costs. Any further reduction in the back-room staff essential to keep the force operational is likely to mean that police officers will have to be taken off the beat to fulfil those functions. There is little room to cut already minimal administrative costs when Bedfordshire is feeling the funding shortfall ever more intensely because of pressure from the Metropolitan police, the pension time bomb, the requirement for the normal maintenance of expenditure, and the need to update technology and equipment.

A further squeeze is likely to come from the possible imposition by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister of a low cap on council tax. The proportion of Bedfordshire police authority budget met from council tax has risen from 14.5 per cent. in 1995–96 to 25.5 per cent. in 2004–05. Although local taxes from a historically underfunded county should not compensate for the lack of funding for essential services that are imposed by, and are the responsibility of, central Government, the removal of the option to plug the central Government funding shortfall has created another hole in the police budget.

The third squeeze on Bedfordshire's police budget comes from the Home Office, which, quite understandably, is imposing demands to put crime prevention at the top of the agenda. However, the Home Office's grand rhetoric and initiatives are not being matched by funding. Similarly, the ring-fencing of available funding, such as for CSOs and so on, is limiting the county's flexibility to decide how best to spend money, even though those concerned are in the best position to be able to do so. I believe that Bedfordshire police has more than fulfilled the Government's demands of it. If the county's policing is, at the very least, to stand still, let alone improve, the Government must put their money where their rhetoric is.

2.50 pm

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I shall spend one moment emphasising the importance of diversity in the police force. I do so in the light of the sneering response that I received from the—somewhat illiberal—hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) when I invited him, in what I thought was a friendly way, not to use sexist language in talking about the composition of the police force. I point out how much his attitude contrasts with that displayed yesterday, publicly and properly, by the Home Secretary, who announced a range of policies intended to encourage diversity in the police force. The Home Secretary made it clear that, unlike the hon. Member for Yeovil, he understands that the police force has lagged behind and needs policies to catch up in its diversity targets.

Women in Redcar, as everywhere else, frequently need the assistance of the police, particularly in response to sexual offences, of which there are a large number and for which the conviction rate is 7.2 per cent. Women find it infinitely easier to talk about such matters with women police officers. Domestic violence is also still an epidemic in this country, producing one phone call every minute to a police force somewhere, every day of every year. Yet the conviction rate is still lower than that for sexual offences. Similarly, women find it easier to talk to women police officers about domestic violence. Truly, in many situations, where women may be being oppressed by antisocial behaviour or by their own delinquent children, they find it easier to talk to women police officers about their needs. It is therefore not political correctness for the Home Office to say in its latest pronouncements that diversity in the police force is key.

Mr. Laws: Will the hon. and learned Lady give way?

Vera Baird: No, not now. It is a great shame that the sexist language that the hon. Gentleman deployed shows that he has not understood—[Interruption.] I am afraid that he is making his lack of understanding even clearer as I speak. He has not understood the importance of language in trying to encourage people who are not of the usual kind into a new field of operation.

Before I move on to Cleveland police, which is more important than the hon. Gentleman's inability to understand the modern world, I should like to give him an example from my past. As a barrister, I used to receive letters from the Court of Appeal—happily they no longer come—that said that counsel at the appeal must ensure that "he" tells "his" client that "his" responsibility is to do such-and-such and that "he" must always encourage such-and-such. The consequence of an address of that kind and the use of words such as "manning" is to make it perfectly clear that women are not the norm in a field of activity, but are rather unusual, and to make them feel somewhat peculiar to have ventured into it. Such language is the utter opposite of encouraging. Indeed, talking to a woman about increasing "manning" in the police force is about the same as talking to a black person about increasing the number of white people in the police force.

I hope that the hon. Member for Yeovil will start to understand the significance of sexist language—although I doubt he will—and I compliment the Home Secretary, who does understand it. The proposals to recruit more diversely, to train in a less residential way, which is obviously difficult for women to follow through on, and to ensure that duties and working hours are more family friendly are long overdue and hugely welcome. Police community support officer posts have proved a ripe source of recruitment from women and black and minority ethnic people. That development has helped with antisocial behaviour and other community problems and with diversity.

I want to sketch in a tiny amount of background on Cleveland—the police service that serves Redcar. There are two points that I want my hon. Friend the Minister to keep in mind. Cleveland police force found a £7.3 million black hole in its finances earlier this year. Imagine the impact of that discovery on the public, coming as it did in the immediate aftermath of a campaign—conducted, I am sure, in good faith by the chief constable—asking for an increase of 29 per cent. in the precept, in order, inter alia, to give every ward a police constable. That campaign was conducted on a roadshow basis but, far from being able to achieve what had been planned, the police needed to put the moneys into the black hole to try to bolster the finances.

A new chief constable was then appointed—Mr. Price, who is rightly not being blamed. It is clear that the old Cleveland police authority had not kept itself as well informed as it might have done. Of course, the National Audit Office was involved, and so was Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. No one was misappropriating funds, but the National Audit Office said that there had been a culture of unbridled growth in Cleveland police, with too little regard for financial management. That had not been challenged by the police authority. Part of what went wrong was insufficient attention to the need to keep balances and reserves high. It was clear by the beginning of this year that Cleveland police reserves were very small indeed.

The Audit Commission reports that the chief constable, the new police authority and the management are working well together. Their next budget and their next financial year, will remain extremely difficult, however, for two reasons. First, Cleveland police force is 30 years old this year, which means that it has a very large number of officers who are going to retire. As I understand it, the availability of pension funding for them must be calculated on the basis that 50 per cent. of them will retire with only 30 days' notice. Consequently, it is important that balances are kept in hand for that. It is probably right to say that pensions will make a higher-than-ordinary impact on policing in Cleveland in the next year or so.

Secondly, the National Audit Office severely criticised the running down of balances by the previous administration in Cleveland police force. Very properly, the current chief constable has spent a good deal of the last finance to be received, both from precept and from grant, on replenishing those balances. However, they are still extremely small.

Because significant balances are not available, it will be very difficult, if there is a shortfall in pension provision or if the expected resignations occur, to meet any shortfall out of balances. It will also be difficult for the current chief constable, whose police force has recently been criticised extraordinarily strongly for the running down of balances, to take more out of them in the teeth of that criticism to fund any shortfall—

Miss Anne Begg (in the Chair): Order. The hon. and learned Lady has had plenty of time. I want to call one more hon. Member for the last minute.

2.59 pm

Mr. Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): Thank you, Miss Begg; I am not sure what I can say in a minute, but I want to put on the record some issues relating to Lincolnshire, which was the only police authority in England and Wales in 2003–04 to have its funding per head reduced. I want an assurance from the Minister this afternoon that that trend will not continue in the forthcoming financial settlement.

Lincolnshire police authority faces an extra £6.9 million in costs in the financial year 2005–06, £1.8 million of which is specifically for the increased burden of police pensions. Will the Minister and the Home Office consider making a special one-off payment to offset this year's pensions bulge for Lincolnshire police authority?

Early indications are that the Government will provide only a 3 per cent. increase in grant, which leaves Lincolnshire to find £3.9 million from council tax. That shortfall will lead to an increase of up to 20 per cent. in the precept on local people in Lincolnshire, which is totally unacceptable. People realise that they must make a contribution, but it should be a fair one. There is a massive disparity of more than 50 per cent. between the allocation of funding per head in Lincolnshire, which was £102.31 in the 2003–04 financial year, and that in the constituency of the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Campbell), which is £166 per head. That is completely unacceptable. In this day and age, people in rural areas suffer many of the same problems of drugs and other criminal activity as those in urban areas.

I urge the Minister to ensure that Lincolnshire receives a fair share of police funding. If the police authority received funding at the national average, never mind at the level suggested by the hon. Member for Tynemouth, there would be up to £15 million more to spend, which would enable it to provide a full and proper service to the people of Lincolnshire.

3.1 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): This has been an extraordinarily useful and timely debate. It is a great shame that not all Members have had the opportunity to contribute to it, but I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) on introducing it. I could, if I were so minded, come in behind him on matters that pertain to Avon and Somerset, as he is my parliamentary neighbour and I have worked very closely with him over the years in trying to ensure that proper resources are allocated to the Avon and Somerset constabulary.

The paradox is that we are finally having some success. East Somerset is getting a few extra officers on the beat as well as community support officers, which we welcome. Indeed, I will see newly appointed officers this Friday and will welcome them to the area. That has been a long time coming. We were without the resources for many years under the previous Government, and have spent many years under this one without them. What we are trying to say today is that we do not want to turn the clock back again as a result of this year's settlement. If we do not obtain the resources, we will simply not be able to concentrate on areas in which the Government and all Members, whatever their political hue, want action to be taken.

We want greater visibility in rural areas of our constituencies and a greater police presence in the neighbourhoods of our cities. We want effective work to be done on prolific offenders, which Avon and Somerset has been particularly good at, but it is an expensive option that needs resources to make it work. We want better drug interdiction, and burglaries and car crime to continue to be driven down. We want the work on domestic violence to be enhanced. Indeed, we debated that in our consideration of the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill. We particularly want an effective response to gang warfare, which is all too prevalent in some of our cities—Bristol is no exception.

Mr. Roger Williams: My hon. Friend may remember that the rural policing grant was omitted from the police settlement when that was first announced last year, and reinstated only after lobbying. Does he agree that the Minister could perform a great service today if she confirmed that the rural policing grant will be included in the police settlement?

Mr. Heath: The Minister certainly could do that. She may have made that commitment when we debated the matter recently in response to a debate on West Mercia police, but I will ask her to repeat it today for the benefit of Members who are present.

In recent years, we have seen an increase in police numbers, which is welcome. Less welcome is the fact that it has been funded largely by the council tax payer. We welcome the fact that the Government have allowed that expansion, but we are concerned that they should take credit for it as though the money came from Government resources. In reality, much of the increase has been paid for by local tax payers through the council tax.

For all the reasons that I have given, we want to see more activity, particularly in the more obscure areas covered in the excellent White Paper published yesterday. I give credit to the Government for that—it contains much that we support—but we want the resources to make it happen. Investment is needed now if we are to release officers on to the street and away from their bureaucratic burdens. That cannot be done without cost; there is a front-loading cost to be met if we are to provide the technology that enables the police to pursue their activities on the street, which is where we want them to be.

Many police authority areas have unavoidable commitments, and pensions are a big component of that. We have debated the difficulties of pensions many times. Indeed, I have often repeated the assurance that I was given by the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (David Maclean) in 1996 that it would all be dealt with—but it was not dealt with then, nor since. The Government are at last bringing forward proposals, but we remain to be persuaded that the funds are available to resource those proposals without affecting direct policing.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): Surrey has the highest precept; Surrey people pay 43 per cent. for police funding despite savings of £15.9 million, and they are now at risk of paying more than 50 per cent. Does my hon. Friend agree that one then has to decide who comes first in policing matters—the Home Secretary or the local people, who are paying so much directly?

Mr. Heath: My hon. Friend is right. The Surrey police authority was explicit in its advice to its members. It said:

> "The present funding gap is £350 million UK-wide, and £11.3 million in Surrey; without a change in this situation there will be cuts."

The chief constable of Hampshire constabulary, Paul Kernaghan, said:

> "I am very conscious that the level of grant announced to date is insufficient to maintain our current level of service."

Norfolk constabulary made exactly the same point:

> "By far the largest expenditure item in all constabulary is staff salaries, yet the government now effectively controls police officer establishment levels by means of the Crime Fighting Fund—reductions in police officers result in commensurate reductions in grant."

Devon and Cornwall succinctly said that the lack of resources affects performance.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, according to the police authority, the gap is 6.9 per cent. in Hertfordshire? Does he share my worry that many home county authorities have a retention problem because London is able to pay £4,000 more per officer?

Mr. Heath: I certainly understand that, but I understand also that the lack of area cost adjustment payments means that many peripheral forces are disadvantaged; they are paying the same scale rates as many of the home county forces, but without the resources to support those payments.

We do not have enough time to do justice to the subject. I am aware of the many pressures on the Home Office budget this year. The burgeoning prison population is a huge drain, as are the pressures caused by asylum and immigration. The need to invest in new technologies and the Government's scheme for identity cards, if it goes ahead, will also have a huge effect on finances. We have yet to discover the costs of the serious and organised crime agency, a measure that I entirely support, but I want to know from where the funding will come.

What worries many of us is not that chief constables and police authorities are engaged in some perverse shroud waving simply for effect—they provide the front-line services on which we depend—but that they are taking a candid look at what is needed for next year. They realise that something approaching 3 per cent. will not be adequate, as it will not meet their needs. Although it may not result in fewer police officers, they say that it will certainly result in cuts to front-line services because civilianisation will be put into reverse and police officers will be put back into the police stations to do the backroom jobs. Chief constables and the police authorities are expressing a real concern.

I know from experience in my area that basic command unit commanders are being asked to bring forward budgets for consideration that show real-term cuts. That is what the Government's present spending figures imply. Those who are most committed to the objective of reducing crime, which we share with the Government, will be the hardest hit if the budgets go ahead.

The Home Office needed this debate and it needs more such debates, because it has a battle to win with the Treasury to ensure that the police service gets the funds needed to do the job. I regard the deferral of the announcement as a good sign that perhaps matters are being reconsidered. I welcome what the Home Secretary said yesterday. He pulled half a rabbit out of a hat—if that is not a rather macabre vision—in making it clear that some rethinking is going on.

The Minister needs to confirm that the settlement will be above 3 per cent. and to tell us whether the floors and ceilings will be retained, whether there is any intention to cap police authorities—that would be wholly counter-productive in the coming year—and whether the rural policing fund, which we are told will have no inflation component, will persist beyond the coming year.

Most of all, the Minister needs to tell us whether the Government are really committed to what they say in "Building Communities, Beating Crime: A better police service for the 21st century", the new White Paper. It contains 10 commitments to the police service. Commitment 4 is that the police service should be confident that > "policing is being supported properly by Government—with officers and staff having the resources, powers and equipment they need to do their jobs effectively".

That is the key to good policing and what many people up and down the country will expect from the Home Secretary and the Minister in years to come. However, it is currently under threat.

3.11 pm

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) on securing the debate and on the way in which he presented his case. He made a point about increased crime throughout our country, a point to which I shall return. He also talked about the increased costs imposed on the police and he warned of present and future difficulties. Many of my hon. Friends and I have recognised the strength of his argument. It is clear that much Liberal thinking has now embraced the policies of my party as we go forward with developments in respect of the police. I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he said.

A point made by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) is equally important: all of us here today are seeking to strengthen the Minister's hand in her negotiations with the Treasury to ensure that the settlement is fair and acceptable. Although I have harsh things to say about the Government's performance in that regard, I hope that if she takes one thing away from the debate, it will be that in the three main political parties, there is a strong view that the police service and therefore our constituents could be short-changed by the settlement that we receive this year. We very much hope that she will be able to ensure that that does not happen.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for enabling me to get at least a toehold in this important debate. I want to speak on behalf of the Metropolitan Police Authority. I would like the Minister, in the luxury of the 10 minutes that she has available, to say something about the largest police authority in the country.

Mr. Mitchell: I am pleased to have given way to my hon. Friend, not least because hon. Members were deprived of hearing a speech from him in this important debate.

We heard a most interesting contribution from the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Campbell). He, too, urged the Minister to get a good settlement from the Treasury. I suspect that, with some of the coded words that he used, he was warning her of the importance of that. He suggested that not everyone believes that community support officers are the panacea that the Government think they are. Opposition Members do not oppose CSOs, but we think it a mistake to increase so substantially the funding for them and to increase the number of such officers without any proper independent and reliable evaluation. If we saw such an evaluation, we might have more sympathy with the Government's argument.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson), as ever, stood up for Norfolk and argued forcefully about the difficulties facing the county. We then heard the most remarkable speech of the day, from the hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping). I saw the phalanx of Nottinghamshire Members of Parliament here today and asked myself what they were doing. Nottinghamshire MPs have a reputation for rugged individuality. On the speech of the hon. Member for Sherwood, I will only suggest strongly that the Minister listens more carefully to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) and the hon. Members for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) and for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) about how she should deal with policing in Nottinghamshire. Secondly, what I take away from the hon. Gentleman's contribution—I shall be on the phone shortly after this debate—is the good news for the Gedling Conservatives. Clearly, Labour is in trouble in Gedling. There is no other conceivable reason why he could have made such a speech. I give way to him with the greatest of pleasure.

Paddy Tipping: I am sure that the Conservatives in Gedling will be interested that the hon. Gentleman endorses the comments that they are disgusted and ashamed of the area where they live. They will take it from him because they will remember him as a failed Member there.

Mr. Mitchell: I rest my case. It is clear that the Labour party is worried about what is happening in Gedling. I neither endorse nor repudiate what was said by the Gedling Conservatives. They are doing a first-class job in standing up for the people of my old constituency.

Reluctantly, I must move on. We heard an excellent speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) about the squeeze on his local police force. We then heard from the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), who was unduly hard on the hon. Member for Yeovil. I agree that diversity in the police is enormously important, and although I did not agree with everything that she said, she made a most powerful and eloquent argument about that. My hon. Friend the Member for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds) made his points forcefully for the Lincolnshire police force in a remarkable speech; he managed to get so much into such a short period.

I fear that I will run out of time quite soon but I want to make a number of key points, which I hope tie together some of my hon. Friends' comments. The question of how we pay for the police is at the heart of the debate. Under this Government, there has been a dramatic shift in funding responsibility to the council tax payer. The average precept increase is 20 per cent. in this financial year. The precept increase in North Yorkshire was more than 75 per cent., and it was more than 50 per cent. in Gloucestershire. Police expenditure financed through council tax has doubled in real terms between 1997 and 2004. Council tax now accounts for 20 per cent. of police force expenditure, compared with only 12 per cent. before. The police precept has increased by 87 per cent.

One of the points that our constituents notice is that if one assumes the cost of a police officer is about £50,000, that precept increase could have paid for more than 19,000 officers, instead of the 13,900 that we have received. The council tax precept has paid for increased police numbers, not the Government, and the public have been short-changed out of something like 5,000 police officers.

The police will suffer some serious effects. In the west midlands, which has a police force that serves some 2.5 million people and covers the three major centres of Birmingham—Britain's second city—Coventry and Wolverhampton, crime is at very high levels. The force is fully stretched. It has been seriously affected by the Government's meddling with the police grant funding formula. It lost out by £27 million in the funding settlement because the amount to which it was entitled, according to the Government's funding formula, was capped by the introduction of floors and ceilings. The force lost out again in the 2004–05 funding settlement by a further £27 million because of the flat increase of 3.25 per cent.

Those are serious factors that affect the west midlands. I know that the Minister has some sympathy with the case that we have put in the west midlands, but it would be remiss of me not to stand up for the force in the area that I represent. There is no doubt that recorded crime has risen hugely under this Government. It has risen by some 16 per cent. It is up from 5 million crimes to nearly 5.9 million crimes. Violence against the person is up 90 per cent. Sexual offences are up 44 per cent. Violent crime under this Government has risen by 83 per cent. Robbery is up 51 per cent. Criminal damage is up 37 per cent.

The ultimate condemnation of the Government's performance lies in how detection rates have fallen. Detection rates for violence against the person have fallen from 79 per cent. to 50 per cent., for sex crimes from 77 per cent. to below 40 per cent., for robbery from 27 per cent. to 18 per cent., and for criminal damage from 19 per cent. to 13 per cent.

The Minister appears to be in a state of denial about crime. She mouths to our constituents that crime has fallen under this Government, but the opposite is the truth. She must realise that part of coming to terms with reality is to accept, rather like a drunk, that the first phase of recovery is to acknowledge what the problem actually is. I hope she will say today that she is determined to persuade the Treasury to implement the Conservative party's proposals for an extra 40,000 police, and that she will set about a return to the detection rates that her Government inherited in 1997. She must stop the endless passion of the Home Office for ring-fencing funding and interfering. I hope that in her debates and arguments with the Treasury she will try to ensure that some of the enormous extra tax that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken is directed to helping our communities by increasing the money that central Government provide to police forces.

3.21 pm

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): I congratulate the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) on securing the debate. It is clear from the number of hon. Members present that we are all concerned about policing and tackling crime and antisocial behaviour in our constituencies. It is also a testament to the lobbying powers of the Association of Police Authorities and the Association of Chief Police Officers, which have made a good case to Members of Parliament.

This has been a very cheerful debate; until the contribution of the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell), I was going to say that it had been good-tempered, too. If I were still a Minister at the Department of Health, I might be inclined to give him a bit of advice about his blood pressure.

Many contributions were the result of assumptions about the level of police grant and of precept and uncertainty about how far police forces will be able to drive through their cashable and non-cashable efficiency gains. My hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Campbell) made a very good contribution about efficiency.

There are several imponderables in our current position on police funding, some of which will become clearer in the next few weeks. Hon. Members press me about funding, and I try to keep as a straight a face as I can—it is a little like playing poker. Before the formal settlement is made, I cannot talk about the general level of police grant or the specific grants other than to reaffirm what I have already said about the rural policing grant, which is that it is £30 million and is distributed to about 31 forces. It will still be around for the next year, because we recognise that it has been a great help to many of the forces mentioned by hon. Members.

Mr. Prisk: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Blears: I will not, as I have only seven minutes to try to cover all the points that hon. Members raised.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Yeovil for acknowledging the improvements that have been made. Many hon. Members also acknowledged that an increased numbers of police officers and community support officers have been out in the community in the last couple of years giving the public the reassurance that they want from the police service, and I am delighted about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth mentioned the pilot study on the civilianisation of the custody function in his constituency. It is one of the most ambitious work force modernisation pilots, which has released 93 police officers for front-line activity, and it is a good example of efficiency.

Hon. Members, including my hon. Friend, asked about the allocation of community support officers, and I am considering my submission on that at present. The fund available is oversubscribed by almost 100 per cent. We have had bids for £100 million, but we have £50 million, so I shall need to make the allocations carefully.

I am delighted that the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) acknowledged the progress made. He raised the issue of funding for a helicopter; helicopters have to be funded partly by a contribution from the force, and Norfolk has not so far been prepared to make a contribution, but the door is still open if it wants to discuss the matter further.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping), in an excellent and passionate contribution, reminded me of my visit last Thursday and Friday to Nottingham, where I met police officers, local leaders and residents. I saw the video ID suite, which saves a fortune, and met the robbery team, who are out on the streets driving down robbery.

Despite his position as a Government Whip and his inability to make contributions in the opening part of parliamentary proceedings, my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Vernon Coaker) has been a champion for his local area. He has lobbied me for more police officers, community support officers and funding. I can barely walk through Parliament without him constantly stopping me on behalf of his community. I am delighted that the performance of Nottinghamshire police is improving, and we must ensure that investment is used to its best effect. I have received a further report in the past week from Nottingham about the problems of serious and organised crime, and I will deal with it carefully.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) made an important contribution about diversity. Recruiting more women is important in implementing some of the findings of the White Paper, but we also need a different relationship, culture and set of skills in the police force. We need to recruit more from black and minority ethnic communities and more disabled people. We want the police force to look like the communities it serves.

My hon. and learned Friend spoke about the £7.5 million gap in the budget of Cleveland police. There have clearly been difficulties with financial management in the force. I shall ask officials to engage with the force to see what can be done, but I cannot offer specific extra funding today. I am conscious of the difficulties in that community.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) welcomed much of the ongoing improvement. He mentioned technology. With video ID suites, automatic number plate recognition and fingerprinting improvements, we are driving through efficiencies so that we can continue to provide good police services with the available resources.

Several hon. Members mentioned that local precepts have risen to fund extra officers. In fact, 9,650 of the extra 13,000 police officers have been funded through the crime fighting fund rather than through local precepts. I entirely acknowledge that local people have made a big contribution to providing extra officers, but a huge amount has come from central Government funding—we still provide nearly 80 per cent. of police funding. Although local percentage increases have risen, there has been a massive increase in Government funds.

The allegations from the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield and his intemperate expression of the current situation contrast with what everyone else has said. People have spoken about improvements on the ground, more police officers, performance increases, people feeling safer in their communities and crime falling by 30 per cent. Let us not judge him on what he says, but on the record of his party. There were 11,000 fewer police officers under the Conservatives, and crime doubled. It is easy for him to talk intemperately about these issues, but I ask him to reflect on his party's record, and I ask other hon. Members to judge the Conservatives on what they did, not what they say.

I hope to provide a good police grant settlement. The Home Secretary said yesterday that we are doing everything possible to generate a realistic police grant, as we did last year. We took £140 million from the rest of the Home Office and put it into police grant because we recognised how important tackling crime and antisocial behaviour is for constituents in their communities.

Finally, I shall turn to pensions. There is a pensions increase for most authorities this year. Some authorities have managed to put away £161 million in reserves. Authorities knew that they would have a spike in pensions on retirements, but I appreciate that it is a difficult situation. Rather than delaying, the Government have sought to change the pension scheme from next year, to iron out volatility and avoid peaks and troughs. However, the combination of authorities' reserves, potential efficiencies, a reasonable police grant and a reasonable precept should enable us to carry on providing the excellent levels of policing and community safety on which the Government have a proud record.

Gypsy Encampment (Minety)

3.30 pm

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): I am very pleased to have the opportunity to raise an extremely important constituency issue. For the record, the correct pronunciation is "Mine-tee", and a wonderful place it is, too. However, in recent weeks and months—indeed, it is getting on for two years—what was a peaceful and remote rural village has, in effect, been wrecked by the presence of 50 or 60 Gypsy caravans, whose owners have illegally occupied a greenfield site.

This is a timely debate because the issue affects not only Minety, but a great many other places throughout England. Most notable among them are Smithy Fen near Cottenham, where the problem that I am about to describe is particularly bad, and North Curry in Somerset, which has recently had the Minety experience again. So the debate is of more than purely constituency interest, and the Minister's reply will be of interest to hon. Members from throughout England. Indeed, even the Prime Minister suggested at Prime Minister's Question Time last Wednesday that he would leave no stone unturned in seeking a solution to this intractable problem, so we are looking forward to hearing what the Minister has to say on his behalf.

Under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, we could remove Gypsies when they were illegally camped on public or private land. That was easily done; it was a good Act and it worked rather well. In recent years, however, the pattern has changed: instead of illegally entering public or private land, Gypsies purchase land and occupy it covertly, having put it around that they want it for agricultural purposes. They nearly always invade the site after office hours on a Friday evening so that the local district council has gone home for the weekend. They breach the hedges, bringing in dozens of lorries of hardcore to lay down hard standing. They bring cesspits and even lay on electricity and, in many cases, telephones. An army of caravans then arrives—in my constituency, it was 50 or 60, but there were even more in Cambridgeshire, which was a particularly bad case. The same happened in Newbury and a variety of other places. By Monday morning, when the district council returns to work, it finds a well established Gypsy encampment of 50 or 100 caravans.

The Gypsies then put in a retrospective planning application for the site, which the district council, of course, turns down. Naturally enough, the Gypsies go to appeal on the issue. Attempts are made to remove them. In my constituency, Wiltshire county council tried to use highways matters in the High Court to do that, but the court will defer any such removal action until an appeal has been heard, which, by definition, may be a year to 18 months from the date of the illegal occupation. If the Gypsies take the matter further—they have talked about going to the European Court of Human Rights and to other organisations—it could be several months or years before proper action is taken to end what, by anybody's standards, is an illegal occupation.

The Gypsies seem to hope that inertia will set in and that people will say that it is easier to leave them where they are than to remove them because they have been there for such a long time. Well, I can tell them that, as far as Minety goes, they have chosen the wrong village. People there are up in arms in a big way about the issue. I have held two public meetings, both of which were attended by 400 extremely angry people who wanted to take all kinds of action to have the Gypsies removed.

If the Gypsies think that the MP for the area is a pushover, they have made a mistake there, too. I assure those Gypsies, who are making the lives of several of my constituents hell—I use the word advisedly—that if they think we will roll over and let them stay, they are quite wrong. I have been to two or three such debates in this Chamber, so I know that the same applies to several other areas, where the Member of Parliament is fighting the case very hard.

The debate is particularly timely because, on Monday, the Select Committee on Office of the Deputy Prime Minister produced what, in many ways, was a carefully researched and thought through report on the problem. I welcome the fact that the Committee has done that work, and we look forward to the Government's response. However, I have no hesitation in taking issue with one of the main conclusions reached by the Select Committee—that the solution to the kind of illegal occupancy of land that I have described in Minety is the provision of more Gypsy sites throughout England. The Committee seems to think that if we provide enough Gypsy sites for the 3,500 caravans that are illegally parked at present, that will solve the problem.

If that is the case, where will those sites be built? They would be small sites—perhaps 10 caravans per site—and we would therefore be looking for 300 or 350 more sites just for a few caravans. Given that we are talking only about rural constituencies, that would probably mean three or four proper Gypsy caravan sites in each of those rural constituencies. My constituency would doubtless be one of them, and if I was challenged to find three or four sites for a legal Gypsy encampment in North Wiltshire, I would be hard pressed to do so—indeed, I would not consider doing so.

The Committee's conclusion also ignores the fact that the Gypsies do not seem to want to go to certain parts of England—they seem to want to go to particular places—and also that they do not want to go on to local authority sites. In Wiltshire, for example, we have an abundance of local authority sites—perhaps I exaggerate my case a little by using the word "abundance"—but there are certainly vacancies on local authority sites in Wiltshire. Indeed, a new site was recently opened outside Salisbury. The Gypsies in Minety left a local authority site in Swindon—a legitimate, sensible local authority site—and moved on to their own land.

The pattern appears to be that Gypsies do not to want to live on local authority sites, but on land that they themselves own. I rather encourage that. It seems to me to be eminently sensible to encourage them to set up their own sites legally and with proper planning permission. Local authorities ought to set aside and designate land for Gypsy encampments. The Gypsies could then buy that land and put an encampment on it. That seems a sensible way forward, whereas invading a site and then seeking retrospective planning permission will not work.

[Mr. James Gray]

There is also a problem of what I would describe as a Parkinson's law of Gypsies: there has been an enormous increase in the number of Gypsies in England, which shows no sign of abating. I remember that in the early 1960s, when the original legislation on Gypsy encampments was passed, there were 3,000 caravans in England and about 1,700 illegally parked. Today, there are about 6,000 Gypsy caravans on council-approved sites, 5,000 on private sites, and about 4,000 that are illegally parked—something like 15,000 in total. In other words, the numbers have increased four times since the 1960s.

Recently, I asked a Gypsy at a meeting that I held with them, "Where on earth are all these Gypsies coming from?" and received probably the most disarming response that I have experienced at any recent meeting. He replied, "From their mothers, I reckon." However, I do not think that that is the case—although doubtless they had something to do with it. I suspect that a significant number of Gypsies are coming in from Ireland and Romania. There is a significant influx of Gypsies into England at present and, with the expansion of the European Union, that process will doubtless continue.

I therefore do not accept that simply increasing the number of sites available—putting some sort of requirement on local authorities to provide sites—would necessarily solve the problem. In that context, I am glad to have read a press release in which the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister gave an initial reaction to the Select Committee's report. It stated:

> "A duty to provide sites is not necessarily an appropriate solution. A duty has been tried before and often did not produce sufficient or appropriate provision. A duty which relates solely to the Gypsy and Traveller community reinforces the view that they should be dealt with outside the mainstream housing system."

I hope that the Minister will reiterate that statement today, and confirm that placing some kind of obligation on local authorities to provide more sites would not necessarily solve the problem.

The second point on which many people watching the debate today will be keen to hear a clear statement from the Minister relates to the fact that a number of recent court cases concerning Gypsies have rested to a significant degree on the Human Rights Act 1998. There is some lack of clarity as to whether the Human Rights Act can be used in planning law during consideration of whether to allow those sites. In the recent Chichester case, the media's interpretation was that the Act had led the judge to allow the Gypsies to remain, although I think that that was a misinterpretation of the judgment. In a recent case in Cottenham, the judge delayed any decision on the site pending a legal challenge by the Gypsies using the 1998 Act. In that case, the judge commented that the Gypsies were holding a gun to the head of the councils.

Will the Minister confirm the stance taken by the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper) at our meeting about six months ago, to which I took a group of councillors and officers from Wiltshire county council and North Wiltshire district council? At that meeting, I asked her whether the Human Rights Act 1998 should have anything to do with planning issues with regard to Gypsies, and she gave a reply that she then confirmed in writing. Her letter states:

> "The European Convention on Human Rights and the Human Rights Act do not grant Gypsies immunity from planning legislation."

She said also that local planning authorities, inspectors and the Secretary of State have always had to comply with convention rights

> "whether the cases involve Gypsies or non-Gypsies."

That sums it up exactly: Gypsies and non-Gypsies alike must conform to planning law, and the fact that some people happen to be of a nomadic frame of mind should not give any presumption in their favour in planning law. They must go through the same processes that any other constituent of mine would have to go through if they wanted to set up their holiday caravan in a field. There is no reason why a person who calls himself a Gypsy, Traveller, new-age Traveller or any of the other descriptions around, should have a presumption in their favour. The presumption against allowing such things should apply to them in the same way as to anyone else.

The European Court of Human Rights confirmed that approach in the Chapman case of 2001, in which it said that any kind of presumption in favour of Gypsies would be > "tantamount to imposing on the United Kingdom . . . an obligation . . . to make available to the Gypsy community an adequate number of suitably equipped sites."

The court said that it was not convinced that the human rights convention could be interpreted to allow

> "such a far-reaching . . . obligation of general social policy" to be imposed on member states.

So, the ECHR seems to have laid down that the Human Rights Act does not apply, and the Under-Secretary of State seems to have confirmed that in her letter to me, but the judges in certain recent cases seem to be unclear as to whether the Human Rights Act applies. The Minister might like to use this opportunity, if he does nothing else, to shed some light on this particular legal point about the degree to which Gypsies may use the Act in seeking to obtain a retrospective planning application.

Leaving the legal question aside, it seems to me—and the Prime Minister, if he is to believed—that people in Minety, and many other places across England, should be able to remove people such as the Gypsies in Minety. They are breaking the law; they have illegally moved into a greenfield site in the middle of the countryside. No one disputes that they have broken planning law. Even the Gypsies do not dispute that; they do not say, "We are here legally." They accept that they are there illegally.

The first duty of the Government should be to come up with a mechanism whereby we can remove such people more easily and quickly. Several proposals have been put forward, most notably last year, in the private Member's Bill of an hon. Friend of mine, which would have allowed stop notices to be applied to Gypsies instantly on their discovery, and their instant removal so that they could seek prospective rather than retrospective planning permission for their site. In other words, it would have put them in precisely the same situation as any other applicant. The Ministry or the Government should tell councils such as North Wiltshire district council what they can do better to enforce the planning law.

I readily accept that there are complex legal issues—the fact that the courts are so busily occupied looking into Gypsy sites is evidence of that, but positive discrimination in favour of Gypsies is as bad as negative discrimination against them. I hope that the Minister agrees. It is plain that, in equity, Gypsies should be treated in precisely the same way as anyone else. I have no objection to their nomadic way of life; I respect that they want to live that way. If they want to settle down, I, as a local Member of Parliament, will help them with housing and other issues, but if they want to live a nomadic way of life, they should be treated the same as any constituent who does not. If they prefer to own their sites, that is fine; let us have local authority land designated specifically for Gypsy encampments, but can we please have stronger powers to enforce the will of the local people, as represented by the district councils, for when they will not do that?

Illegal Gypsy encampments of the kind at Minety seem rapidly to be becoming a national crisis. This afternoon, we look to the Minister to show us some ways out of this difficult problem.

3.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): May I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) on securing this debate on the important issue of Gypsies and Travellers and unauthorised developments in his constituency? I am sure he is right to say that the debate has a wider resonance than simply the case that concerns him. He will appreciate that I cannot comment on individual planning cases like that of Minety because of the appellate responsibilities of the Secretary of State.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister: Housing, Planning and Local Government Committee, which published its report into Gypsy and Traveller accommodation issues earlier this week. We certainly welcome the interest shown by the Select Committee. It raises many important issues that we are already considering as part of a review of Gypsy and Traveller policy. We will respond to its report in due course. I am glad he would agree that Gypsies and Travellers should enjoy the same rights as everyone else to establish a decent place to live, as long as they do so within the law. That is a point of agreement across the Chamber.

We believe in an inclusive society where members of this community have the right to pursue a traditional nomadic lifestyle and to access essential services, but I also acknowledge the problems that are often caused by unauthorised development and the concerns of the settled community when that occurs. It is for those reasons that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is currently undertaking a Gypsy and Traveller policy review. Officials will report to Ministers on the outcome of that shortly.

Mr. Gray: The Minister says "shortly", but how shortly?

Phil Hope: After many years in this place, the hon. Gentleman will know that shortly means shortly. Unfortunately, I cannot define it any more exactly. I think he will appreciate that it does not mean lengthily.

The review has a focus on equality issues for the Gypsy and Traveller community and the mainstreaming of Gypsy and Traveller issues within wider local and national policy. The review is looking at how we can encourage more publicly provided and privately owned sites and how to overcome some of the unnecessary barriers that exist to site provision. We want the planning system to reflect the mainstreaming of Gypsy and Traveller accommodation within the wider social housing context. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that at the end of his remarks. We also want it to support changes that will lead to the improvement of the health of Gypsies and Travellers who have the poorest health status of any black or minority ethnic group in England.

As a part of this wider policy review, we have already started a thorough review of the Gypsy sites planning circular and will be publishing a new draft circular for consultation later in the autumn. That gives the hon. Gentleman some clues as to how close we may be to that process. While the Government recognise that some Gypsies and Travellers wish to embrace a nomadic lifestyle, we know that others prefer to live a more settled existence on local authority or private sites. I want to draw what I hope will be a helpful distinction between unauthorised development and unauthorised camping.

An unauthorised encampment is one where the land is not owned by those setting it up. I will talk about this later if I have time. The focus of the debate today has been on unauthorised developments. An unauthorised development is where a person or persons, be they Gypsies and Travellers or members of the settled community, purchase land and carry out development for which planning permission is required, but where no such permission has been granted. That is considered a breach of planning control and amounts to unauthorised development. Local planning authorities have a range of enforcement powers to deal with unauthorised development.

While I cannot comment on specific planning cases, it might be useful to say a few words about the Government's policy on Gypsy and Traveller sites and planning. Planning policies concerning the provision of suitable locations for Gypsy and Traveller sites, whether local authority provided or private, are set out in the Department of the Environment circular 1/94, published in 1994, entitled "Gypsy Sites and Planning".

The current circular recognises the desire of many Gypsies and Travellers to buy their own sites to develop and manage. Gypsy and Traveller sites constitute development and therefore require planning permission. In formulating their development plans, local authorities are encouraged to discuss Gypsies' accommodation needs with the Gypsies themselves, with a view to identifying suitable locations for Gypsy and Traveller sites in plans wherever possible.

For many local authorities, especially in rural areas, the identification of sites is not easy, as the hon. Gentleman said. Where local authorities find it impossible to identify suitable locations, they must define clear and realistic criteria as the basis for site provision. It is the responsibility of local authorities to judge how they frame their policies, which are open to public scrutiny and comments at inquiry.

Local plans ~~must~~ take account of local circumstances. For example, Gypsy and Traveller sites are not among the uses that are normally appropriate on greenbelt land, in areas of special scientific interest or on open land where development is severely restricted. The onus is on the applicant to prove special circumstances that overcome the harm through inappropriateness.

Mr. Gray: The Minister specifies the different types of land that circular 1/94 mentions as inappropriate, but he has not yet mentioned areas of outstanding natural beauty. Does the circular make any reference to them? If so, is there a preference against areas of outstanding natural beauty but in favour of other open countryside, or are Gypsy encampments in open countryside of all kinds inappropriate?

Phil Hope: I am going to discuss later in detail how the planning system works when an unauthorised development occurs in a place that, for any number of reasons, might be inappropriate and what the planning authority can do to ensure that matters are put right.

The special circumstances that allow a site to be developed might include health and educational needs, but it would be for the planning authority to decide on that, using the planning system.

The 1994 circular is not working effectively in many areas to identify enough appropriate sites. Recent caravan counts have shown that there are around 3,500 caravans on unauthorised developments and encampments in England—I think that the hon. Gentleman mentioned the figure of 4,000—of which around a third are in the eastern region. The new circular is likely to stress the importance of local authorities undertaking a proper quantitative assessment of need, of meeting that need via proper spatial planning through the new regional planning process, and of the identification of specific sites and achievable criteria that offer some certainty of planning permission being granted.

Unfortunately, some Gypsies and Travellers often proceed to establish sites without first obtaining the necessary planning consent, as the hon. Gentleman described. In many cases, the locations that they choose are inappropriate in land use terms, such as where land is in the green belt or open countryside. Enforcement action by local authorities against such unauthorised development is therefore common.

In addition, the Government expect the standard of the behaviour from Gypsies and Travellers to be the same as that expected in the settled community. Any antisocial behaviour will be dealt with in the same way.

Mr. Gray: Will the Minister give way?

Phil Hope: I have more to say.

Travellers and Gypsies, whatever type of site or encampment they are on, should take responsibility for their plots or for the land next to them, keep them clean, not tip waste, dispose of waste properly and not cause a nuisance to neighbours. The availability of alternative sites can be a consideration when appeals against enforcement notices are determined, but only when considering such sites as alternatives to a proposed location that is not suitable itself in planning terms.

Local authorities have a key role to play in identifying suitable locations for sites and in working with Gypsies to help them find land that they can purchase and develop. A few planning authorities have now adopted that best practice. Although that does not deal with the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised, close co-operation between local authorities and Gypsies is very much the best way forward to reduce instances where Gypsies establish sites unlawfully—in some cases causing friction between the Gypsy and Traveller and settled communities.

The Government share the view that local planning authorities should take appropriate enforcement action if they consider an unacceptable breach of planning control to have occurred. There is a range of tools at local planning authorities' disposal. Under powers in the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, as amended by the Planning and Compensation Act 1991, local planning authorities have wide-ranging enforcement powers to deal with breaches of planning control. There are powers to serve a planning contravention notice, issue an enforcement notice, serve a stop notice and serve a breach of condition notice, the ability to seek an injunction in the High Court and, finally, improved powers of entry on to land. We also recently introduced the temporary stop notice under the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004. I will write to the hon. Gentleman about what each of those planning powers means, if that would help him, rather than read through the detail here, given the limited time available to me in this debate.

Powers also exist under section 178 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 that enable a local planning authority to enter and remove unauthorised developments that are in breach of an enforcement notice. Section 178 provides that where an enforcement notice requires steps to be taken that are not taken within the period of compliance with the notice, the local planning authority may enter the land, take the steps and recover from the person who is the owner of the land any expenses reasonably incurred by them in doing so. We have also undertaken a review of the planning enforcement system as a whole, not only for unauthorised Gypsy and Traveller sites but for other unauthorised developments, and we expect to make an announcement about the review later this year.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned human rights in particular. It is, of course, for the local planning authority to determine planning applications, as I just described, and to take breach notices in the sequence that I just outlined. As part of that process, the local authority needs to consider what impact its decision may have on the human rights of individuals.

I want to make it absolutely clear that Gypsies and Travellers do not have special human rights. Everyone has human rights, and all public authorities must act compatibly with convention rights and take decisions individually case by case. Likewise, when inspectors take decisions about appeals, it is for them to decide, as decision takers, whether human rights issues are involved.

Decisions may be challenged on the ground of human rights, but because of the nature of the system, the outcome of such challenges lies with the courts at the end of the appeal sequence, as the hon. Gentleman knows. It would not be appropriate or possible for me to guess the outcome. The European Court of Human Rights has recognised that complex issues are often involved in planning and that decision takers at all levels are required to exercise discretionary powers in the course of their duties. I want to emphasise that everyone has human rights in these circumstances.

Unauthorised encampments are a local concern, but we know that authorities may operate a policy of toleration to allow such encampments, not developments, to remain temporarily where they are not causing problems. I stress that that policy does not mean tolerating mess, nuisance or bad behaviour. That is not what toleration means. As I said, it means tolerating the existence of encampments where they are not causing problems. Agreed standards must be maintained, or toleration is not an appropriate policy.

There is a range of other powers relating to unauthorised encampments, as distinct from unauthorised developments, with which the hon. Gentleman may be familiar. The Home Office has just consulted on guidance on the new powers against trespassing that were introduced under the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003. They will be incorporated in the guidance, and will enable the police to remove Gypsies and Travellers from unauthorised encampments with greater speed. They can be used where the police have established, through consultation with local authorities, that a suitable pitch is available on an authorised site in the area. They will obviously be more effective where local authorities have made adequate provision, and are an incentive for local authorities to establish local authority sites. There are several other detailed action points relating to unauthorised encampments, but I will not go into them now, given the time available.

The Gypsy site refurbishment grant is improving conditions on sites throughout the country and is providing new transit sites and stopping places. Revisions to the Gypsy caravan count are being put in place so that we can obtain more accurate and useful data about the network. As I said, we also have a major programme of policy review.

I have not managed to cover all the issues that I wanted to cover, but I hope that I have covered most of them. I will write to the hon. Gentleman with the details of each of the planning powers that local authorities have. We take the accommodation issue of Gypsies and Travellers very seriously. We believe that consultation with local authorities on planning matters relating to Gypsies is the right way forward before buying land on which Gypsies want to live or for planning permission for any subsequent development. I hope that many of the difficulties outlined by the hon. Gentleman may be avoided through such consultation.

South West Water

4 pm

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): This is a particularly timely debate, because the periodic review of water prices will reach the point of final determination at the beginning of December and there is considerable concern among my constituents about what that will mean for their water and sewerage bills.

I appreciate that the Government have made important progress on water policies since 1997. Leakage has been cut substantially, drinking water is the safest ever and our rivers and beaches are much cleaner. Legislation has ended disconnection and it has improved metering rights, including the right to a free water meter. In a similar debate in December 2001, which took place in the context of the then draft Water Bill, I argued that a new settlement would be needed to guide the resolution of conflicts between environmental, social and economic goals, certainly as far as the area covered by South West Water was concerned and increasingly in some other water areas too.

The experience of the current periodic price review suggests that a reappraisal is now essential. Apart from the question of affordability, there are also wider questions as to whether the present framework serves the interests of companies, shareholders and workers, and the competitiveness of our regional economy. I want to spend a minute or two to reflect on how we came to have such high prices before I go on to discuss how we might find solutions.

Following privatisation in 1989, average household bills increased steeply in the south-west. In 1999, a review was introduced that reduced water prices by 12 per cent. on average across the country and by 12.25 per cent. in the south-west. That was welcome, but it did not by any means undo the previous price hike.

Since disconnections were banned, access to water is not a widespread problem but the costs can be. The average water bill amounts to about 1 per cent. of a household's income. However, for many low-income households, the proportion is many times that. In its sustainability indicators, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs set 3 per cent. of household income as a measure of affordability. Nationally, more than 2 million households spend more. A greater proportion of such households are in the South West Water area, where some pensioners and those on jobseeker's allowance pay 9 per cent. and 13 per cent. of their income—significantly more than people in the same position in Birmingham.

The problems in the south-west lie in the original settlement at the time of the Conservative privatisation of the industry. At almost every event that I have attended to seek a solution to the south-west charges, it has been recognised that the south-west share of the green dowry fell far short of what was needed or fair. The inadequacy of the green dowry has given us the highest water bills in the country: more than £100 more than the average bill. Against such a background, an increase of 17 per cent. on the average bill can be viewed only with apprehension by those who have to try to find the means to pay it, as well as by those who have to collect it and those who work hard to make our economy competitive.

[Linda Gilroy]

As WaterVoice South West points out, the Ofwat presentation of price increases is misleading. It cites a 17 per cent. increase in the average bill for the five years between 2004–05 and 2009–10, but the typical measured bill and the typical unmeasured bill over the same period will increase by 29 per cent. and 35 per cent. before inflation. That will put the typical unmeasured bill at nearly £600 by 2010.

I am aware that as part of the periodic review process the Secretary of State said in her initial guidance that due weight must be given to the economic and social effects, especially with regard to vulnerable customers.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I am following the hon. Lady's speech with great interest, because she has campaigned on this issue inside and outside Parliament over the same period as I have. Does she accept that the figures that we now face are so much more dramatic precisely because lower-income households in our region have been badly hit over many years and this is only adding to that considerable burden? She said that the original legislation introduced by the Conservative Government in 1989 caused the problem, so does she accept that the absence of any rebate for low-income households in the legislation has been a major factor in the south-west?

Linda Gilroy: I agree that the root of the problem lies in the initial privatisation settlement when, ironically, the leader of the Conservative party, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), was the Secretary of State for the Environment. Over the past five or so years, there has been some stability compared with that period. We must tackle the issue at some stage, although it will not be easy.

I hope that DEFRA's review is finding ways of addressing concerns about affordability and associated debt matters that many organisations, such as WaterVoice, the National Consumer Council, the Public Utilities Reform Group—PURGe—Water UK and others, have raised over a long time. I pay tribute in particular to the National Consumer Council for its recent work in "Lifelines". As the Minister will know, I have been associated with such issues in Parliament since I was elected as co-chair of the Public Utilities Reform Group.

I suspect, however, that the review will find it challenging to come up with effective answers inside the existing parameters within which the industry and its regulators operate. I therefore wish to set out for the Minister's observation the arguments for dealing with such issues in a wider context. By no means, are they all new ideas, but together they make the case for more fundamental work to be undertaken. Outdated charging systems based on rateable values last looked at in 1989 need to change. Water companies should be required to devise alternatives to charging on that basis, taking account of local conditions—one size may not fit all regions—and undertake a calculation of economic efficiency, environmental sustainability and social justice. According to its latest annual report, the Pennon Group, which owns South West Water, managed to spend £6.5 million on an abortive takeover bid in its non-regulated sector. If it, and other water companies, were to put in a fraction of that amount to fund an independent reappraisal of how the system could be changed, we might begin to find some answers.

The remit of such a review could include an assessment of other relevant issues, such as clarifying the amount allowed in benefits and tax credits for water bills and the relationship between methods of charging and ease of debt collection, which would make it easier to distinguish between people who cannot pay and those who will not pay, a matter about which the industry has some concerns. I have heard about a figure of as much as £10 being passed on from the "won't pays" to other customers, including poor and vulnerable customers.

The review could cover whether the costs involved in the voluntary metering programme is the best means of achieving conservation benefit. I have done a quick back-of-the-envelope calculation on what the 117,000 meters that may be required in the next periodic review will cost. It runs into tens of millions of pounds, especially in the south-west where conservation is perhaps not the prime issue compared with other regions. Again, perhaps one size does not fit all regions.

Some interesting proposals are emerging from a recent study by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation about the impact of green taxes on poor households. In the case of water, the report investigates the effects of universal water metering and of 11 alternative charging methods, including a lower tariff for low-income households on benefit, a free water allowance for some households and a variable tariff linked to the council tax band. Such a review could consider whether it is now time to end the ban on mergers that has resulted in overseas water companies and companies with other United Kingdom activities being able to take on water companies, but does not allow mergers between water companies in this country.

Some 15 years after privatisation, it is a little difficult to think that the injustice of the inadequate green dowry might be unpicked but, given that each periodic price review builds on the unfair settlement, surely it is not unreasonable to look for a solution that will break the vicious circle in which we are caught. I am talking not only about social justice, but the unfair competitive position that our businesses and industry are in.

I would also like the review to look into whether second homes in the south-west pay for a fair share of the costs of providing their water. My hon. Friend the Minister will know that recent changes have been made to council tax to ensure that such second home owners shoulder a fairer proportion of the price for local services. As I understand it, about half of total water and sewerage costs come from infrastructure capital costs. Is it fair that those who come to enjoy the amenity of our clean rivers and beaches and a connection to their second homes end up paying little for the benefit, as they use relatively little metered water, and that at peak times?

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is working to ensure that the "polluter pays" principle is fully and correctly applied, so that costs that should more appropriately be paid by others are not passed on to customers. I am thinking particularly of the costs of diffuse agricultural pollution. However, I think that I am right in saying that the issue will not be resolved according to that determination. There is also the matter of highways drainage costs, which has considerably exercised WaterVoice South West.

In a previous debate, I mentioned the difficulty arising from the long-term nature of decisions that need to be taken on investment in the water industry, and the problem of aligning those decisions with the five-year price review. In his submission to the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee's first review, which reported at the end of 2003, Dr. Dieter Helm of Oxford university said the difficulty

"creates set-piece artificial decision points, focuses management on the short term, and encourages game playing."

He advocates

"a longer-term view, comprising an overarching policy framework, ten-year fundamental reviews, and much more reliance on" an interim determination process

"to allow flexibility within periods."

The issue was also the basis of much searching questioning in the most recent review of the determination process, conducted by the Select Committee over the past month.

Those are just a few of the subjects that merit closer examination, not just to help us resolve some of the all-too-obvious tensions in the south-west, but to ensure fairness and transparency and, through that, best value elsewhere in the country. Unless there is fairness and transparency, we will not necessarily have the best possible value. When all is said and done, regulation acts as a substitute for competition in the market, which would otherwise deliver best value.

I hope that a few of the issues raised will be addressed in the hardship review that DEFRA has in hand, but I suspect that most will not. Some of the ideas that I have put forward might provide more effective medium and long-term solutions. The wider review for which I am calling needs two stages. The first would identify the options, shortlist those likely to provide really effective solutions, and identify those that might need legislation. At that stage, all stakeholders would have a role to play. Stage 2 of the review would be for Government to take responsibility for a detailed analysis of the impact of those shortlisted options before arriving at decisions.

The regulator has made a commitment to reviewing the price determination process, but he is constrained by what statute requires of him. Even if he were not so constrained, I suspect that the whole culture of the regulator in the current framework of legislation would mean that he would look at too narrow a range of issues to come up with that full broad range of options that it would be beneficial to consider. They say that for every complex problem there is a simple solution, but that it is usually wrong. For water, that is particularly the case, and that is why I advocate a wide-ranging review.

In conclusion, I hope that by raising these matters at the present point in the price-determination cycle, I will be able to obtain from the Minister a commitment to discuss them with his colleagues in other Departments—such as, perhaps, the Treasury, which would have an interest in aspects of the matter, the Department of Trade and Industry, which has an interest in regulatory and competitiveness issues, and the Department for Work and Pensions. Those Departments come particularly to mind. There is a need to revisit the regulatory framework to stop the price-hike misery for my constituents—which is likely to cause problems, too, for our water company and possibly its shareholders, and to form the basis for a continuing competitive disadvantage to our economy.

4.15 pm

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) not only on the way she has raised this issue but on her long involvement, through PURGe, in campaigning on utilities regulation and prices. The subject is an important one and the debate about how to deal with the issues continues.

My hon. Friend is right to say that the root of the problem is the nature of the privatisation process and the green dowry, and the base prices that were set, which now underpin future price increases and which have clearly worked to the disadvantage of the south-west. I do not dispute that.

I am conscious that water bills can be a significant cost to many households, making price increases significant too. As my hon. Friend said, the Government are currently reviewing the way in which lower-income households are helped with their water and sewerage charges. That includes considering the existing vulnerable groups provision for people on water meters and the potential for other ways of helping, such as, perhaps, setting up trust funds, as happens in some water company areas; they are used to help people on low incomes who have difficulty with bills.

My hon. Friend raised important points about water pricing and the regulatory system in general. There has been considerable discussion about that. The Government reviewed the water charging system in 1997–98. That review resulted in the Water Industry Act 1999, which introduced, for example, protection against disconnection because of important health and welfare considerations.

We have not shut down the idea of a review of structures, prices and tariffs. We remain open to new ideas about them. I shall make a point of looking at what the study done for the Joseph Rowntree Foundation had to say about green taxes and their application. I have considerable sympathy with the idea of variable tariffs, for example, but there are many different ways, as my hon. Friend will know, of applying variable tariffs. Those ideas are nevertheless worth exploring. I have in the past put forward the idea that we should consider them.

Linda Gilroy: Perhaps my hon. Friend would agree that one size does not fit all and that there might be scope in the future to encourage water companies to consider the charging solutions that best suit their region.

Mr. Morley: Yes; if we are to examine the charging system generally, it is not unreasonable to consider regional differences. As we know, there are now regional differences in cost, although the charging mechanism is based on a similar formula.

[Mr. Morley]

There is likely to be an increase in bills. We want to continue with investment, which, as my hon. Friend said, has made this country's rivers and beaches the cleanest they have been in probably 100 years. People are worried about prices and we are sensitive to that, but consumers are also quite keen on high environmental standards and high quality. Those are popular and people want them. Making sure that we get those improvements at the lowest possible cost to consumers is, of course, an issue to be dealt with.

Prices rose an average of 3 per cent. in April, and customers of South West Water paid the most, with an average bill of £361. However, the figures that I have, just as a matter of interest, show that in 1999 the average bill for the company, taking inflation into account, would have been £394.

The Government have commissioned and published research into alternative methods of unmeasured charging, including charges based on council tax bands. However, that research shows that switching to any of the proposed alternatives would create not only winners but a large number of losers, including many of those least able to afford it and particularly those with the lowest rateable value properties. That is one problem with variable charges. It is essential that any proposals for new charging arrangements provide adequate transitional arrangements and that we consider those issues. I accept that we should consider a range of issues and that we can approach that in different ways.

In the south-west, Ofwat's proposals would lead to an average increase in bills of £61 to £418 over the five years to 2010, before inflation. Incidentally, that is less than half what the company has been asking for. I am well aware that that is an average and that there are different price impacts and I know that my hon. Friend is, too.

Linda Gilroy: Because there has been an unusual volume of switching to metered supplies in the south-west, averages are particularly misleading there. There is the average for unmeasured and the average for measured. The gap between them is increasing and one has an impact on the other.

Mr. Morley: I accept the points that my hon. Friend makes. However, most customers in the south-west will save money by switching to meters, and I would encourage them to do so. My hon. Friend is well aware of that. Under water regulations, meters are provided free of charge, and that is one way to reduce bills for a large number of consumers in the south-west. That said, I know that it will not help those who are already on meters and that there are issues about unmeasured charges. There are complexities in this matter and I do not want to be glib about average increases. Let us take the increase, for example, from 1999 to 2009; the average increase in the south-west is 6 per cent. Even though that is a very low figure because of the decrease in the last round, I know that that hides significant increases for other consumers.

Mr. Tyler: I welcome the Minister's open-minded approach, on which I think both the hon. Lady and I would congratulate him. However, I hope that he will recognise that the difficulty with an open-minded approach and saying that many of these issues can be examined might be that that will take a great deal of time, and this is a very urgent problem. Although the rises from 1999 to date are not that great, the rises from 1989 to now are very great. That is the background, and the problem is very urgent for next year.

Mr. Morley: It is true that there was a very sharp increase from 1989 and that prices have been smoothed because of the decrease in the last round and the change that the regulator has suggested to business plans now. That is right and proper. However, there are real complexities with regard to how we consider this issue and the benefits system, for example, and how we measure the affluence of both the country and regions.

There have been positive changes, including in the south-west. Let us consider the reduction in unemployment, for example. The latest figures, which go up to September this year, show that, compared to 1997, there has been a reduction in unemployment in Plymouth, Sutton of 63.5 per cent. There has been a reduction in North Cornwall of 57.5 per cent. That is significant.

The changes in tax and benefits that the Government have introduced in recent years mean that, in real terms, families in the south-west with children are, on average, £1,360 a year better off. Families with children in the poorest fifth of the population will, on average, be £3,000 a year better off. Pensioner households will, on average, be £1,350 year better off—about £26 a week. The poorest third of pensioner households will have gained £1,750 a year. That is the result of the Government focusing on raising overall living standards, particularly those of people on lower incomes.

Linda Gilroy: My hon. Friend has been patient in giving way. As long as the sort of difference that I described exists for those in the south-west with pensions or the jobseeker's allowance, who pay two or three times as much as their equivalents in Birmingham, we will never be able to solve the poverty problem. Much though I welcome the fact that we have taken a million children out of poverty, there is still more to do.

Mr. Morley: I accept that. Part of the equation is the fact that Ofwat's proposals would lead to an increase in bills of between £61 and £418. The company's business plans have been significantly reduced by Ofwat, as my hon. Friend knows. In fact, it will be allowed less than half the increase that it was asking for.

The jobseeker's allowance includes a calculation to reflect the cost of such things as water. The JSA and income support are covered by what is known as the Rossi increase, based on the retail prices index to reflect cost of living increases. The Rossi index takes account of increases in a wide range of goods and services, including water and sewerage charges. However, it takes no account of housing costs or of income support help with mortgage interest payments, which are provided for separately through housing benefit. I know that those payments help people on benefits, but some people on low incomes are just above the benefit level, so not all the issues raised by my hon. Friend have been resolved.

I was interested in my hon. Friend's comments about the merger policy. It is not unreasonable that the policy should be renewed. I have said so publicly. However, I must be careful what I say. When visiting the south-west, I said very mildly that I thought my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) had a reasonable idea about merger policy, but my expression of mild support caused a share price movement. I got into a bit of trouble for that, so I must be careful.

We should look at all options. We should consider everything, including affordability, how to dealt with debt and the polluter-pays issue, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton because it throws costs onto consumers that they should not have to pay. She was right to say that we are addressing the problem, although it will be some time before consumers see the benefits of any measures that we put in place.

We must also consider the question of second homes. I certainly agree that their owners should pay their fair share. However, as my hon. Friend said, there have already been some changes. Indeed, those changes apply to Members of the House, and they are entirely justified. I also take my hon. Friend's point about looking at the legislative and regulatory framework when addressing such issues.

I reassure my hon. Friend that the regulator is dedicated to ensuring that increases are no higher than they need be. That is reflected in how he dealt with the draft business plan. The range of views that my hon. Friend expressed on the potential options need to be examined. It is important to keep an open mind about charging methods, tariffs, how to help people on low incomes, metering and fairer ways to pay for water. It is not always easy, but it is nevertheless important. I give my hon. Friend the assurance that although it will not happen overnight we will seriously consider those issues, which are important for the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Four-o'clock.

[SIR NICHOLAS WINTERTON in the Chair]

Western Balkans

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gillian Merron.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): I am grateful to Mr. Speaker for allowing us to debate the problems of the western Balkans. I appreciate the continuing effort of British soldiers and of our police, non-governmental organisation staff and civil servants who work in the region and on issues concerned with it.

The break-up of the former Yugoslavia in 1991 led to a decade of truly terrible conflict. Walking through Sarajevo last week, I saw constant reminders of the horrors of that conflict—the shell-damaged buildings and the memorials erected in respect of various aspects of the tragedy. One of the most poignant memorials, known as Sarajevo roses, are red marks painted on the ground wherever a shell or grenade killed six or more people.

It is difficult truly to comprehend the scale of suffering that took place on all sides of the conflict. However, the numbers give some indication. In Bosnia alone, about 250,000 people were killed and 400,000 injured, and more than half the population was displaced. That is apart from the appalling atrocities that took place at various points during the wars—and Bosnia is only one part of the region to have suffered. Croatia, Kosovo, Serbia and Macedonia all saw conflict during that time. In Kosovo, as many as 200,000 people may still be displaced.

As well as the human cost, the countries of the region have had to cope with the impact of the conflicts on their economies. They have all had to make the painful transition from planned economies to market economies, and the conflicts clearly did not help the process. In most of former Yugoslavia, the national income has halved, and unemployment has affected large portions of the labour force. Normal economic activity was disrupted and destroyed, and efforts to reform bankrupt economies and to make the successful transition from central planning to the much-needed market economy were severely complicated. Even Albania, which did not face war, suffered economic collapse as a result of the mishandled transition from the Enver Hoxha period.

The destruction caused by the wars created an environment in which criminality was able to flourish. Organised crime, including the trafficking of drugs and people, is a major problem that affects not only those countries themselves but others, including the United Kingdom. One small example is the fact that 80 per cent. of the heroin from Afghanistan that ends up in Britain's cities comes through the western Balkans.

I do not want to paint too gloomy a picture, however, because real progress is being made. Nearly 10 years after the Dayton peace agreement brought the brutal hostilities to an end in Bosnia, the country has taken huge strides forward; as a unified state it has realistic ambitions to become part of NATO and ultimately the European Union. That would have seemed completely fanciful at the time of the Dayton accords. Lord Paddy Ashdown, the international community's high representative, is able to take an increasingly back-seat role, and Bosnians are taking more responsibility for their own politics and development.

People are showing greater confidence in the country. The fact that as many as a million refugees and internally displaced people are now returning to their homes is a sign of confidence. The expectation is that the high representative could be replaced with a European Union special representative, whose role would be to monitor Bosnia's moves towards Europe.

Without exception, all the politicians whom I met last week were clearly focused on the need for Bosnia to become part of the European family of nations, adopting European standards and norms. In part, those politicians saw the clear economic benefits of becoming part of Europe, but more important was the political benefit of a clear road map to a stable and free society, with modern and efficient public administration delivering effective services to the people.

In a country without established institutions and recovering from civil war, such a vision is extremely valuable. The recognition from all political parties—particularly the leaders whom I met—of the value of European integration is important, because it will not always be easy to achieve the various steps along the road to EU accession. It will require considerable political determination from them.

One area where determination will be required, and where progress is fundamental if the countries of the former Yugoslavia are to become part of the European Union, is the need for fuller co-operation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in The Hague. Twenty one of those indicted by that tribunal for the atrocities that took place still remain at large. Bringing them to justice after the terrible ethnic cleansing and massacres that took place remains fundamental to maintaining progress in the region. If Bosnia and other countries are to join Europe or be fully reconciled, more progress must be made to bring those war criminals to justice.

Within the region, Croatia is leading the way in terms of EU accession. It suffered as much as any other part of the region from the conflicts of the 1990s. With a Government committed to reform established in 2000, its economy has performed strongly. It was accepted by NATO into the partnership for peace programme in 2001, and this year it has been formally accepted as a candidate for membership of the European Union.

Since 1997, the UK has provided more than £150 million through my Department to the western Balkans. We were active in Bosnia during the war and were one of the first donors to deliver assistance to Serbia after the fall of Milosevic in 2000. We also made a huge contribution to the humanitarian effort in Kosovo.

In Bosnia, a terrible legacy of the conflict is the large area of the country still covered by land mines. We are helping to tackle that major problem. Last Thursday, I visited a village about an hour from Sarajevo that had been on the front line of the conflict. Serb and Muslim villagers had been forced to leave at different times and both forces had laid anti-personnel mines in the village—even the cemetery and the school were mined. I saw the dangerous and painstaking work being undertaken by those working for the Bosnia and Herzegovina mine action centre. I hope that the House will pay tribute to the considerable bravery being shown by those men in clearing the fields of the village and allowing it and other areas of Bosnia to return to normal life.

In Kosovo, the Department is one of the most significant donors to the health sector. Early support ensured that the hospital in Pristina continued to provide effective health care services to the population in the immediate aftermath of the conflict. We improved patient care by helping to strengthen the quality of hospital management and providing new equipment and other support. We are now working to strengthen the capacity of the Ministry of Health to plan and deliver improved services, not only in Pristina, but throughout Kosovo.

We are also working to strengthen a range of social services across the whole of the western Balkans, including pension systems, employment services, social care for vulnerable groups and other forms of benefit systems. We are trying not only to improve delivery of those services but to ensure that they are accessible for the very poorest people and those closest to the poverty line.

My Department has been working throughout the region to improve the capacity of public administration more generally. In the Serb republic in Bosnia, for example, we have assisted the drafting and implementation of a new civil service law that is helping to build an independent, merit-based, depoliticised civil service.

We are helping to strengthen the capability of the Prime Minister's office in Kosovo so that it can implement better co-ordination and delivery of policy. We are also helping the provisional Government to track progress towards meeting the Kosovo standards, which is an essential step along the route to resolving Kosovo's final status.

The combination of the move from a planned economy to a market economy and the destruction wrought by war has left much of the industry in the Balkans in a truly terrible state. Markets have completely disappeared, much of the industrial plant is obsolete, and key suppliers have gone to different markets and different countries. It is essential to revitalise industry and to secure the investment needed to make the necessary economic progress to create jobs and tackle poverty.

In Bosnia, we recently completed a programme of technical advice that has supported the successful restructuring of 32 newly privatised companies employing some 16,000 workers. That is helping to safeguard future jobs and future economic growth there.

The United Kingdom has made a contribution that is broader than simply providing development assistance in the region. British troops have been a fundamental element of the international forces posted in Kosovo and Bosnia. Their professionalism and skill have been vital for maintaining peace and stability in the region. We have also provided strong support for reform efforts in the region and have encouraged Governments to promote their plans for integration into the European Union.

The UK is a key political player in the region. We are active in the contact group and are considering ways in which to resolve the problems of Kosovo's status and the Peace Implementation Council in Bosnia, but it is still impossible to visit the region and not recognise the immense challenges that remain for the countries and the peoples of the region. The area remains politically and economically extremely fragile. Corruption and organised crime continue to blight it, and extremism and ethnic tension remain just under the surface. Return to large-scale conflict is unlikely, but we are reminded all too frequently of the region's fragility.

Kosovo is the greatest challenge to long-term peace in the region. Ethnic Albanian extremism continues to cause much tension. The Chamber will be familiar with the events in March this year, which saw the worst violence in the region since 1999. Violent clashes between Kosovar Albanians and Kosovar Serbs triggered inter-ethnic violence that left 19 people dead and 900 injured. Serb houses and Orthodox churches were also burned down.

Kosovo is now calm, but the situation remains tense. The sudden eruption of violence was a wake-up call to the international community. It highlighted the lack of progress in the past five years and the need to step up progress significantly if we are to maintain stability in the region, despite the UN administration.

My visit to Kosovo last week was made a week after the assembly elections. Although the elections were judged to be free and fair by the international community, they emphasised the continuing divide between the two communities, as only about 1 per cent. of Kosovar Serbs chose to participate in them. That fragility is not unique to Kosovo. The assassination of the Prime Minister in Serbia last year demonstrated the problem of fragility there, too.

In Macedonia, the recent referendum on municipal boundaries threatened to unravel the Ohrid agreement, but fortunately did not succeed. Even in Bosnia, the complex constitutional arrangements that the Dayton accords set in place presents a threat to its stability. The fact that there can be 13 Prime Ministers in Bosnia as well as nine Presidents is symptomatic of the fragility and the need for further progress. Again, in Albania and Serbia, weak and fractious coalition Governments make it difficult to generate the political will to make further economic and social reforms.

One of the aspects that contributes to the fragility of the region is the continuing economic and social problems facing people in rural areas in particular, but also in some of the poorest parts of the urban areas. It is important to remember that the former Yugoslavia was relatively prosperous, but poverty is now widespread across the region. Nearly a quarter of the population live in poverty, and a significant minority live in extreme poverty. Albania undoubtedly remains the poorest country, with some 25 per cent. of the population living on less than $1.50 a day—that is worse than in some parts of Africa.

Unemployment remains a serious concern throughout the region. Official figures suggest that some 60 per cent. of the population in Kosovo is unemployed. There is a general perception that the reforms that have been implemented have failed to provide tangible benefits to the people. That undoubtedly helped to feed the extreme nationalism in parts of the region that has resurfaced recently, and encouraged the activities of organised criminals.

Given that picture, it would be easy to be pessimistic about the future of the western Balkans. However, I believe that we should remain optimistic. In large part, the reason for optimism is the potential role that could be played by the European Union. The countries in the western Balkans are part of Europe and they have legitimate aspirations to join the EU. We have long supported the principle of enlarging the EU and we are committed to including the countries of the western Balkans. Of course, there is still a long way to go before we reach that point, but integration into Europe provides powerful incentives for reform and a vision of what a better future looks like.

The European Commission has responded to the needs of the region. The European Agency for Reconstruction, which was set up in the aftermath of the Kosovo conflict, provided huge sums of money to help with the immediate humanitarian needs as well as the longer-term reconstruction effort.

Kosovo presents particular challenges, and is an important ongoing source of instability in the region. The violence in March galvanised the international community into reassessing its approach to Kosovo. In a hard-hitting report for the UN Secretary-General, the Norwegian diplomat Kai Eide set out the strategy for making sustained progress in Kosovo. I am pleased to say that the UN has broadly endorsed that strategy. The UK Government also strongly support that reform process.

Last week, I was able to meet Soren Jessen-Petersen, the Secretary-General's new special representative in Pristina. He has a refreshingly clear vision of the direction in which he wants to take the UN mission in Kosovo, and of what needs to be done.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Can the Minister enlighten us as to the Government's view on the political future of Kosovo? Do they have an idea of the kind of Government that should be in place there, or will the transitional arrangements remain for ever and aye?

Mr. Thomas: One of the key things that the UN mission in Kosovo has set out, which we support, is a series of standards against which progress must be made before the issue of final status can be resolved. One of those standards is that a proper, functioning democracy should be in place, with respect for minority rights and a fully open market economy. Progress against those standards will be reviewed next year. There are continuing discussions about the nature of the final status of Kosovo. It is important that those discussions continue and that we try to achieve consensus. That is something that Soren Jessen-Petersen is trying to take forward.

As well as addressing standards and the final status issue, we need to make more progress on transferring powers from the UN mission in Kosovo to the provisional institutions of self-government, to increase their responsibility and accountability to the people of Kosovo. That will require fundamental reform and a fundamental change of approach by the UN mission in Kosovo. We must also see progress on economic development and the strengthening of the role of local government.

That is undoubtedly a large reform agenda, and I stressed to Soren Jessen-Petersen the importance of beginning to make progress and of generating sustained momentum in the reform process before the standards review, to which the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) alluded. The special representative has made a strong start, but with the elections completed we need to see concrete progress on the ground.

International development assistance has an important continuing role to play in supporting reform and development in the region. The international community has invested £2.5 billion annually in the region. In 2003, the European Commission alone invested £450 million, of which our share was £90 million. We also have a bilateral programme in the Balkans, which is worth almost £14 million this year.

Given the size of our programme and the substantial amounts of other donor funding available, we have prioritised the need to develop Governments' capacity and capability to deliver more effective services. As we know, if countries want to tackle poverty and to have a strong economy, good schools and good health services, it is crucial that they have an effective civil service in place.

We are also focusing on strengthening the effectiveness of overall international assistance. We are working, for example, to ensure that the European accession agenda and the economic and social development agenda, on which the World Bank is leading, are more effectively combined. As I said, we are also seeking to promote Governments' capacity and capability to take forward their own development priorities through poverty reduction strategies. The same is true of their agendas and ambitions for EU accession.

The UK will continue to support peace and reconciliation in the region by working through the contact group and at the UN to make progress on resolving the final status issue and by continuing to provide appropriate military support to international deployments in the region. We also need to continue working closely with Governments in the region to address the scourge of organised crime, particularly where it is involved in drugs and people trafficking.

To conclude, there has been considerable progress in the western Balkans over the past five years, although it is undoubtedly fragile. The prospect of EU accession provides the single most important incentive to cement reform and pursue further progress. It is clear that our development assistance, as well as further sustained international effort, will be fundamental to supporting the economic and social progress that is still necessary in the region, as well as to the issue of EU accession. If we can continue in that way, we can build on the solid foundations that have been put down since the Dayton peace agreement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): Before I call the spokesman for Her Majesty's Opposition, let me seek to help hon. Members by advising them that there are likely to be one or more Divisions at 4.25 pm. Hon. Members may wish to plan the length of their speeches accordingly.

2.54 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I welcome the opportunity to discuss this critical region, in which Britain still has a considerable number of troops and a considerable commitment to international development.

The multi-ethnic patchwork of peoples and religions that make up the western Balkans provide the fault lines for the horrendous conflicts that engulfed those nations in the 1990s and have done over the centuries. Before analysing the issues country by country as the Minister did, I want to make some fairly obvious broad points. The countries share a background of political instability, to a greater or lesser extent, and recent ethnic conflict has been a feature in many of them. I shall not, however, repeat the unhappy catalogue that he listed. Strategies are needed to heal the divisions and to develop functional, multi-ethnic states.

I agree with the Minister that a key aim is the eventual integration of the region, bit by bit, into the European Union. If the political leaders in the area know that their nations have a realistic prospect of joining the EU, it will provide an incentive for each to pursue unified and reformist policies to meet the criteria that the EU rightly sets out.

In Bosnia, the declaration of independence in 1992 led to three years of extremely vicious war, which the regime in Belgrade at that time used as a pretext for uniting all the Serbs living in what used to be the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. That led to ethnic cleansing of non-Serbs, who were systematically expelled from their homes. It is, however, only half the story to talk just about ethnic cleansing by Serbs; although they were the first to do it and they did it on the largest scale, once the fighting began, no group—Serb, Croat or Bosnian—emerged guilt free from the civil war. Indeed, that cannot be separated from the massive expulsion of hundreds of thousands of Serbs from Krajina towards the end of the conflict in Bosnia.

Since the dark days of the early 1990s, there has been considerable progress in Bosnia towards peace and stability. The presence of NATO troops there has been fundamental, securing a stable and peaceful environment and allowing the country to move forward from its troubled past. I was impressed with the work that they were doing when I visited the area some years ago with the Select Committee on Defence. There is no doubt that international forces continue to be needed there.

Obviously, I am concerned about the planned replacement of the NATO operation by an untried, EU-led force. There are fears that that imminent transfer may have more to do with boosting EU desires for a separate defence capability than with providing the most effective form of policing and security for Bosnia. I hope that those fears are ill-founded and I wish the EU-led force the very best, but it is crucial that EUFOR, which I believe is the right name for the new force, learns as much as possible from the NATO forces from which it is taking over in order to give itself the optimum chance of success. It is true that it is a different job now; security challenges have moved from peacemaking through peacekeeping to tackling organised crime, corruption, border security and so on. Nevertheless, to achieve the accelerated economic and structural reform so vital to Bosnia's future development, a stable security environment, with a clear chain of command, is essential.

The US ambassador to Bosnia, Clifford Bond, told local newspapers that the NATO and EU missions would be clearly separated, with NATO involved in operations demanding logistics, intelligence and military capabilities for which EUFOR does not have the capabilities. Such statements suggest that the US intends the new NATO mission to hold a superior position in relation to EUFOR. It would be helpful if the Minister could clarify NATO's continuing role. There have been hints from America that it may keep troops in the area separate from the EUFOR troops, which would make for a larger total military presence, because EUFOR's numbers will match the existing NATO numbers, and the other troops will be in addition. None the less, it is vital that there is a clearly defined chain of command, and it would be helpful if he said something about that in his winding-up speech.

On a personal note, I was glad to hear the Minister's comments on mine clearing. As chance would have it, my father-in-law set up the UN's original de-mining unit, working for Kofi Annan in his previous job as head of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. He still goes back as an independent consultant. He is in Afghanistan at the moment, but he spends quite a lot of time in the Balkans. I know from him that the task is huge—indeed, I saw some work in progress when I was over there briefly—and that increasing progress is being made.

The difficulties in respect of Kosovo are the most complex of all. Supposed advances made in 2003 appear to have amounted to rather less than we hoped; arguably, they merely suppressed rather than resolved the main differences dividing the majority Albanian and minority Serb communities. The Minister alluded to the riots in March, when 19 people were killed in the worst clashes since 1999. The democracy of last month's general election was called into question by the Serb boycott, to which he also referred. There are allegations that that was inspired by Belgrade.

When I was in the region, as I was a couple of times shortly after the fighting, we received from our security forces in the area testimony on all sides of the persecution of the Serbs in the area by the Kosovans. The Minister's description of the burning of churches and the attacks on Serb civilians fitted exactly the picture that I remember; his descriptions were depressingly familiar.

The main underlying obstacle to a progressive agenda in Kosovo is the issue of final status. Of course, the main immediate obstacle is the friction between the communities. The Serb election boycott has generated concerns that that was a dress rehearsal for the Serbs' approach to the planned talks about Kosovo's future status. The legitimacy of those talks will inevitably be called into question if there is no Serb mandate for them or at least no Serb acquiescence in them. Increased EU pressure on Belgrade may help to influence the Kosovo Serbs to participate in local institutions, but only if the return of Serb refugees and their security are a condition of the granting of final status. For the foreseeable future, security must remain the responsibility of NATO, so that the Serbs know that they are protected by an international force, rather than just by the Kosovo Protection Corps, which is almost entirely an ethnic Albanian force.

At the time of my original visit, there was not a single prison anywhere in Kosovo. I understand that there has been quite a lot of progress in that regard and that there are now a number of prisons, so that murderers are not simply released after a few days in a police cell. However, I would be interested if the Minister could comment on two parallel issues relating to security. He may wish to write to me, as they are both points of detail. First, has the pay of the Kosovan police been sorted out? They were paid the equivalent of one fifth of the rate of a UN translator—a quite inadequate amount on which to support a family. Corruption was endemic in the police because there was no other way in which they could support their families. Secondly, has there been any progress on the attempt to recruit some Serbs to the police force?

The Kosovan economy is a major obstacle to development, as it has been ever since the fighting. At least three fifths of the population are unemployed; 96 per cent. of the goods consumed in Kosovo are made or produced abroad; and there is, as the Minister acknowledged, a culture of organised crime. It is bizarre to visit a country and see vast numbers of stolen cars. The vast majority of stolen cars on the roads are immediately identifiable as such because they still have the number plates of the countries from which they were stolen.

International aid to the region has fallen substantially in recent years. Despite that reduction, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has publicly criticised the EU for allocating development money to the region rather than to Africa. International aid is essential to tackle the floundering economy and thus political stability in the region. I was glad to hear the Minister confirm that.

The legacy of Milosevic's rule in Serbia has left the country recovering from the psychological scars of conflict and civil war. Much has changed. Perhaps the most visible evidence of that change was the end of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in 2003 and its replacement with the new, looser union of Serbia and Montenegro. The fears some years ago about military action by Serbia in Montenegro are now forgotten, and the relationship has clearly matured. The real success of the union, however, will be decided in 2006, when the two countries decide whether to continue the arrangement. Refugee returns remain a pressing issue in Serbia, and I should be interested to hear from the Minister what is being done to assist Serbs who have been displaced from Croatian Krajina and remain refugees.

Other challenges that must be confronted are the economy, in which unemployment remains high, and the problem of organised crime and lawlessness, which was tragically illustrated by the assassination of Prime Minister Djindjic in March last year. Of course, the best way to help Serbia is to provide help and support for democratic Serb and Montenegrin leaders, and to encourage them to adopt a reformist course, however tough the obstacles.

The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia has had a reasonably good year, with the presidential election in April demonstrating the level of democratic maturity and stability that that nation has now attained. Yet the survival of the state in its present form is still not completely assured. As elsewhere, the remaining significant challenges are to reform the economy and stimulate employment.

Probably the most decisive issue is still the devolution of power to local government units and its impact on the delicate ethnic balance of power in that small country. Perhaps the Minister will tell us whether the British Government are planning to follow the US Administration's decision to recognise the FYRM as Macedonia. I appreciate that there is a problem involving Greece in that context.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): The United States has just acknowledged that the name of the country is Macedonia. The issue has caused a lot of problems, and I wonder whether my hon. Friend thinks that this country should be following suit.

Mr. Brazier: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. I asked the question, but I do not at this stage have a view as to whether it would be wise to take that course. However, given the statement that America has just made, it would be useful to know whether the Government, after receiving representations from the Greeks and from the FYRM, have taken a view on it. The Greeks' opposition stems, of course, from a concern that they have a province called Macedonia and that they do not want their border to be threatened.

The states of the western Balkans have all reached different stages of development, and residual tensions and ethnic prejudices remain, although there are greater problems in some states than in others—problems that stifle or hold back attempts to create prospering, multi-ethnic states. Efforts must be made, through education as well as by more proactive political, legal and economic means, to tackle those difficulties. That is another area in which the international community has much to offer.

Like the Minister, I remain convinced that the prospect of EU membership and eventual membership of NATO will be a powerful spur to reform and progress. An unambiguous commitment should be made that the countries of the region will be welcomed as EU members once they meet the various conditions on human rights, regional co-operation, democracy and economic reform. The EU must for its part make determined efforts to improve its outreach to the politicians of the region and the populations as a whole if it wants to demonstrate its long-term commitment to a progressive agenda in those countries. However, I also believe that the EU must accept, in all humility, that NATO can do more where the security challenges are greatest.

[Mr. Brazier]

We all look forward to the day when the region learns to live with and respect its special multicultural nature. What is needed first is for all parties to be willing to admit to crimes that have been committed on their behalf, and to forgive. It is easy for us to make that comment in the safety of London, but the recent statement by Bosnian Serb leaders in which they said that they sympathised with the pain of the relatives of the victims of the Srebrenica massacre and expressed sincere regrets and apologies was an example of what is needed if progress is to be made in the healing process. Ultimately, the key to the western Balkans has to be people learning to live in peace together. The more we can do to assist them, the better.

3.11 pm

John Austin (Erith and Thamesmead) (Lab): I echo the words of my hon. Friend the Minister in expressing admiration and support for the work of the British troops who have participated in KFOR and SFOR and who do such a valuable peacekeeping job in the region.

I do not want to dwell on the past, but at the beginning of the debate it is important to acknowledge not only the faults in the Balkans but the mistakes that we in the international community may have made. Our failure to recognise the legitimate aspirations of the people of the former Republic of Yugoslavia, when it was clear to any observer that the federation could not survive, and insistence on maintaining that federation under Milosevic led to many of the initial difficulties. There might have been an easier way forward.

Similarly—I think that the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) will agree with me, because we discussed this at the time—the Dayton agreement was important for settling the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, but the fate that would befall Kosovo was predictable then, because of the principles on which it was based. We must recognise the mistake that we made in including Milosevic as a partner in the peace process in order to get a quick fix. The sacrificial lamb was Kosovo.

On a more positive note, I very much welcome the speech of my hon. Friend the Minister, and the positive role that the Department for International Development is playing in the regional assistance plan. I should also like to mention the Inter-Parliamentary Union, which I shall chair for a few more weeks and of which the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood is currently vice-chairman. We in the IPU have been preaching the same message as my hon. Friend the Minister. We have used every opportunity in our meetings with representatives of the Balkan countries to emphasise the need to demonstrate transparency and good governance, to tackle corruption and crime, to respect minority rights and to co-operate with the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia.

In September, I visited Montenegro with the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). I was representing the IPU at the Cetinje forum, a body that first met in February 2004 in Cetinje, the former capital of Montenegro. It is a forum for parliamentary dialogue. The first meeting in February was attended by the Speakers or Deputy Speakers of the Parliaments of Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Greece, Macedonia, and Serbia and Montenegro, with Slovenia in attendance. Earlier this year, as part of its programme of dialogue with fellow parliamentarians, the British group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union hosted a delegation from Serbia and Montenegro, led by the Vice-President of the Assembly of Serbia and Montenegro, Milorad Drlijevic. All right hon. and hon. Members and Members of the other place who attended found it positive and encouraging for the future of the region. The delegates clearly indicated a wish to put the past behind them and work together, both in their country and with their neighbours, towards the aim of eventually taking their place in the European Union. As the Minister said, we saw their aspiration for EU membership as a spur to the necessary economic and constitutional reforms.

What was most encouraging was the desire of those parliamentarians to work with their neighbours to establish stability, for which they sought the help and support of the British group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. It was for that reason that the hon. Member for Ribble Valley and I represented the IPU at the second Cetinje forum as observers. Also attending were delegates from Romania and Bulgaria, and observers from Italy and the UK. A copy of the final statement that was agreed unanimously by the forum has been forwarded to my hon. Friend the Minister for Europe, with whom I discussed the issue and our possible continued involvement in the forum this week. He welcomed the initiative as a new means of bringing together parliamentary representatives from across the region and the EU to stimulate debate and joint action to help the western Balkans in their progress towards European integration.

The Minister for Europe toured the region this year. He and I agree that the economic and political situation is slowly improving but that there are still many legacies from the past that need to be addressed, not least Kosovo and co-operation with the ICTY. Croatia, I am pleased to say, is well on the way to European Union membership, hopefully alongside Romania and Bulgaria, but there are still hurdles for Serbia and Montenegro. On our visit, the hon. Member for Ribble Valley and I emphasised the need for Serbia and Montenegro to co-operate fully with the ICTY. To be fair, the Montenegrins have co-operated, and it can only be hoped that their presence within the state union will bring further pressure to bear on Serbia. Macedonia and Albania also face many economic and political difficulties before they can be seen as viable candidate countries, but that is their aspiration and it should be encouraged.

As the Minister said, the region has made good progress over the past three years through political, institutional and economic reform. A return to large-scale conflict now seems unlikely, although, as hon. Members have said, we cannot rule it out. The problems of extremism and ethnic tensions are receding, but they remain under the surface, as the violence in Kosovo in March demonstrated. The Kosovars suffered enormously under the Serbian tyranny of Milosevic, and it is easy to understand their anger and suspicion; but the Serbs in Kosovo have rights too, not least a right to live in security and peace. I support the rights of Kosovars to self-determination, but that can become a reality only if they recognise the rights of the Serbian minority. If we look at Kosovo's past, we can see that the only way forward is through its independence. Under Tito, it was an independent republic in all but name: it had its own judicial system, supreme court, elected assembly and national bank, and it had equality with the other republics of the former Yugoslavia in the presidency. Milosevic destroyed that, and I am sorry to say that the Dayton accords allowed it.

The Minister and the Government recognise the extent to which immature political and economic systems frustrate progress in the region, and how some forces, particularly criminal forces, can impede progress through undue influence and corruption. Systems of good governance and the establishment of accountable law enforcement structures and judiciaries are priorities for the Balkan countries. The problem of refugees and displaced persons remains a key challenge, but the creation of bodies such as the Cetinje forum shows a willingness among parliamentarians in the region to address those issues, and to do so through dialogue, not force. I was pleased that at Cetinje I could outline some of the measures in the Department for International Development's new regional assistance plan.

I welcome the sharp focus of the Department's work. As the Minister has acknowledged, there is a problem in that donors frequently tend to be driven by divergent agendas, in some cases based on specific political interests. The European Union and the World Bank, for example, have different approaches, which can lead to conflicting advice. I welcome his commitment and that of the Department to work with other donors to iron out some of the differences.

DFID's resources are relatively modest, but they are not insignificant. DFID has a key role to play to ensure that the other donors' activities are co-ordinated and lead to best value. I welcome DFID's concentration on poverty reduction strategies and capacity building, which the Minister outlined, and its decision to use its development assistance primarily in support of other donors' activities.

Widespread poverty in parts of the western Balkans, particularly the former Yugoslavia, is a relatively new phenomenon. Yugoslavia had a relatively strong economy, low levels of poverty and a state system to support the vulnerable, but that masked an economy with serious structural problems and unsustainable borrowing. The goal of European integration is the single most effective spur to take measures to bring economic and political stability, but the short-term risks of conflict still need to be addressed and the international community needs to continue to provide support for post-conflict recovery.

The central European experience can provide some lessons for the western Balkans. The most successful countries in central and eastern Europe are those that can attract foreign investment. I am pleased that there are encouraging signs and that countries such as Albania, which is perhaps the furthest from European membership, have taken that issue on board.

Earlier this week, the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and I met representatives of the chamber of commerce from Albania. Some of them were here partly for the world travel exhibition but also to talk about inward investment in tourism, agriculture, mineral exploration and energy production. I know that DFID, in its strategy as a stakeholder, is engaging with the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, the EU and European Bank for Reconstruction and Development to assess the appropriate forms of assistance.

As I have recently returned from Montenegro, perhaps I can talk about some of its needs. While I was there, I visited Podgorica for meetings with Prime Minister Djukanovic and the Speaker, Ranko Krivokapic. If time allows, I would like to make some comments later about the outcome of those talks, but I also visited other parts of the country, which included a visit to the port of Bar, and met representatives of the development company Nimont, which is developing the resource, and representatives of the Port of Bar Holding Company.

Clearly, the port has an important future in the economy of Montenegro and its neighbours. It is underused compared with its capacity and the use that it had before the conflict in the region. I have forwarded details of the port and its needs to my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade and Investment, as well as giving details of Montenegro's policies for dealing with inward investment. In order to achieve its potential, improvements are needed in the infrastructure, in roads and railways. The best strategy for poverty reduction in some of the poorest areas in the north would be road developments to enable them to transport and export their agricultural produce.

When in London on their IPU visit in March, the Serbia and Montenegro delegation met representatives of the EBRD as part of the programme organised by the British group. They followed that up in April with a letter to the president of the EBRD, Mr. Lemierre, addressing the two goals set out by the bank: democratic development and the market economy. They spelled out the need for road development to assist the growth of tourism and agriculture as well as the development of hydroelectric power. They have the potential to become an energy exporting country. Sadly, however, no response to that letter had been received when I was in Montenegro in September, although I am pleased to learn that last week the UK director of the EBRD visited Belgrade and Podgorica. I hope that that will lead to significant developments.

One of the key projects is the Adriatic-Ionian highway, which will eventually connect Trieste in Italy with Thessaloniki in Greece. Work is already well under way on that highway in Croatia, which should reach the Montenegran border by 2007. Hopefully the road will continue to its final destination.

There is a need in Montenegro for two further roads to support that highway, one of which is from Bar to Bijelo Polje, via Podgorica. Part of that road is already under construction, with funding from the privatisation process in Montenegro, and donor assistance from the European Union. The second road, which has been argued for persuasively, is from Risan to Pljevlja, which is about 150 miles. Part of that road is already built. If completed it would be the shortest link between Serbia and eastern Bosnia and the sea, and connect the areas of Montenegro most likely to attract inward investment. The other important proposal is to connect the railway system, from Podgorica to Albania. Those projects will be crucial measures for the developing economies of Montenegro and its neighbours.

Finally, I should like to comment on the discussions that I had with Prime Minister Djukanovic and the Speaker of the Montenegran Parliament. In my meeting with Prime Minister Djukanovic I stressed the need for the opposition parties to be brought back into the democratic process. At the time they were boycotting the Parliament, so I am pleased that there has been a positive development and that the opposition politicians have re-engaged with the parliamentary process. I also stressed the need for co-operation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. I said earlier that Montenegro was not the sinner in that, but I hope that it will bring pressure to bear on its neighbours.

I said at the outset that we must recognise the legitimate aspirations of the peoples of the Balkans. We cannot impose on them a settlement that is unacceptable to them; however, it is the view of Her Majesty's Government and the EU that the state union of Serbia and Montenegro offers the best prospects for entry into the EU.

The EU Foreign Ministers decided at Maastricht to open the way for separate discussions with Serbia and Montenegro on tariff issues. The two economies are completely at variance. Serbia still has the dinar, but Montenegro has the euro. The make-up of the two economies is structurally different. Montenegro has none of the problems with subsidies to industry that Serbia has, so it has a different path to follow, so it is right that the EU Foreign Ministers have recognised that with separate discussions.

On the future of the state union, no one can say what the wishes of the Montenegran people are, unless there is a referendum in 2006. I stressed to Prime Minister Djukanovic the view of the EU and of Her Majesty's Government of the importance of the maintenance of the state union. However, I got the distinct impression from almost everyone I spoke to in Montenegro that there is no great desire to continue the union with Serbia. Djukanovic hopes that a peaceful divorce can be negotiated.

Mr. Randall: Would it not be true to say that the results of the most recent referendum in Montenegro were split 50:50? It is strange to hear the hon. Gentleman saying that the majority of Montenegrins do not want the union with Serbia.

John Austin: My comment was that the majority of Montenegrins to whom I spoke expressed that view, including the Prime Minister of Montenegro and the Speaker of the Parliament. On what they thought the likely outcome of a referendum would be, their views differed, ranging from very close to 60:40. However, as we have seen recently in the north-east, predicting results is a dangerous business.

At the end of the day, Montenegro and Serbia will have to reach their own decisions. If they decide, whether by referendum or negotiation, to go their separate ways, we must accept their legitimate democratic wishes. That is not desirable, and I stress to Djukanovic the views of the European Union and our Government that the state union is the best mechanism for entry into the EU. However, in a democracy we have to listen to the will of the people.

3.31 pm

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): I welcome this debate and echo the Minister's comments on the important role that British armed forces, police and non-governmental organisations are playing in the region. There is a broad cross-party consensus on the UK's role and the way forward.

The region has a terrible history—other hon. Members have referred to that, so I will not do so in great detail—but it is vital for the United Kingdom and the European Union, and we have a special responsibility to do whatever possible to assist it. The conflict in the Balkans happened in our backyard. I felt, perhaps for the first time, anger and frustration at something happening so close to the UK. It involved people I knew: friends I visited when in Yugoslavia, who subsequently were in Croatia. One served in the Croatian army and was aware of some massacres that happened. As the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) said, those atrocities were carried out on both sides—Croat forces were involved in atrocities that my friend was aware of. We have a special responsibility to do what we can to ensure that peace and stability are restored to the region.

There are common objectives and areas for us to build on to achieve security, stability, democracy and prosperity in the region. There is not much doubt that the conflict in the Balkans has scarred Europe and remains a real concern. Several hon. Members have referred to the outbreak of violence in March when 19 people were killed. At the time, BBC news reports quoted a Human Rights Watch report stating that NATO peacekeepers and the police force had not co-ordinated their response to the violence that swept through the province. Does the Minister agree with that assessment? If so, is he aware of any measures implemented since to try to improve co-ordination and ensure that any similar event will be better dealt with?

Mr. Brazier: That question is closely related to my question on whether NATO is reaching across the divide in the ethnic balance when recruiting for the police force.

Tom Brake: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I am sure that the Minister will address both those points.

Again according to the BBC report, after that incident many people were left homeless. That was in March, so presumably they are no longer homeless. Will the Minister confirm that?

The scale of the international presence is a reminder of the region's fragility. In Macedonia, there are 200 police from the EU. In Kosovo, there are 3,500 police and 18,000 NATO peacekeepers. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, as other hon. Members have said, there is a force of 7,000 NATO troops, who may be replaced by EU troops by the end of this year. In Albania, there are the remnants of the NATO force from the Kosovo conflict. Clearly, there is still great instability and insecurity in the region, which requires substantial forces to achieve the desired stability.

Although territorial ambitions and ethnic tensions remain high, there is some hope and there are examples of progress. Albania and Croatia are involved in the NATO partnership for peace, which aims to forge permanent relationships between partner countries and NATO, and there is also the NATO membership action plan for Macedonia. So, positive moves are being made towards stability and security in the region.

Although our priorities must be to end the conflict and to establish stability and the rule of law, democracy is the next thing that we must tackle. The very different and carefully constructed arrangements that have been put in place in the various countries show how difficult it is to bring democracy to the region. We must strike a balance between realism, or what can be achieved, and the application of legitimate pressure to achieve what we would really like to be achieved.

Bosnia and Herzegovina is a good example of that. For all its faults, the Dayton accord led to the Peace Implementation Council, which, by its very construction, demonstrates how complex the region is. The council, which is headed by my erstwhile leader, Lord Ashdown, comprises no fewer than 55 countries and agencies. They support the peace process by providing financial assistance or troops for the stabilisation force, or by directly running operations in the region.

As hon. Members will know, the rule of law is crucial in the post-conflict scenario and for much of the time it remains an issue. That is despite the fact that the region has had lots of practice, if I can put it that way, with elections. Although municipal elections have been held, they are a reminder that democracy is about more than elections. Civil society, human rights, a functioning bureaucracy, proper legal systems, pluralism and protection for minorities are all necessary, as are the recognition of obligations towards the international community and a positive response to the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, which hon. Members have mentioned. A quick glance at the region shows that there is much more work to be done on democracy, and many imperfections must still be dealt with.

I echo the points that hon. Members have made about the region's economies. Twenty years ago, the economic situation was relatively stable, albeit with hidden faults. Certain countries will have to put in many years' hard work before they can return to that situation, and the statistics confirm that. The central role of economic revitalisation was recognised after the Kosovo crisis. The EU stabilisation and association agreements are a positive way forward, and progress is being made by countries such as Bosnia and Herzegovina, which two years ago was declared to have completed the first stages of the EU road map. Its currency has achieved some stability and the World Bank has recognised that the country has moved from post-conflict to transition status. Less progress has been made in Albania, which still has problems with corruption and the rule of law. Negotiations are being held on the stabilisation and association agreements, however, and slow progress is being made.

Croatia is a much better success story. There has been a step change in its co-operation with the ICTY. Slovenia, which is also a very good example in the region, acquired EU membership this year.

We broadly support the regional assistance plan set out by the Government, although the Minister will know that I wrote to him after his visit and as a result of a parliamentary question on the drop in aid to the region after 6 November. The impact of that drop is likely to be felt only in 2005–06, although some countries will receive up to 25 per cent. less funding than they had expected. Have any donors been identified who will fill the funding gap in 2005–06? What will happen to the planned projects that were to be funded by the Department for International Development? Are there contingency plans to address the shortfall?

The Minister's visit to the region was obviously very informative. As a result of what he saw, will he reconsider the funding that DFID provides and see whether there is a need to increase it, perhaps to pre-6 November 2003 levels?

The regional assistance plan set out clear terms for engagement for the region and established the range of assistance that has been offered in recent years. However, the plan makes it very clear that there is a lack of co-ordination among international donors, so I hope the Minister gives us more detail on how the Government intend to address that and on the role that DFID can play.

There is a need to harmonise and focus efforts through the EU. The EU aid programme is not always seen as the best distributor of development assistance, but it may still be the best way forward, given the wider political moves and the role of the EU in the region.

The Government's stated objectives are EU association policies and processes that recognise and support nationally owned, pro-poor development strategies and that work with other donors and partner Governments to agree and implement a common agenda for improved aid effectiveness in each country in the region. The UK Government's policy of active engagement in the region should take account of development concerns. We support that multilateral approach, which is responsive to the needs of the countries and takes account of their wider responsibilities to the international community and their aspirations for closer integration with the rest of Europe.

These are clearly very difficult times for the region. Progress is being made, albeit at a very slow rate, but we believe that the region is on the right track and that the UK Government are right to continue their constructive engagement there.

3.43 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): We are most fortunate to have a debate on this important subject. The United Kingdom, as the Minister rightly reminded us, has long taken an interest in the Balkans. When you and I first entered the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the debates were illumined by contributions from Fitzroy Maclean, on the Yugoslav side as it were, and Julian Amery, on the Albanian. The second world war saw the involvement of other personalities of stature such as Reginald Hibbert in Yugoslavia, Billy Maclean—who was also in the House—and David Smiley in Albania.

[Mr. John Wilkinson]

The problem in recent years has been to stay ahead of the game. That was an implicit part of the speech of the hon. Member for Erith and Thamesmead (John Austin). My honourable colleague, who worked so nobly in the Inter-Parliamentary Union, sought to inject a note of realism, pointing out that we were trying to maintain old structures that had outlived their usefulness.

Perhaps that is understandable for a region that has experienced three empires and a period of centralised communist federation in this century: the Ottoman empire, the Austro-Hungarian empire and the third reich, as well as Tito's Yugoslavia. It has endured a process of very rapid political and social change.

We must try to keep abreast of the realities on the ground. It is good that we have experts of the calibre of the hon. Member for Erith and Thamesmead and my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall), who is a distinguished Serbo-Croat scholar, to take part in the debate. Our Front-Bench spokesmen have made the debate much clearer, and I am glad of that.

However, I thought that the speech from my political neighbour, the Under-Secretary of State for International Development, the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas), was perhaps somewhat sanitised and over-optimistic. The reports that I have heard from the west Balkans are not so sanguine as his speech, and the latest one, from Kosovo following the elections there and the boycott of the process by the Serbian community, spoke of continued persecution—that was the phrase that my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) used—of the Serb minority.

Therefore, while we applaud the work that Her Majesty's Government, the European Union and NATO are doing, we should be highly cautious about imagining that the stabilisation process can proceed without further setbacks like the one so painfully experienced in Kosovo in March. We need to do everything we can as parliamentarians to bring opinion formers and political leaders together across racial and national boundaries.

Of course, my colleague the hon. Member for Erith and Thamesmead has been doing just that through the IPU, and he has spoken of the conference in Montenegro that he attended. We do the same in the Assembly of the Western European Union and are according generous membership opportunities to the countries of the west Balkans. The Council of Europe, too, constantly monitors progress towards the democratic standards that we enjoin on the countries and peoples in the west Balkans. That is all to the good.

I am apprehensive, however, about the constantly repeated phrase "standards before status" in relation to Kosovo. I understand the EU's desire to set out clear objectives that have to be met before there can be any question of the interim Government of Kosovo acquiring permanent de jure status, but, of course, elected representatives deserve authority, and people, particularly those in the majority, become frustrated if those whom they elect to what they suppose to be power cannot take the decisions because they are second-guessed by the United Nations Interim Administration in Kosovo.

Therefore, as the European Union high representative Javier Solana has realised, and as the EU made clear at the Thessaloniki summit in autumn 2003, it is necessary to move forward. A decision must be taken—I would say in the early part of next year—on the status of Kosovo. I cannot see any basis for making that decision other than self-determination for the people of Kosovo. What other principle will stand the test of time? What other basis will meet the needs of the majority? That is in accordance with all that we espouse in the United Kingdom. Do we not rest our case for sovereignty in the Falklands on self-determination? Do we not maintain the Union of Great Britain and Northern Ireland on that basis? Unless someone can find a better and more durable formula, I would hope that the move towards Kosovo's ultimate status is made on the basis of self-determination.

Until that move is made, there can be no security in the western Balkans. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, no one has come up with any better formula than the Dayton agreement, nor do I think that anyone would wish to tinker or tamper with that formula. It is not ideal, but Bosnia and Herzegovina is a peculiar state. As the Romans would have said, it is supremely sui generis, as, to a lesser extent, is the Federal Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. As the Minister remarked, it is probably fortunate that the referendum failed and therefore the Ohrid agreement was not called into question. Kosovo, however, is so emotive for the Serbs, and so much the touchstone for all the military and political efforts made by the EU and the Euro-Atlantic community, that we must get it right.

Where do we begin? It is likely that self-determination based on a referendum no doubt carefully monitored and observed by the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe, the Council of Europe and other interested parties—perhaps representatives from the Quintet—will lead to an independent state.

What should that state do and how should it behave? First, it must behave as a good neighbour towards neighbouring states. It must demonstrate respect for their sovereignty and their territorial integrity. In other words, it should be a state within its existing boundaries. I was struck by the historical allusion made by the hon. Member for Erith and Thamesmead, who pointed out that Kosovo was, to all intents and purposes, totally autonomous in Tito's time.

The EU's 1999 declaration spoke of Kosovo having autonomy within Yugoslavia. The significant phrase is "within Yugoslavia". Serbia will have to be persuaded that it is in its interests that the Kosovo question be finally defused. It is in Kosovo's interests to become a member of the EU and a member of partnership for peace, and that it should co-operate in the stability pact for south-eastern Europe. Kosovo must be a state where the rights of all citizens are respected and all their historic traditions are fully safeguarded and regarded as a common patrimony for all citizens. In other words, all citizens must be full citizens and all citizens must be equal under the law, with no discrimination of any kind between them.

Kosovo must also be a state that plays its part in the war against terror. Hon. Members, particularly the two distinguished Front-Bench spokesmen, referred to the drugs problem, the serious unemployment problem in Kosovo and the risk of terrorism in the west Balkans. Kosovo must be part of the struggle against terror and the war against drugs.

Kosovo must also have a currency that makes sense in the modern world. Again, I was struck by the allusion made by the hon. Member for Erith and Thamesmead to the progress that the Montenegrin economy has made. It is a modernising economy that uses the euro. That suits the Montenegrins, but retaining the Yugoslav dinar will not suit Kosovo, although retaining our own currency here in the United Kingdom suits us exceptionally well. Each according to his individual circumstances.

I conclude by saying that the approach must have the support of the United States; it should not be just a European Union approach. The Franco-German-Belgium-Luxembourg axis in other policy areas does not make me very happy, but I hope and trust that on this matter it sticks together and that the Greeks, too, understand that the resolution of the Kosovan problem is important for them. If that can be done, there is genuine hope, especially if the Russians can be kept on side and the Americans persuaded that a stabilised, independent Kosovo is in their interests because over time they will be able to reduce the NATO presence.

On that basis I could share some of the Minister's hopes and aspirations, but his optimism is a little premature at this stage, as Her Majesty's Government are still unwilling to grasp the nettle of the final political status of Kosovo—the sine qua non of progress.

3.56 pm

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate. I did not want to be too gloomy, but having listened to the speeches, I fear that I will end up being like Banquo's ghost at the banquet.

The situation is far from the picture that has been painted. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) alluded to the fact that many years ago when I was a slim young man, I was lucky enough to study Serbo-Croat at university. That political influences have turned that language into three separate languages is an indication of the situation in the region. I have recently re-read some of the set books that I had to read as a student—thankfully they are now in translation—including, for example, books by the Nobel laureate, Ivo Andrich, who wrote about Bosnia. I recommend "Bridge Over the River Drina" to hon. Members. Bosnia in my student days was diverse; of course, it had the past that hon. Members have spoken of, and there were tensions between Serb and Croat, but Bosnia was a society that worked very well, by and large.

The Balkans are in a more dismal state now than they have been for a long time, and the European nations have not been entirely helpful. Sadly, one outcome is that a lot of people in the region, not only in Serbia, but certainly in Bosnia, Macedonia and Montenegro, probably look back at the days of Tito with nostalgia, which is a mistake, because his regime was far from happy.

I am pleased that many hon. Members recognise that the situation is not quite what we hear it is. Regrettably, because of other political considerations, not least the recent events in Iraq, I have a feeling that Kosovo is being sidelined or even made out to be an example of intervention at its very best, when as we have heard in the debate, what happened there is unresolved. We have got ourselves into a position in which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood said, there is a state that is in effect a protectorate of the United Nations, NATO, the EU or whatever, and it is fundamental to the future of the whole area. There is no simple answer. However, I do not want to be too gloomy, and I pay tribute to the people who are trying to do something positive there.

I was fortunate enough earlier today to have a meeting with the Minister and to hear about his recent visit to the region. I went with Mr. Charles Storer of a charity called Hope and Aid Direct. Its motto sums up what I hope we are trying do, which is to take aid, not sides. Although I might sometimes be portrayed as being more pro-Serb, I certainly do not want to be considered in that way; I want the whole region to be considered fairly.

The situation in Serbia is very difficult. We can talk in this Chamber about all our aspirations for democratic and judicial reforms, but it is not that easy. It has taken centuries to get where we are today. As has been said, in historical terms, Serbia came out from the Turkish empire only in the 19th century. Today, the proliferation of political parties in Serbia makes it difficult to get anywhere. There are a vast number of jokes about how many political parties there are and how many people have to meet in a single room. We value the system that we have. The proliferation of many more parties would simply complicate matters. If we look at what is going on in Serbia, we can see that the situation there is impossible.

Let me return to the issue of Kosovo. I must reiterate that some of the picture that we have is of things getting better slowly, but what I have heard and what we know happened in March show that that is not the case. I am sure that people on all sides are trying hard, but we are talking about a country that has been devastated by war, is still suffering from poverty and underdevelopment and is being ignored, by and large, by the rest of the world. There is incredible polarisation, as we have seen. Now the pendulum has swung and the Serbs, the Roma and other ethnic groups are living in a virtual state of apartheid. I think that the situation is probably worse than apartheid, although I cannot comment on the situation as it was in South Africa, because I have no experience of it.

Mr. Brazier: As one who has been to Kosovo twice and who went to South Africa a number of times before the end of apartheid, I can assure my hon. Friend that the situation is much worse.

Mr. Randall: I do not want to get into that side of things—I make enough enemies as it is—but I think that what is going on is appalling. One lot of violence against one group leads to violence on the other side. Since June 1999, 2,013 Serbs and non-Albanians—some of them children—have disappeared. People do not know what their plight is. Albanians disappeared in that period too.

[Mr. Randall]

We are talking about families. Those things strike at the heart of these people. Talk of reconciliation is a long way off. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood talked about Northern Ireland. There, history goes back an extremely long way. One cannot mention Cromwell in certain parts of Northern Ireland without being hissed at at best.

What can we do in Kosovo? I include Serbia in this, because it is a forgotten part of the Balkans. One thing we should be doing is improving people's economic position. If we do, they will begin to put aside their hatreds. It is poverty that breeds hatred and nationalism. I visited Northern Ireland a few years ago with a cross-party group. The leader of the Irish Labour party told me that his grandson had been asked, "Do you want Northern Ireland to become part of the Republic?" and that he had answered, "Well, how much would it cost?" It is as if the quality of people's lives means that such issues are not as important in today's world. We must therefore make a big effort to ensure that people in the region feel a lot better off.

Hon. Members have said that there was previously no poverty in some of the areas that we are discussing, but I would dispute that view. I walked around villages in all parts of Yugoslavia and I saw real poverty, but it was not the poverty of sadness, if I can put it like that. Now, there is not only material poverty, but a poverty in terms of people's feelings.

Kosovo is not the success that it is sometimes portrayed as. I wonder how many hon. Members realise that there was an earthquake in Kosovo in April 2002, in which five people died, 180 were injured and 6,000 roofs were destroyed. That has been forgotten; indeed, I cannot remember seeing it in the papers here or on the 24-hour news channels, despite the fact that they are always scratching around for something to talk about.

Infrastructure improvements must be made, but from reports that I have had from Mr. Storer and others in Kosovo, it seems that Government support is unfairly distributed. There are still empty shells everywhere. The Minister spoke about land mines in Bosnia, but what are we doing in Serbia and Kosovo about cluster bombs and the depleted uranium left behind after the NATO intervention? There are major power shutdowns daily.

The hospitals are poorly equipped, but I am not convinced that building a strong civil service is the answer. It might help once hospitals are up and running, but if I were asked whether I wanted a better civil service or a better hospital, I think I know what I would want. Of course, I am simplifying things, and I am sure that I will get into trouble, as I always do, but I am getting old and I do not care too much these days.

We have heard about the unemployment in Kosovo. How can we have any kind of decent state with such unemployment? There is also incredible widespread ethnic fear and tension. I asked the other day whether it was wise for the Serbs to boycott the elections. However, when they visit their cemeteries—the ones that have not been destroyed—they have to go in armoured convoys. It is strange that we should even ask why they think that voting in an election is not a priority and will not really mean anything. If we are to have elections, people must be able to walk to a polling station without having to be surrounded by armoured cars.

People hardly have any food, and what they have is of poor quality. The collecting centres for internally displaced people are appalling. I visited one in southern Serbia last February, and I was appalled by what I saw. As the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) said, this is in our backyard in Europe. Away from the main areas of Pristina, some people, not just in Serb enclaves, have an awful existence. I am not sure that we are getting to the right people—I am not blaming the British Government because there is a whole European Union out there. Thank goodness for those NGOs that go out and help, but they are pulling out for a variety of reasons, such as frustration or because something has cropped up in another part of the world.

We must all ensure that we never forget what has happened in the Balkans, our part in creating it and our part in restoring faith there.

4.11 pm

Mr. Gareth Thomas: With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I want to respond to this extremely useful debate, which has refocused our attention on the western Balkans region, which, as a series of hon. Members from all parties have said, has disappeared from our media. Like other speakers, I deprecate that.

In the time available, I will try to answer many of the points raised. First, I say to my constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), that I did not present a sanitised version of the situation. There are genuine reasons to be pleased about the progress made, for example the million refugees returning to Bosnia and Herzegovina. However, as I said, and as every other speaker today has mentioned, the fragility of the situation and the considerable economic and development challenges require the international community to maintain a focus on the western Balkans.

The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) asked about the military role of NATO as against the role of EUFOR, the European Union force. After the transition, NATO will still have a role in the western Balkans. Rather than continuing to secure the region, it will focus on the hunt for war criminals and help to modernise and reform the local armed forces, for example by promoting ethnic integration. It will also play an as yet to be defined role in counter-terrorism. The UK will have a leading role in EUFOR. There will be close co-operation between EUFOR and NATO, so the hon. Gentleman can be more relaxed about his concerns.

Mr. Brazier: The Minister talked about an as yet to be defined counter-terrorism role. The fact remains that, however large the British involvement, there must be a single, clearly defined chain of command. It must be clear, not only who is responsible for what, but who is answerable to whom. There still seems to be a recipe for confusion.

Mr. Thomas: The hon. Gentleman has more experience than me on these matters, but the need for clarity about roles is well understood by the military—both NATO and EUFOR. I am sure that the issue will be dealt with.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the pay of the Kosovan police, and I will write to him on that.

On the ethnic mix question, we are working through the global conflict prevention pool on a series of initiatives in the region to promote ethnic mixes in the police force, the armed forces and the civil service.

Let me give as an example a policing project in southern Serbia, which has helped to improve local community and police relations. It is taking place in an ethnically mixed area. As well as building policing skills, it is helping to address community safety, one of the very issues that the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) mentioned as being of continuing importance for our focus.

The hon. Member for Canterbury also talked about refugees. One of the ways in which we have supported the Serbian Government has been through technical assistance—we have helped them to prepare a comprehensive poverty reduction strategy. Because of the number of refugees and internally displaced people who have yet to be settled in Serbia, one of the key issues for the Serbian Government is how to deal with the poverty and the needs of those people. We have sought to support them in preparing a strategy to tackle the issue.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about the name change, and the American decision on Macedonia. I am aware of no immediate plans to make a corresponding gesture. He also alluded to the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. I believe that he has misquoted him in the context of this debate. My right hon. Friend made it clear that there is a need to reform the way in which the EU delivers aid, and I share absolutely his desire to see more money going to low-income countries. However, we also need to ensure that assistance continues to go to the western Balkans. Europe could promote more loans from the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development and more loans and assistance from the European Investment Bank. That is precisely the sort of help with infrastructure projects that my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Thamesmead (John Austin) said was necessary.

I welcome the work of the Inter-Parliamentary Union—and my hon. Friend's role in its chair—and that of the Western European Union, to which the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood alluded, in combating corruption and in the promotion of good governance, minority rights and respect for the ICTY. The sustained engagement of both those key parliamentary bodies with parliamentarians in the western Balkans is warmly to be welcomed.

I am grateful that my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Thamesmead supports our regional assistance plan; he is right to focus on the continuing need for infrastructure development. In that respect, the role of the European Community, in particular the EBRD and the EIB, is particularly important. I hope that my hon. Friend will be reassured to hear that the EBRD invested some €959 million in south-east Europe in 2003, and has ambitious plans to further expand its lending and its western Balkans operations, in order to promote private sector development as well as the infrastructure development projects that he mentioned.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) asked whether, following my visit, I would be thinking about the level of our funding for the western Balkans. We need to consider our funding in the context of all the funding that goes to the region—it is one of the most aided parts of the world. We want to use our resources to help to make more effective the assistance that is being given by the EC and other donors, and by the World Bank. During my visit last week, I spoke to some of the donors, such as the United Nations Development Programme and the World Bank, about how we can improve donor co-ordination and the effectiveness of the international aid effort in the western Balkans.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me about people made homeless in Kosovo by the violence earlier in the year and whether they are still homeless. Some are still homeless, but the provisional institutions of self-government have actively contributed to the effort to rehouse those who have been homeless since the March riots.

As I said, the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood is right to counsel caution and say that the international community needs to remain engaged and to focus on the needs of the western Balkans. He is right that more responsibilities should be transferred from UNMIK to the people of Kosovo, in the form of the provisional institutions of self-government. One of the key issues that I discussed with Soren Jessen-Petersen, the new special representative, was his plan to accelerate that transfer, which I warmly welcome. As was rightly mentioned, the status of Kosovo arouses strong passions in the region. The principle of self-determination must of course be taken into account, but we need to try to build consensus on the future of Kosovo if it is not to be the destabilising force that it has been in the past.

I enjoyed the meeting that I had with the hon. Member for Uxbridge and the NGO Hope and Aid Direct, which has made an impressive contribution in the western Balkans. I hope that I will be able to provide further assistance to its efforts. The infrastructure challenges, which the hon. Gentleman referred to, are considerable. The EC is doing an important job to tackle those issues, through direct assistance and through the EBRD and the EIB. The choice is not between the civil service and the health service. A strong civil service is necessary for the western Balkans to continue developing, but so is a strong health service.

We have given considerable assistance to health services in the western Balkans at different times, but at present we think that we have a niche to help to develop the civil service. Other donors are investing considerable sums to assist health services, education and other services. One of the important things about co-ordinating work with other donors is recognising where problems are not being properly addressed and seeking to provide appropriate assistance. That is why we are focusing on the capacity of the civil service.

This has been an excellent debate, with strong contributions from both Government and Opposition Members. I warmly welcome the opportunity to hear other hon. Members' experience of the region. I hope that this debate ensures that the region will not forgotten in the House, but will start to generate the media attention that it continues to deserve.

Question put and agreed to.

AIDS/TB/Malaria (Global Fund)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Vernon Coaker.]

9.30 am

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to draw the attention of the Chamber to the work and growing needs of the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria.

In September 2000, Heads of State and Government from across the world met at the United Nations millennium summit to address the major challenges facing humanity at the dawn of the new millennium. The outcome was the millennium declaration—a powerful statement of shared fundamental values and key objectives. Of course, values and objectives are essential, but in a vacuum they are just words. Crucially, the millennium declaration also contains eight goals, with 18 associated concrete, quantifiable and time-limited targets. Nearly 190 countries have signed up to the millennium development goals, and the Department for International Development has made them the main focus of its work. Goal six of the millennium declaration is to "Combat HIV/AIDS, malaria and other diseases".

The associated targets and indicators commit the international community, by 2015, to have halted and begun to reverse the spread of HIV/AIDS and the incidence of malaria and tuberculosis.

It was clear to anyone who knew anything about AIDS, malaria or TB that we did not have a chance of making so much as a dent in their spread without a massive increase in international effort. The figures speak for themselves. Last year, close to 5 million people acquired HIV, bringing the number of those living with the virus to about 38 million. The AIDS epidemic claimed nearly 3 million lives last year, many as a result of TB. Each year, more than 8 million people become sick with TB, 2 million of whom do not survive. Malaria strikes 300 million to 500 million people every year and kills more than 1 million, nearly all of them in Africa, and most of them children under five years of age. These three diseases are entirely preventable and treatable, but between them they cause more than 6 million deaths worldwide every year, mostly in the developing world. Every death is a personal tragedy. However, the diseases strike not only individuals; they attack communities, regions and nations, causing economic decline, social breakdown and political instability.

In April 2001, invoking the millennium pledges, Kofi Annan announced his proposal for a global fund. In June 2001, the United Nations General Assembly special session on AIDS concluded with a commitment to create such a fund, and the G8 summit the following month announced the launch of a new Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. Just a few months later, in June 2002, the Global Fund board approved the first round of grants to 36 countries.

The Global Fund is an independent public-private partnership. Its 23-person board includes representatives of donor and recipient Governments, non-governmental organisations, the private sector and affected communities. The board also includes representatives of UNAIDS, the World Health Organisation and the World Bank, but those three do not have voting rights. The current chair of the fund is US Secretary of Health and Human Services, Tommy Thompson.

In its first two years, the Global Fund has approved 314 grants in 128 countries, totalling $3 billion. Some 61 per cent. of the grants are to go to Africa, 23 per cent. to Asia and north Africa, and 16 per cent. to Latin America, the Caribbean and eastern Europe.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is also a case for including the very poorest nations of the Pacific, such as Papua New Guinea, the Solomon Islands and Kiribati among the countries that urgently require help from the fund?

Dr. Strang: I agree that many countries deserve help from the fund. Provided that their Governments or agencies can introduce meaningful schemes, which will give value for money and tackle the problem, they should get help. My hon. Friend confirms how huge the challenge is.

Some 56 per cent. of the fund's grants are targeted at HIV/AIDS, 31 per cent. at malaria and 13 per cent. at TB. Hon. Members may be interested to hear of some recent achievements. More than 10,000 insecticide-treated nets are being subsidised for pregnant women in Madagascar. Private practitioners in the Philippines are being trained in the internationally recommended directly observed treatment short-course—DOTS—treatment strategy for TB. In Kenya, 250 community centres are being used for HIV prevention outreach work. HIV and TB testing laboratories in Moldova are being modernised.

The Global Fund operates in a series of rounds. Every eight months, it launches a new round, issuing an invitation to interested parties to apply for grants. Applications are then scrutinised by the fund's technical review panel and sent to the fund's board with a recommended course of action. The principal recipient of a grant does not have to be a Government agency. It could be a community-based organisation or an NGO, a faith-based organisation, an affected community, an academic institution or a private sector body.

Proposals are normally made for five years, but a two-year grant agreement is initially negotiated. Disbursements are made during those two years, usually quarterly. Towards the end of that time, the overall performance of the programme is evaluated by the Global Fund to determine whether to renew the grant.

Groundwork is done to ensure that the funded projects are appropriate to local needs. Country co-ordinating mechanisms are partnerships that develop grant proposals designed to fill gaps in local HIV, TB and malaria programmes. Those partnerships also monitor the proposal's implementation, and co-ordinate with other domestic programmes. The country co-ordinating mechanisms are expected to have broad representation, although it is argued that, in some countries, the representation is still not broad enough and that there should be better representation of non-government bodies in particular.

Steps are also taken to ensure that the money will be well spent. Prior to paying an approved grant, the fund appoints a local fund agent to assess the fiscal and administrative capacity and systems of the grant's proposed principal recipient. Through a grant agreement with the Global Fund, the recipient is made accountable for its expenditure and results. When further disbursements are requested from the fund, the local fund agent must verify the evidence of the progress achieved.

The secretariat aspires to be as lean an operation as possible. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development stated:

> "Administration costs are kept low and . . . are expected to decline as grant expenditure increases."—[Official Report, 10 May 2004; Vol. 421, c. 60W.]

Less than 3 per cent. of the annual commitment is used for central administration and management of the Global Fund each year. An additional 2 per cent. is used for local oversight of grants by local fund agents.

The Global Fund has adopted other mechanisms to ensure prudent and efficient spending. For example, the fund must have received all the money for a grant before a grant agreement can be signed. That money then sits in the fund's account for the two or three years of the grant, gradually being disbursed in instalments. The board's comprehensive funding policy understandably errs on the side of caution, so much so that some argue for its rules to be loosened. I would be interested to hear the view of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for International Development about that live issue.

The global struggle against AIDS, TB and malaria requires huge resources. Donors' records of contributing to the fund are patchy. The G8 had the privilege of launching the fund, and those wealthy nations bear a responsibility to live up to their commitments. The UK's recent record is a good one, and I expect that my hon. Friend will say something about that. On 20 July, the Prime Minister launched the UK's new strategy to tackle AIDS in the developing world, and announced that we would double our contribution to the fund to more than £150 million over the next three years. The UK has also consistently made it clear that our donations to the Global Fund are additional to the resources that we already make available to fight AIDS, TB and malaria.

The United States has significantly increased its pledge this year, agreeing to give up to $547 million to the Global Fund in 2004. However, that pledge was limited to a maximum of one third of the total amount received by the fund. Contributions fell short, despite an urgent appeal to which the UK was the first to respond. Unless the US exercises discretion, it will give $87 million less than its maximum potential contribution this year. Does my hon. Friend have any news on that?

Things look bleaker for next year. The President has requested only $200 million for the fund in 2005. I believe that the House and Senate were due to meet yesterday to discuss proposals for the US contribution to the fund. The Senate was to suggest $250 million, and the House was to propose $400 million for the foreign operations donation. Further sums of up to $300 million are being discussed for labour, health and emergency spending. Again, does my hon. Friend have something to say about that?

There is great concern that there will be a major shortfall in the fund's finances from 2005. The resource needs of the fund will reach $3.4 billion next year, yet the fund has received pledges of just $2.1 billion for 2005 onwards. My hon. Friend knows that last year our Prime Minister joined Jacques Chirac and Romano Prodi in a commitment to work to ensure that Europe provides up to $1 billion to the fund annually. I hope that my hon. Friend will tell the Chamber that that remains the UK Government's position, and that he and his colleagues are working in Europe to achieve that.

The resource needs of the fund are set to expand significantly in the coming years, not only because worthy causes can always use more money, but because we are starting to renew the existing grants. The five-year projects received funding for only the first two years. Operators of the fund will now decide whether those grants merit extension for another three years. If we assume that 85 per cent. of grants from the first three rounds are extended, those renewals will incur programme liabilities of $1.4 billion next year. That is more than the total amount that the fund is expected to provide this year.

Renewing grants for projects that are working well will be vital, but it is not enough for the fund simply to renew existing grants in the year ahead. The AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria epidemics will not stand still for the year, and neither must the fund. It must continue to launch new rounds and invite proposals for new work to combat those terrible diseases.

Operators of the fund have always launched a new round of grants at every second board meeting; that is, every eight months. According to that schedule, the board should have agreed in June to launch round five two months ago, but that did not happen. The board meets again this Thursday and Friday in Arusha, Tanzania. Many people hope that agreement to launch round five can be reached then. My hon. Friend knows that the fund's executive director, Dr. Richard Feachem, fully supports the call for round five to be launched immediately after this week's board meeting.

The launch of round five has already slipped. If the board were to miss another opportunity to launch the round, it would risk losing momentum for the fund at a pivotal time. We know that the need is there, and we know that there are eligible programmes waiting to apply for funding. Will my hon. Friend assure us that the UK will use its influence at the board meeting this week to secure the announcement of a fifth round?

The good example set by the UK must now be used to lever in improved levels of funding from other donor countries to support a new round. Two replenishment conferences are scheduled for next year to make future funding of the fund more certain. It would be helpful if my hon. Friend confirmed that the UK will play a full part in those conferences and that it will be represented at the highest level.

I suppose that no organisation that handles billions of pounds of public money is exempt from criticism, and although the Global Fund is largely popular, it is no exception. The fund has recently had to weather accusations that it has been too slow to disburse its money to people on the ground. That is an easy accusation to make—the fund has approved a total of $3 billion in grants, but only $628 million has been disbursed to date.

In large part, such a discrepancy is inevitable in that the $3 billion represents the total amount that all approved grants will cost over two years. Of course, the fund does not pay out the entire two years' funding at the start: it is paid in instalments, usually quarterly. In addition, the $3 billion total includes round four grants, which were approved only in June and so are barely ready for the disbursements even to start. In fact, disbursements have historically kept pace with the targets set by the fund, and they are only slightly below the target for the third quarter of this year.

I notice that the UK's new strategy for tackling HIV and AIDS in the developing world includes a commitment to work with the fund to disburse money more quickly and effectively, and I welcome that. It is true that there are problems with some grants. In some cases, there are problems with getting a grant agreement in place and, in others, the recipients have problems in meeting the fund's conditions or implementing their commitments.

Donor countries have rightly insisted that the fund should have tough standards for awarding grants, negotiating grant agreements and making disbursements. It has to be accepted that, to some extent, the effect of tough standards will be the delay or cancellation of some disbursements. Provided that that is for good reason, we should accept that as a worthwhile price to pay to protect the fund's reputation for financial responsibility.

The Global Fund offers advantages that many countries' bilateral programmes do not. Although the UK is innocent of aid tying, many countries tie their aid by, for example, insisting that funds are used to buy goods or services based in the donor country. That can have negative consequences and reduce value for money to the recipient country. Global Fund money is not tied in that way.

The Global Fund is participatory. The involvement of all stakeholders has always been part of its operation, from the composition of the board to the country co-ordinating mechanisms on the ground. The fund promotes country ownership, supporting proven interventions identified by the recipient countries, rather than reflecting the ideology of donor countries. Fund awards go where they are most needed. The political or economic interests of donor countries are not a driving force in the allocation of money.

The fund is democratic, and that is reflected in the representative nature of its board. It is transparent, and information about grants is freely available, for example on the fund's website. It has built-in mechanisms to ensure accountability in all its procedures.

The Global Fund is not our only weapon against AIDS, TB and malaria; far from it. The £150 million promised by the UK to the Global Fund is only a part of the £1.5 billion that this country will spend on the international fight against HIV/AIDS over the next three years. Bilateral work has an important role, as has the work of other international agencies and the voluntary sector, but the role of the Global Fund in raising money and spending it in a fair, accountable and effective way is vital if we are to reverse the spread of those diseases and honour our millennium development pledges.

The announcement of the Global Fund in 2001 was a bold initiative, responding to the millennium development goal on AIDS, TB and malaria. It has got off to a reasonable start, and substantial funds have been raised, awarded and disbursed. However, as has been pointed out time and again, support for the fund must be judged against the enormity of the destruction meted out by the diseases worldwide; they cause more than 6 million preventable deaths every year. It is vital that we do all we can to increase the fund and its impact. I urge the Government to do all they can to respond to the challenge, and to encourage other Governments to do likewise.

9.48 am

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) has made an excellent speech on the challenges for the Global Fund. He should be congratulated on initiating this important debate. I do not want to repeat what he said, as I agree with much of it. I shall focus briefly on the future, what aid flows go into the Global Fund, and what aid flows come out of it.

The Select Committee on International Development was in India when the Overseas Development Institute held what I understand was an excellent meeting in Portcullis House with Dr. Richard Feachem, head of the Global Fund. My impression is that Dr. Feachem made it pretty clear that, unless countries agreed to a fifth round of proposals next year, he would probably step down. I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman that a fifth round of proposals is crucial for the future of the fund, not least because increasingly an underclass of countries is rejected in the first few rounds of proposals. Indeed, some 62 per cent. of countries are rejected. However, a fifth round can happen only with more money.

So far, the Global Fund has the value of two-and-a-half-years' worth of funding, at a rate of some $5.7 billion, but it is looking towards $8 billion, which would carry its work forward for five years. That money is needed, not least to ensure that treatments for AIDS, malaria and TB are increased in middle-income countries, which are still overlooked and would be crucial to round five.

There has, however, been an increasing trend towards bilateral—and not towards multilateral—AIDS programmes of late. Those bilateral measures have seen middle-income countries miss out the most. In the United States, President Bush has pledged significant sums towards fighting AIDS—some $5 billion. That is likely to be renewed with his election and that is good news. However, it is good news only for a handful of African countries, such as Uganda and Botswana, where the funding has been ring-fenced. Beyond such countries, there is nothing new from the United States.

It is fair to say that the UK has done a considerable amount of restructuring of its aid flows to fight the pandemic, and that has resulted in a much greater financial commitment by the Government. I think that the UK's contribution to the Global Fund is being doubled to £150 million over three years, which is a significant departure from the stance of the US Government. They have committed only a small part of their total AIDS budget to the Global Fund. It is excellent news that UK Ministers are supporting the Global Fund, and that should be applauded.

However, as always, there are winners and losers with new aid commitments and the losers on AIDS appear to be middle-income countries. For example, all of the UK's HIV/AIDS programmes in Honduras, which has the worst problem in central America, have been cancelled this year. Honduras is one of the poorest countries in the region and it now has 60 per cent. of HIV/AIDS cases in central America. Infection is spreading from coastal regions to big towns and there is little access to affordable drugs because almost half the population live on less than £1 a day.

Two successful UK programmes to fight HIV/AIDS and help sufferers in Honduras will not be renewed after 2005. One programme, worth £450,000, is designed to help direct aid to the most vulnerable people in Honduras. Another UK programme, worth £550,000, trains health workers in preventing AIDS. The Government are also scrapping the £1.75 million poverty reduction programme in Honduras.

The redirection of aid flows from middle-income countries has come exactly as the Government have increased aid flows to other countries. I understand that; it is an issue that we have debated in the past. However, it is worth considering where such flows are going. Top of the list is India. As I said, the Select Committee has just returned from there after a three-week visit, just as Dr. Feachem addressed Members of the House.

It is worth considering what Dr. Feachem has said about India and AIDS. India has overtaken South Africa as the country with the largest number of HIV-infected people. He says that he does not believe official estimates that about 5.1 million Indian citizens are infected with HIV, compared with 5.4 million people in South Africa. He said recently in New Delhi:

> "India is at the centre of the global AIDS pandemic".

Many believe that unless AIDS is contained in India it will increase as it did in African countries during the 1990s, helped by widespread migrant labour, sex workers and stigma about sex and AIDS. The Indian Government have rejected Dr. Feachem's claims. The head of India's national AIDS control organisation said that the rate of new HIV infections and the percentage of people infected remained much lower in India than in South Africa. One of the concerns about HIV/AIDS is that there still appears, even at Government level, to be a stigma about acknowledging infection rates.

Dr. Feachem's warning has been closely followed by the UK Government. The second initiative, which is good news, is the UK's decision to redesign its £123 million strategy to fight HIV/AIDS in India to reflect the new Congress party-led Government's increased willingness to tackle the disease, although many foreign donors and non-governmental organisations have criticised the National AIDS Control Organisation for its bureaucratic approach to managing India's response to the epidemic. Only £28 million of UK aid has been disbursed in the past few years by NACO; £95 million still sits in the bank.

Such redesigns are symptomatic of the difficulties facing the Global Fund. Clearly, Governments are listening to the Global Fund's advice, but they are going it alone, and there is a danger that the extra UK money will be bilateral, not multilateral. The UK has increased its commitments to the Global Fund, but has also moved towards making bilateral commitments, and other countries may do the same. That could undermine the Global Fund just as it is trying to secure the fifth round. India clearly needs the extra money, but the Global Fund should be trusted to invest it, not least because 50 per cent. of the money that it invests is invested because people in recipient countries, rather than the donors, say where it should go. The Global Fund also ensures a fairer disbursement of moneys, and that means that middle-income countries do not miss out.

Unless there are firm financial commitments to the Global Fund and a slowing of bilateral aid programmes, the prospects of the all-important fifth round will be diminished. If the fifth round did not take place, that would be a real setback for such a fledgling institution, especially given that 2005 is seen as the make-or-break year for the millennium development goals.

How could extra funding be found for the fifth round? Two original options are being considered. The first is the suggestion from Dr. Peter Piot, head of UNAIDS, that Africa's $15 billion debt, which is serviced every year, should be channelled instead into health and education, which Dr. Piot has been quoted as saying are > "the building blocks of the AIDS response".

The other option in the short term—perhaps a more realistic one—is the international finance facility. Dr. Feachem has called for the IFF to be launched in early 2005. I am afraid that the US does not support that initiative, but other international measures have not been supported by the US at their initial launch. Multilateral institutions and NGOs alike see the international finance facility as one of the best prospects of finding the funds to meet the millennium development goals.

Given that the Commission for Africa will report in the spring of next year and that the UK will hold the G8 presidency and give that commission clear substance, I hope that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor will consider printing a clear timetable for launching the international finance facility on the same day as the commission reports or, better still, launch it as part of the commission's report to provide a benchmark by which the commission could be judged and, more important, to bolster the aid needed to make necessary progress on the millennium development goals.

There is no difference among Members of this House on the notion that tackling HIV, tuberculosis and malaria is crucial. Doing that will require greater funds for the Global Fund, and a commitment from all nations to work through multilateral institutions, rather than going it alone.

9.58 am

Mr. David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): I also congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) on securing this important debate, and at an important time: the board of the Global Fund is due to meet in a few days at Arusha in Tanzania.

I do not want to repeat what has already been said about the development of the Global Fund and the possible threats that it now faces. I would like to focus on the work of the International HIV/AIDS Alliance, which works as part of the Global Fund system. I am proud that the alliance is based in my constituency of Brighton, Pavilion. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will recall his visit to its headquarters with Dr. Peter Piot and me when it marked the tenth anniversary of its valuable international work.

The International HIV/AIDS Alliance has a long-standing relationship with the Global Fund board, as part of the NGO delegation. It has on the board of directors an employee of its India office, who is also a board member of Communities Living with AIDS, TB and Malaria. It is the principal recipient of global funding in Ukraine. The programme in Ukraine for which the alliance is responsible has been judged one of the 10 best organised programmes in a country that is funded by the Global Fund. The alliance provides technical support to Global Fund recipients in Asia, Africa, Latin America and eastern Europe.

The alliance has worked primarily on providing technical advice and resources to enable the effective participation of civil society organisations in the Global Fund's country co-ordinating mechanisms in 40 countries, including Honduras and Bolivia, as well as working with the Caribbean Regional Network of People Living with HIV/AIDS. It also provides advice and resources to Nigeria, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Philippines and the Democratic Republic of Congo.

Since earlier this year, the alliance has been the principal recipient in Ukraine. Its work there focuses on developing community participation and involvement in capacity building among country-based organisations. It centres on preventive work, care and support for people living with HIV/AIDS, clinical care, procurement and supply management, and information and education on policy and advocacy.

In Ukraine, it is estimated that there are now 49 projects, serving an average of 1,000 clients each. The financial support totals about $1 million and the overall number of people who receive services is about 30,000 to 40,000. Over the past quarter, 350,000 condoms have been distributed as part of the work that is being undertaken in Ukraine. The programme is important and its work is best judged by its effect on individuals. The International HIV/AIDS Alliance provides examples that bring home to us what lies behind the talk of funding and programmes—the impact on the lives of individuals.

In Ukraine, Tamila was helped by Light of Hope, a local organisation, with the support of the Global Fund. She is 19 and was admitted to a psychiatric clinic after an unsuccessful suicide attempt. The ambulance doctors found out that she was living with HIV and revealed her status to the doctors at the psychiatric clinic. Tamila was not using drugs and was not involved in the sex trade, but she was treated aggressively and beaten by medical staff in the resuscitation unit at the hospital to which she was taken.

Through the work of Light of Hope, the local organisation with which the International HIV/AIDS Alliance works, there has been intervention in Tamila's case. A review was held and she now receives the emotional, medical and legal support that might not otherwise have been available to her. She would have become another wasted life because of the prejudice that exists towards those living with HIV/AIDS.

I shall cite a further example of the way in which bureaucracy can prevent help from reaching those who should receive it. Working with a locally based charitable foundation called Alternative, the alliance found out about a HIV-positive woman who gave birth and, because of the circumstances in which she was living, left her child in the hospital. She believed that she could not give it proper care. Later, because she had a job and her life became more stable, she felt able to try to reclaim her child, but Ukrainian bureaucracy and stereotyping about socially vulnerable people made getting the child back a complicated task.

The project staff at Alternative, backed by the Global Fund, did all they could to help. Eventually the woman was able to establish her parental rights and her child came back to her, but the child was suffering from TB by then. Once again, agencies funded by the Global Fund, working through the guidance of the International HIV/AIDS Alliance, were able to intervene in people's lives. The lives of those two people might otherwise have been wasted. None of us in the Chamber has any doubts about the importance of the Global Fund's work.

I echo the concerns expressed by other Members. The fifth round is crucial, as are decisions that are to be taken later this week. There has already been delay, and there is concern that the US Government may be pushing for a further delay of the fifth round. That could lead to the removal of funds from some of the most successful work on all three diseases, thus denying many people who desperately need it access to care, support and medicines, such as anti-retroviral treatment, and delaying the start-up of much-needed prevention programmes. Will my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary tell us what the Government are doing to ensure that no such delay occurs?

As hon. Members have said, 2005 is a crucial year for all development programmes: the UK will lead the European Union and G8 presidencies and the millennium development goals will be reviewed next autumn. We know that we are falling short of those goals and that one of the main reasons for that is the failure of many G8 nations to respond adequately to the AIDS pandemic. It is possible to reverse the impact of AIDS and to care for those who are suffering. Next year, the UK Government will be in a central position to influence what happens. What specific commitments are they considering making during their EU and G8 presidencies to ensure that we take those vital programmes forward to combat all three preventable illnesses, and the impact of HIV/AIDS?

10.8 am

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): I, too, congratulate the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) on securing the debate. I could not disagree with anything he said. Neither could I disagree with anything said by the Chairman of the Select Committee on International Development, whom I congratulate on distributing the new international development magazine. I am sure that its next edition will include an article on the subject of our debate.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Lepper) mentioned several issues in Ukraine. I worked there some years ago and know that it suffered badly after the Chernobyl disaster.

I will try not to repeat what has been said, but some figures are so stark that I may repeat them. As the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh said, the United Nations Secretary-General issued a call to action in April 2001 to battle malaria, TB and HIV/AIDS, to mobilise, manage and disburse funds with the Global Fund and to try to reverse the spread and reduce the consequences of those infectious diseases and others between now and 2010. The Global Fund was created to finance a dramatic turnaround in the fight against those diseases, which kill more than 6 million people a year.

I hope that the Under-Secretary will detail the financial commitments and proposed disbursements for the year ahead, now that we have heard from the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh about what has already been committed and disbursed. To date, the Global Fund has committed $3 billion in 128 countries to support aggressive intervention against AIDS, TB and malaria. It is vital.

The fund is truly an international project, with a global impact, fighting three of the deadliest problems that the world faces. The statistics about what it is doing and what it is hoped it will do are impressive. As has been said, TB kills about 2 million people a year—an estimated one third of the world's population may be infected. It is estimated that, in the next 15 years, it could claim 35 million lives and that 200 million may become sick with it. About 250,000 children die each year of TB.

Poverty and TB go together. It costs only $10 for a full treatment course to cure infectious patients. The Global Fund is helping to detect 3.5 million additional cases of infectious TB. It is also hoped that it will cure 2 million people through the directly observed therapy strategy. The fund is also fighting the new scourge—multi-drug-resistant TB—with more than 12,000 new treatments.

We have heard that an estimated 45 million people are infected with HIV worldwide; 95 per cent. of those live in the poorest countries, in what we call the developing world, but more than 20 million have been killed worldwide, and the virus is now the leading cause of death in Africa. Again, children suffer. More than 15 million children have been orphaned by AIDS and that figure is projected to double in the not-too-distant future. Over the next five years, the fund should provide 1.6 million people with anti-retroviral treatment, reach 52 million people with counselling and testing for HIV prevention, and support more than 1 million orphans with medical services, community care and education.

Malaria kills at least 1 million people per year and could cause more than 300 million clinical cases. More than 40 per cent. of the world's population is at risk from malaria. That figure is increasing—in the 21st century, when we should be winning the battle—because of poor health systems, drug resistance, climate change, war and poverty. It is the poorest, and children, who are most vulnerable. Ninety per cent. of malaria deaths occur in sub-Saharan Africa and approximately 3,000 people die of it each day in that region—many of them children. The fund is providing finance for 108 million treated bed nets to protect families from transmission and is delivering 145 million treatments for resistant malaria.

AIDS, TB and malaria are the most lethal combination that one could imagine. That combination is hitting the world's poorest people hard, in Africa. The most vulnerable group, as I have said, are children, many of whom are already orphans. The effect of orphanhood on children in Africa is terrifying. For most people, the death of their child is the worst thing that could ever happen; but what happens to children who are orphaned in some countries seems like a fate worse than death.

In Zambia, 65 per cent. of child prostitutes are orphans. In Addis Ababa, 75 per cent. of child domestic workers are orphans. Such children are more vulnerable to sexual abuse than any other sector of society. There are orphan gangs and orphan delinquents—bewildered, lonely and angry children. Never having known love, they reach adulthood and have their own children. That growing band of potential orphan parents will be one of the highest-risk groups. If they die, their children will have no grandparents to look after them. That is a time bomb that is ready to explode, if it is not already doing so.

Many of those orphans are also the carers for their siblings. I met a young boy in Addis Ababa who told me his story. He was 14, with a 12-year-old brother. His mother and father had died. They lived together in what was basically a cardboard-box and plastic slum dwelling. They spent their days shoe shining and going to school. They earned enough money to buy food to eat. If they earned more, the older boys would steal the money. That is how they existed—and they are vulnerable; one fears for their future.

An objective observer of what is unfolding would be forgiven for thinking that the world had gone mad. At a time when starvation and disease grip parts of our planet, obesity and over-consumption are major problems in the west.

The Global Fund provides some salvation, and its resources give hope to the millions who suffer TB, malaria or AIDS. What can the fund do? Previous speakers told us about what has happened and spoke of its potential, but we must look to the future.

The statistics seem bleak, but only last week I heard at first hand of one case in which the battle against TB had been won and the war against AIDS was being fought with determination. A gentleman called Winston Zulu came to visit me in Parliament. He is from Zambia and is one of 13 children. He was treated for TB and recovered, but he has been living with AIDS since 1990. He had four brothers, all of whom died of TB or HIV.

The last one passed away in March because of a lack of access to anti-TB drugs. I feel for him as I am one of four brothers; he said that he was the only survivor. He was cured of TB in 1997 and he is now an advocate for the changes that can be delivered by the Global Fund.

Winston Zulu is now married and an inspiration to many. I met him not only at Westminster but in Edinburgh, where he was speaking to a group that included another person who deserves mention. Sir John Crofton, a 92-year-old inspirational individual, developed the first co-ordinated drug resistance programme. I think that it provided the foundation for the DOTS programme that the Select Committee saw being delivered so effectively in India, in one of the successes in the battle against TB. It was good to see that the man who developed the treatment 50 years ago is still battling on today.

The Select Committee visited India, but I went there in March to see at first hand how DOTS was unfolding. While there, I spoke to mothers and children who would have been orphans but for the investment of a relatively small amount—$10 per head for a life saved.

I met the Under-Secretary and the Secretary of State after that visit, and I spoke of the concern that the funding of TB programmes might end in the not-too-distant future. I was pleased to receive a letter from the Under-Secretary. The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz[illegible] I had raised with him the question of future fu[illegible] for anti-malaria programmes in India. He wrote:

> "The Government have also told us that the Global Fund for AIDS, TB and Malaria, to which DFID has committed £180 million, has made a grant to India for TB control in Andhra Pradesh and Orissa. They have therefore decided not to ask for DFID assistance for TB in those states, which means that our programme in Andhra Pradesh will end in 2005 as planned."

Credit where credit is due: not only did the Under-Secretary stay in touch and keep me up to date, but DFID is playing its part. I say, "Well done."

Sadly, the opposite was the case in Malawi at the Bottom hospital in Llongwe. There, we saw TB sufferers and AIDS victims being treated in a medical system that appeared to be falling apart. The health workers were falling victim to the same diseases, and 50 per cent. of poor households were affected by AIDS. Although every bed was full in the children's ward, we were told that it was a quiet time—at busy times, there are two or three children to each bed.

The Global Fund can invest in education to ensure prevention and reduce the spread of those diseases that have been mentioned. Again, that is likely to help the most vulnerable—the children, and especially young girls, many of whom miss their education because of the pressure to leave school to become carers when their families need their help.

One statistic on the education of children in Malawi sticks in my mind. We were told that of every 1,000 children who start primary school, two would graduate and one would die of AIDS. That cycle must be broken, and the Global Fund can help. However, the fund is no good without the political will of donors and recipients. We must continue to say that what is happening is unacceptable; the tide of devastation must be turned.

We have just remembered the dead of two world wars, during which resources were made available to defeat the enemy and the political will was unbending. We are now at war in Iraq and spending hundreds of millions of pounds to enable Iraqis to experience democracy. However, at the same time, people are dying by the million of preventable diseases—1 million a year of malaria; 2 million a year of TB, and possibly 3 million a year of AIDS. Those are the real weapons of mass destruction in today's world; they are the killers that we should focus on.

The holocaust that is unfolding is made all the worse by the fact that we know what is required to bring it to an end—resources and political will. The resources must be made available, whatever the mechanism. The Global Fund is needed and our attention should not be diverted from the war that we should be fighting—against poverty and disease. Many people, including me, have expressed their concerns about what is going on in Iraq, but few have seen it as a diversion from a much greater problem: the death toll from malaria, TB and AIDS this week could exceed the total number killed in Iraq since the war began. We cannot go on like that.

I hope that the Under-Secretary will address a number of issues: the future funding of the Global Fund and the proposed International Financing Facility; what we can do to play our part in that when the UK Government chairs both the EU and the G8 in the year ahead, and how we can work in partnerships—no individual country can make progress on its own. Partnership is needed, and ways of ensuring that future disbursement means that money that has been pledged gets through to those who need it most. Most of all, we must play our part in the world to ensure the political will to end this tragedy.

10.22 am

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I am grateful to have the opportunity to discuss the important issue of combating three of the world's most devastating diseases and the role of the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, TB and Malaria in doing so. Like others, I congratulate the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) on having secured the debate. He is right that we need to stress the vital role of the Global Fund—particularly at this crucial time when its long-term future is uncertain—in both prevention and treatment. We know only too well the horrors that each of the diseases inflicts on entire populations in so many ways—socially, demographically, economically, politically and even culturally.

We have had a good debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) has brought to it his expertise as Chairman of the Select Committee on International Development. I share his hope that we might persuade the Americans to come on board with the Global Fund on a larger scale, and was interested to hear of the discussion that is going on in Congress on the matter. I was glad that the hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Lepper) said something about Ukraine, a country that I have been privileged to visit twice, and where I saw some of the most abject poverty that I have seen anywhere. He is right to remind us that there is colossal need in parts of eastern Europe.

[Mr. Julian Brazier]

The UK played a leading role in setting up the Global Fund in 2002 and has remained strongly committed to it, pledging about £154 million for the first seven years of its operation. Because it is still in its infancy, it is possible to measure the impact of the Global Fund anecdotally only, and that is what we have tried to do today. However the transparency and accountability of the fund, two of its core founding principles, have already allowed the organisation to demonstrate its success. The right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh is right; it would be grossly unfair if, because it is so careful about accountability and transparency, it were to be castigated in its early years for being slow in spending its money.

The UK has doubled its pledge from 2005 to 2008, thus bringing our overall commitment to approximately £259 million. That makes the UK the fourth largest donor to the fund, and we share the Government's pride in that achievement. Earlier speakers have rightly stressed the importance of tying up round five as quickly as possible.

The Global Fund operators tell us that donor contributions have enabled it to approve 296 programmes in 128 countries. Roughly three fifths of that funding goes to Africa, one fifth to Latin America, one fifth to Asia, and very small amounts go elsewhere.

The 2004 UNAIDS report provides fresh evidence—if we needed it—of the scale of the AIDS crisis that Africa is facing. It is universally acknowledged as the biggest threat to Africa's development and the No. 1 cause of death in that continent, yet rates of HIV infection continue to rise in sub-Saharan Africa overall and in most individual countries, with a few encouraging exceptions such as Uganda and Botswana.

Last year alone, an estimated 3 million people in the region became newly infected, but that shocking statistic is only the tip of a very sad iceberg. In earlier debates in this Chamber, we discussed in detail the consequences of that, including destruction of public sector infrastructure, economic and educational collapse, and—worst of all—collapse in the health service itself as some doctors and nurses become infected and others flee to the first world, encouraged by higher salaries and better conditions. Those trends come after a decade of international efforts to highlight the devastating effect of AIDS, particularly on that continent.

The Global Fund has much to offer. There are four key ways in which it can direct its energies into helping to break the AIDS epidemic, and in some respects it is already doing so. A significant proportion of the funds should be spent on the anti-retroviral drugs that are needed to treat people with AIDS. The importance of anti-retroviral therapy has been much discussed in our debates on AIDS. The treatment is still not a cure, and it presents new challenges; there are side effects and there is drug resistance. However, it has dramatically reduced mortality rates, revitalised communities, and brought hope and quality of life to people who are HIV-infected. AIDS is gradually becoming a manageable chronic illness, rather than simply a plague.

Sadly, few African countries are yet sharing in the vastly improved prognosis in first-world countries. The number of people receiving anti-retroviral treatment in Africa is still relatively small. The World Health Organisation estimates that nine out of 10 people who urgently need treatment for HIV are not being reached. It is predicted that 5 million to 6 million people in developing countries will die in the next two years without anti-retroviral drugs.

India and Brazil are the greatest examples for the production of generic anti-retroviral drugs. The cost of drugs in those countries has been reduced. Brazil is now home to up to one third of all the people being treated for AIDS and it has successfully reduced its HIV/AIDS-related deaths by more than 85 per cent. That is a remarkable figure. Furthermore, the Brazilian Government have estimated that anti-retroviral drugs made savings of about $2 billion in hospital care that would otherwise have been needed by people living with HIV. That is a significant figure, as there are also many other diseases to fight. We should think about what else the money that is spent on hospital care for AIDS patients could have been spent on.

I am not suggesting that domestic generic production is the right way forward for every country, and it is important that we always remember to pay tribute to pharmaceutical companies that are lowering their prices to third-world countries. It is worth remembering that Merck is the world's largest corporate donor; if benefits in kind are included, it donates more than Bill Gates.

A recent Oxfam survey report drew attention to the urgent need to fund health services to deliver treatment. The funding of those essential services should go hand in hand with the massive cuts in the prices of drugs that are coming into effect; in some countries they are being provided in domestic programmes. The Global Fund is already providing opportunities for countries such as Uganda to deliver comprehensive programmes that include treatment using anti-retrovirals. Estimates indicate that by 2009 the Global Fund will have increased the number of people living with AIDS on ARV treatment fivefold, to around 1.6 million. Sadly, that is still a small proportion of the total, but it is none the less a remarkable figure. The fund is also expected to have provided voluntary HIV/AIDS counselling and testing services aimed at prevention to 52 million people. Prevention is of course the best cure of all.

Those are encouraging targets, but I should stress the necessity of continuing to prioritise the introduction of health services across Africa if we are really to see tangible global progress. In a recent speech on AIDS in Africa I emphasised the use of anti-retrovirals for pregnant women, which, on the cure side of the equation, is how the greatest number of lives can be saved at the smallest cost.

The final role for the Global Fund should be to strive to encourage more research and development by pharmaceutical companies into the treatment of all three killer diseases. In the past, companies have often invested large sums in drugs that failed to produce a return on their investment while producing a huge benefit for people in developing countries. Indeed, a delegation from Merck told me that much in its corporate donor programmes started from one of its programmes that was a commercial disaster but saved a large number of lives. If we harden up the guarantees for companies on intellectual property rights in the first world, we will encourage them to ensure that the desperately-needed investment in drugs in the third world carries on with fewer side effects.

The figures indicate, I believe, that tuberculosis kills more people than AIDS and malaria combined, although the equation is quite complicated because a lot of people who die of TB are infected with HIV/AIDS. Leaving that grisly statistic aside, however, the fund has an excellent record on TB. Modernisation of labs for TB in Moldova is one example of success in Europe, and the hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion talked about Ukraine. The training of private practitioners in the recommended TB control strategy known as DOTS—directly observed treatment short-course—in the Philippines is another example. In five years the fund aims to have quadrupled the number of people being treated for multi-drug resistant TB. Furthermore, it estimates that 3.5 million TB patients will have been offered DOTS treatment by then.

I strongly believe that malaria must be tackled by a coupled approach of prevention and cure. The Global Fund aims to do just that. Prevention is best achieved through the drainage and spraying of swamps and ditches where mosquitoes breed and through the use of netting. Much of my mother's family were involved in the colonial service in Africa, and it has been deeply frustrating for me to see the extent to which things went back in the wrong direction after independence. Progress made in fighting mosquito-borne infections, particularly malaria, was lost. For years and years we went in the wrong direction, as basic procedures were lost in countries where relatives of mine worked.

So far, the fund has subsidised more than 10,000 insecticide-treated nets for pregnant women in Madagascar, as well as focusing on a cure through the supply of artemisinin-class combination therapy—ACT—drugs to areas most in need. The all-party group on AIDS has a terrific reputation and I particularly welcome the start of a new group on malaria, which I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) chairs. That group has just embarked on a programme of studies that will produce a report for Ministers in the new year.

In a short space of time the Global Fund has undoubtedly achieved much. It is essential, as all hon. Members who have spoken have stressed, that the uncertainty over the fifth round be lifted as quickly as possible, as it needs to go ahead. The scale of the problems with all three diseases is so vast that we have to be quite modest about what can be achieved in the short term, but the Global Fund is achieving a great deal and doing so in a way that is almost entirely corruption free. If the Chamber will forgive an unfortunate military parallel, we are getting more bangs for the buck out of the Global Fund, but there is so much more to do.

We do not even have all the Governments on side. When one listens to the pronouncements from the South African Government on HIV/AIDS, one realises that it is not just about resources; we must arrange delivery structures and change attitudes among Governments and many ordinary people if we are to get rid of the scourge of these three diseases.

The Global Fund has a vital role in all this. I congratulate the Government on their work with it and hope that we can tie up the fifth round as soon as possible.

10.36 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): I, too, congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) on securing this debate. He is right to remind us of the urgency of the need to tackle the three epidemics.

The debate brought back memories of my visit in May to Dukathole township in South Africa, where Christian Aid was doing some remarkable work with the South African Anglican Church in supporting a number of women and was providing support to orphans and a number of people dying of TB as part of its AIDS-related work. That example reminds us just how severe the challenges of AIDS, TB and malaria are in making progress on international development. Together, those diseases cause around 6 million deaths. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh said, poor countries shoulder the vast majority of the burden associated with diseases that threaten to undermine progress on all the millennium development goals. AIDS, more than any other issue, is reversing the progress that has been made in sub-Saharan Africa, and particularly in southern Africa. AIDS is steadily reversing the development progress that we have seen.

Worldwide, there are almost 60 million people with AIDS. In view of those figures and the need to make more progress, in July we published our strategy on HIV/AIDS for the next three years to support the global effort scale-up on the epidemic in the developing world. We have supported that strategy with a commitment to provide some £1.5 billion over the next three years to work on HIV and AIDS control. That money is particularly important in the context of figures from UNAIDS, which estimates that next year we should be spending some $12 billion in the fight against AIDS and by 2007 we should be spending some £20 billion. The stark statistic is that by 2003 we were spending only some $4.7 billion worldwide. That indicates the importance of the Global Fund and also, more generally, the importance of scaling up assistance for the fight against AIDS, TB and malaria.

The three epidemics feed off each other. After years of decline, the number of TB deaths in Africa is beginning to increase again. TB is the fourth most common cause of death from communicable diseases, and multi-drug resistant TB is an increasing problem. About 100 countries worldwide have malaria, and almost half of those are in sub-Saharan Africa. Like the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), I welcome the formation of an all-party group on malaria, and I look forward to engaging with it. It will undoubtedly complement the excellent work done by the all-party group on AIDS, in which my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh is an active participant.

The hon. Member for Canterbury alluded to recent advances in the production and widespread distribution of insecticide-treated nets and artemisinin-based therapy for drug-resistant malaria, which give the international community an opportunity to scale up the prevention and treatment of malaria.

As I said, there is a range of methods for us to use to support the fight against AIDS, TB and malaria. The Global Fund is one such method, but the UK has spent some £1.5 billion since 1997 on strengthening health systems in developing countries—a crucial part of the infrastructure to fight AIDS, TB and malaria.

We also work with, and fund the work of, other equally crucial international bodies, including UNAIDS, the World Health Organisation and its vital three-by-five initiative, and UNICEF, with which we are working to strengthen the response of African Governments to the orphans and vulnerable children crisis. We are also working with organisations such as the Gates Foundation, the Clinton Foundation and major pharmaceutical companies to reduce the cost of drugs and other interventions and to increase access to them.

Like the hon. Member for Canterbury, I pay tribute to the work of pharmaceutical companies, but it is worth remembering just how skewed the worldwide market in drugs is towards the developed world. Some 50 per cent. of the drugs market is based in north America, some 25 per cent. is based in Europe, and only 1 per cent. is based in the continent of Africa. That is a powerful reminder of the fact that further progress is needed to focus on the drugs that developing countries need and to provide access to those drugs. That is the responsibility not only of drug companies but crucially of rich donors, who need to support developing countries and to help them to develop their own regulatory and in-country capacity.

Crucially, we also support the work of key non-governmental organisations. I alluded to the work of Christian Aid, which I saw in South Africa. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Lepper) rightly paid tribute to the work of the International HIV/AIDS Alliance. I am grateful for the opportunity that he has provided to put on record my appreciation of the hugely significant work that it does. It plays a particularly important role in fighting the stigma and discrimination that still bedevil the fight against AIDS in particular.

The International HIV/AIDS Alliance targets AIDS and campaigns for more assistance to groups such as men who have sex with men and injecting drug users. It also supports needle-exchange programmes, and highlights the needs of sex workers, which is particularly important. We need to continue to support that work, which is why I was pleased to be able to announce an extra £1 million of support to it as part of our decision to increase support to NGOs working in Latin America. The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) alluded to the situation in Honduras, where the alliance is already working. Its work is globally respected, and I look forward to continuing to engage with it.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) also rightly alluded to the excellent work of Results UK. I, too, had the privilege of meeting Winston Zulu in the UK last week. He is a remarkable man who is remarkably dignified in the face of the terrible loss that he has experienced. Four of his brothers have died of TB and AIDS for want of access to the drugs that have helped him to survive—a powerful reminder from him and Results UK of the need for us to do more on TB and malaria, as well as on AIDS.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh alluded to the fact that the Government played a leading role in setting up the Global Fund in 2001. He also mentioned that it has approved $3 billion of grants to more than 300 programmes in more than 120 countries. Of those grants, 60 per cent. are going to sub-Saharan Africa and more than 20 per cent. are going to Asia, the middle east and north Africa. Approximately 56 per cent. are going specifically on HIV-related work, 30 per cent. are going on malaria and 13 per cent. are going on TB.

Predictable and sustainable financing will be critical to the fund's continued success because it will help the fund plan, give confidence to the poor and make a real and lasting impact on the ground in countries where these epidemics are at their worst. That is one reason why the Government decided in July to double our pledge from 2005 to 2008, bringing our overall pledge to £250 million, or $450 million, and making the UK the fourth largest donor to the fund. In September, following a request from Kofi Annan, Nelson Mandela and the fund's executive director, Richard Feacham, we brought forward £3 million, or $5.3 million, from our pledge for 2005 to help the fund leverage the maximum contribution from the United States. I am pleased to say that a number of other donors followed suit. We are prepared to consider putting more money into the fund, although we obviously have to consider the case for doing so alongside the case for putting money into other funding instruments and our own country programmes.

Showing results will remain essential if the fund is to continue to give donors and beneficiaries the confidence and the information that they need to invest in the fund, and good results will obviously be a powerful factor in attracting more money from donors. The Global Fund management team recognises that and has been working with DFID staff to develop effective and appropriate performance indicators. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh suggested, the fund needs to widen its donor base in the G8 and, more importantly, the wider international community. I pay tribute to the work of Richard Feacham, who is seized of that point and who has been actively lobbying outside the fund's traditional circle of donors.

My right hon. Friend asked whether the UK supported a round five, and we do. There will also be high-level UK representation at future replenishment conferences, and we shall be lobbying others to contribute to the fund.

My right hon. Friend alluded to the role of the Americans, and I want to place on record my appreciation not only of their continuing, large contribution to the Global Fund and the fight against AIDS more generally but of their increasing co-operation with the UK through the US/UK taskforce. We are looking at how we can tighten our links and improve co-ordination on the ground in five specific African countries.

My right hon. Friend asked about European Community funding for the Global Fund. The EC pledged £260 million for 2004, and the total EU pledge to the fund represents approximately 48 per cent. of all the pledges for 2004.

The second way in which the fund can make maximum use of its resources is by targeting poor countries—a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) in an intervention. The Government's view has always been that the fund should prioritise its assistance to help the very poorest countries scale up their efforts against AIDS, TB and malaria.

The hon. Member for Banbury, who chairs the Select Committee on International Development, rightly reminded the House that we should not forget the needs of middle-income countries. He highlighted the problems in Honduras, and mentioned the decision of the Department for International Development to withdraw from direct bilateral programmes with that country. By way of reassurance to the hon. Gentleman, I flag up the fact that considerable donor assistance is still going into Honduras—and Latin America more generally—from the World Bank, the United Nations Population Fund, the European Union and the Global Fund.

Through our assistance programmes for Latin America, we are seeking to increase effectiveness and joint working among those donors operating in Honduras and other Latin American countries. We have also increased our funding to NGOs. I mentioned the International HIV/AIDS Alliance; that is one example of benefit for work in Latin America. We are also seeking to improve south-south co-operation in Latin America on, for example, the rolling-out of the excellent work done in Brazil to the wider Latin American continent.

On the point made by the hon. Member for Banbury about middle-income countries, one of the regions on which we continue to concentrate, particularly in terms of the stigma and discrimination that bedevils the response to AIDS, is the Caribbean. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is sending me to the Caribbean next week for a crucial conference with Caribbean leaders. The conference will look into the issue of stigma and discrimination and how we can challenge it more effectively in the Caribbean.

The hon. Member for Banbury also alluded to the Select Committee's recent visit to India. It is right to say that we have remodelled our support for the Indian Government's National AIDS Control Organisation. I hope that he has had the chance to hear or meet the new head of that organisation, who is trying to reform its work significantly, speed it up and make it more effective. We recently heard that the new Congress Government have given it even more funding to enable it to extend and increase its work.

We want the Global Fund to continue to focus on working more closely with other donors. For example, it should work more closely and effectively with the US President's emergency programme for AIDS relief, the World Bank's multi-country AIDS programme and a series of other bilateral donors and multilateral initiatives. In particular, we look to UNAIDS as the international agency with the legitimacy and mandate to co-ordinate all those donor initiatives. One reason that we increased our funding to UNAIDS last year was in order to make it more effective at co-ordinating the work of donors.

On TB and malaria, we believe that the Global Fund needs to continue to work closely with implementing agencies such as the stop TB partnership and the roll back malaria programme.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh and the hon. Member for Banbury referred to the ninth board meeting due to take place in Arusha in Tanzania on Thursday and Friday. As well as considering a future round five, delegates in Arusha will look in the longer term at the shape and size of the Global Fund. The fund is to be commended on its recent paper on its future role and financing needs. We welcome much of it, but see opportunities to continue to improve the operations of the fund and increase its value for money. Of course, we want to make sure that the fund stays true to its intention of being a lean, effective and efficient funding instrument.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh alluded to the fact that the Global Fund needs about $1.3 billion of new money to finance ongoing projects, and a further $1 million to launch a new round.

John Barrett: Before the Under-Secretary concludes, will he touch on the issue of expanding the capacity of potential recipient countries, and on finding out whether there are other methods—particularly, perhaps, that of co-ordination between our medical systems—to increase our capacity? Perhaps our royal colleges could work together to help with training our physicians here and abroad, or with bringing people across. When the Global Fund made the money available, capacity would be increased; the money could be more efficiently spent in the recipient countries.

Mr. Thomas: The need to increase developing countries' capacity to respond to AIDS is one reason for our putting significant money and technical assistance into such countries' health systems since 1997. We need to do more about that. We published a paper on access to medicines in the first six months of this year, looking at what else we could do to build on our work in several countries in Africa to increase both regulatory capacity and in-country production of anti-retroviral and other drugs. Those are two examples of the way in which we are trying to improve developing countries' capacity to respond to the AIDS crisis.

One of the most encouraging things to happen in the past 18 months is the significant drop in the price of anti-retrovirals. The price of some drugs has come down by 95 per cent. I pay particular tribute to the work of the Clinton Foundation for that. However, getting those drugs where they need to be is a particular challenge, particularly in the case of people in rural areas who suffer from AIDS. Continued development of the capacity of in-country health systems must remain an important focus for bilateral donors in particular.

We work closely with the Global Fund in several countries. Staff of the Department for International Development sit on country co-ordination committees and have participated in visits with Global Fund staff. I am aware that the fund has been criticised for high in-country transaction costs and slow procedures. We have been actively working with the secretariat to make changes and improvements, and good progress has been made.

[Mr. Thomas]

The Global Fund is one high-profile part of the response to AIDS, TB and malaria. Along with the other key partners, we want it to scale up its response to become even more effective in the fight against those devastating epidemics. We remain determined to play our part in increasing the effectiveness of the global fund.

The hon. Member for Banbury alluded to the considerable additional donor assistance that is needed if we are to make progress towards meeting the millennium development goals by 2015. The UN estimates that $100 billion is needed annually if we are to continue to make progress; however, just $50 billion is currently being provided. Our response to that has been to increase development assistance significantly over the next three years. The largest increase for any Government Department has been at the Department for International Development. There is a 9 per cent. increase for each of the next three years.

If we continue to make such progress, we shall hit the UN's 0.7 per cent. target by 2013. However, if we are to make significant progress towards establishing funding at the appropriate level, we not only need other countries to progress towards that figure, but, as the hon. Member for Banbury said, we need other countries to sign up in support of the international finance facility. We remain determined to continue to play our part—to continue to generate the political support and momentum to launch the international finance facility next year.

This has been an extremely useful debate. I pay tribute again to my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh for initiating an important reminder of the urgency of the need to respond to AIDS, TB and malaria.

Asylum Seekers (Legal Aid)

10.59 am

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to have this debate and to raise these important matters. This is not the first time that I have initiated a debate on legal aid in Reading in this place. In July 1999, I was fortunate enough to obtain a debate on matters relating to the management of legal aid in Reading. At that time, my concerns were about pressures on office staff, which resulted in inadequate scrutiny of solicitors' claims. I was pleased when a reporter from the Reading Chronicle subsequently obtained work in that office and highlighted in even greater detail the concerns that I raised.

Today, I am talking about a different aspect of legal support for people seeking asylum in Reading, but it also relates to the quality of legal support that people receive for the money that we all pay. The subject of this debate is legal aid services for asylum seekers in Reading. Let us imagine that we are asylum seekers who have fled our own country and arrived somewhere with a different language and different customs. We have to go through a process that will decide whether we are allowed to stay in the country. Whom can we rely on to save us from being sent back to the place from which we have fled?

As a society, we see it as a mark of our humanity that we support those who are going through the process that will decide whether they should be allowed to stay in this country. We provide support so they can get effective representation, and we make money available so that they get legal assistance. The point is to ensure that any decision on whether someone can stay or is to be sent back is based on the actual information in the case.

I have sought this debate because I believe that the subject is important. I make no judgment in any of the cases that I shall raise. I will not say, "This person should be allowed to stay in the UK while that person should not." It is not my role to do that. My role is to make the law setting out in what conditions people may remain in the UK. Of course, like all hon. Members, I then have a role as a constituency MP, helping to ensure that people who want to stay in the UK have the full opportunity to make their cases properly. It is an important part of British law that people get an opportunity to make their case, and that any decision is based on the full information in that case. Only in that way can just decisions be made.

Like a lot of MPs, I have a sizeable workload involving people who have come to the UK. This is probably among the most altruistic aspects of our work; the people whom we do the work for do not have a vote, and if their cases are heard and they are given permission to stay, become citizens and get the vote, most of us will probably be long gone by the time that they do so. It must be borne in mind that the people who I see are the ones in whose cases something has gone wrong. If everything goes right, someone makes an application and a decision is made, the constituency MP will not generally become involved. Naturally, I have more experience of dealing with the representatives of Reading-based people seeking asylum than I have of other such people, so any failings of Reading representatives are more obvious to me than those of people elsewhere.

Through doing such work, we get a feel for the people, for whether they are genuine or something is not quite right about their story and for the quality of representation that they receive. Together with our staff, we see the paperwork detailing the work carried out on behalf of the people seeking to stay in the UK—when their legal representatives send them with any. Before long, I and my staff dealing with people seeking to stay in the UK get a clear impression of the quality and amount of work carried out by legal representatives on behalf of those people, and particularly asylum seekers.

I recognise and appreciate the hard work carried out by many legal representatives in the field. I am not seeking to say that there is a widespread problem with the services received by asylum seekers; some legal representatives are very diligent and hardworking. I am seeking to highlight instances in which there have been problems with the service that has been provided. As I said, my staff and I soon get a feeling for the level of support offered to asylum seekers by those representing them. Although there are hardworking legal representatives who diligently carry out work for those whom they represent, they are, unfortunately, not the only kind. It is well known that some do the minimum work necessary to obtain the legal aid money and then send the asylum seeker to an MP, who carries out the rest of the work.

During seven years and more representing asylum seekers in Reading, I have come to know which companies, and even which particular representatives at which companies, carry out the full range of work necessary and which do not. The people who deserve to receive the greatest support and to whose cases particular attention has to be paid are unaccompanied minors seeking asylum—people under 18 who have fled their country and turned up in a strange country alone and seeking help. In the late 1990s, a number of unaccompanied minors arrived in Reading seeking asylum from the former Yugoslavia, principally Kosovo. Work with people from that area who are seeking asylum is admittedly not straightforward. It involves ethnicity, religion and employment of family, and great attention needs to be paid to detail.

Whether through word of mouth from other asylum seekers from the same area, direction from formal agencies or whatever other way, a number of unaccompanied asylum seekers acquired the same legal representative, Rodney Oliver, at one Reading company, Thompson Leatherdale. These were a representative and company of which my office was well aware. We had concerns about the quality of service provided to people on legal aid who were seeking asylum, but never were able to point to any hard evidence.

I pay tribute to the work of an organisation called SASIR—Supporting Asylum Seekers In Reading. In particular, that work has focused on Reading college and has been carried out by the Reading college chaplaincy team. I am especially grateful for the work of Harriet Townsend, who is a volunteer. Harriet has spent large amounts of her time accompanying people to see representatives, going though the case with them, identifying whether what has been put forward is the full case, and writing to the Home Office and to the people's legal representative. Harriet has also acted as a carer for some of those unaccompanied minors.

Spending time on a regular basis with young unaccompanied asylum seekers has meant that that organisation has been able to get details of what happened to people and the level of representation that they have received—something that a busy constituency Member's office very often cannot do so easily. In fairness, a busy legal representative probably cannot do that either. The organisation's work threw up some worrying information about the level of service received by unaccompanied asylum seekers. I repeat that I do not make any judgment on the right or otherwise of the cases that I am about to mention. I am raising them solely because it is so important to ensure that people receive a fair and just decision and that their case is heard.

Let us consider the case of BD, who is very mentally damaged and ill. It is believed that he was exposed to serious trauma. The case is a matter for great concern because of the mental condition of the client, yet his case was not presented properly and his history was given incorrectly. I find it impossible to believe that, in respect of someone so mentally damaged and ill, no medical evidence was presented at the appeal, which was dismissed. The case is believed to be a serious one and is listed to be examined, prepared and submitted for an office for the supervision of solicitors investigation. I believe that that has not been done so far, because of limited resources. I made a call this morning to the OSS, and I got the response, "We can't tell you anything about any of your constituents, because, for us to talk to you, they need to write giving you authority." I understand data protection implications, but I find that a little bizarre.

The next case is that of VM, who is traumatised and has psychological problems, and who arrived aged 16, with no family left, having experienced two conflicts. The case was never properly presented, the statements do not make sense and, again, no medical evidence obtained. No case was prepared to present at appeal, even though a certificate of readiness was lodged by Thompson Leatherdale six months previously. There are events recorded on file that are not true. The appeal was dismissed, and from the determination, it is clear that the impact of previous legal representation was highly significant in the dismissal.

Many other problems have appeared as the OSS investigation progresses, including a statement by the solicitor that the client's asylum case was based on his religion, when in fact it was not. That is also being investigated by the OSS. The investigation has reached the stage of a report being prepared for adjudication due to serious problems having been identified.

EI is traumatised and also has psychological problems and a head injury. EI arrived aged 15 with no family left, having come direct from conflict. Again the case was never properly presented and no medical evidence was obtained. The case was not pursued and Thompson Leatherdale failed to discover that the Home Office issued a refusal due to late submittal of papers; that was discovered two and a half years later by social services. When they informed Thompson Leatherdale, no action was taken on the client's behalf, even though the client would be literally destitute from the day of his 18th birthday. Following representations to the then Minister with responsibility for immigration, his case was reopened; again, the OSS is investigating.

[Jane Griffiths]

The final example that I will give, although it is not the last of these cases, is that of RL, who arrived traumatised, having been beaten. RL was mentally ill and had no family left, and arrived as an unaccompanied minor aged 16, having experienced two wars. RL came direct from conflict. Yet again, the case was never properly presented and bizarre statements were submitted. The wrong geographical area was referred to. Again, no medical evidence was submitted. An appeal was lodged unnecessarily, because exceptional leave to remain had already been granted—a fact that was somehow missed. That was done without the client's instructions or knowledge.

Although I am not a lawyer, it seems to me that an appeal should be based on a client's wish to lodge an appeal and not on the arbitrary decision of a legal representative. The appeal in the case of RL was lodged unnecessarily and without the client's instructions or knowledge, and as a result, the adjudicator decided that the appellant was untruthful. It was clear from the determination that problems with previous representation were significant in the dismissal of the appeal. Documents were not submitted to the court by the deadline, and neither were they presented at the appeal, despite the fact that the form of reply stated that the case was in all respects ready for hearing and was submitted to the court a month previously. Again, that case is being investigated by the OSS and there is documentary evidence to support those complaints.

Those are four serious examples of the continuous failure of Thompson Leatherdale and, in particular, of Rodney Oliver, as the person preparing and carrying out the work on the cases, to do the work properly. My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) is in a similar position, with a number of cases in his constituency where work was carried out by Thompson Leatherdale in a similarly incompetent manner or was not carried out properly. Those cases are now before the office for the supervision of solicitors. My hon. Friend and I have together had a number of meetings with those concerned, including volunteers who are seeking to help asylum seekers in Reading.

The problem is that the cases have been with the OSS for more than a year. The Government set up the Office of the Immigration Services Commissioner to ensure that people who give advice in such circumstances do so properly. Complaints were made to the office, but it has said that it will wait until the OSS has completed its investigation. We are going around in circles. In the meantime, Mr. Oliver and Thompson Leatherdale have parted company, and the quality of the work done by the firm has improved. However, Mr. Oliver is still carrying out immigration advice work from his home in Reading.

Of course, the cases that I have mentioned are ongoing. Appeals are taking place, decisions are being made and more than one of those concerned have been told that they are liable to be deported. The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration has stated in a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West that the existence of such independent bodies ensures quality of representation. In fact, under the Immigration and Asylum Appeals (Procedure) Rules 2000, the client is responsible even when the solicitor is at fault. That seems to me to be against natural justice.

It is vital that those acting on behalf of such people, particularly when they are vulnerable, unaccompanied and under 18, provide a proper service. It is also vital that when people representing asylum seekers are shown not to be doing the job, they are stopped from continuing in it. In Reading, we have a serial failure in one person representing a large number of people. People face deportation as a result of that person's incompetence.

I know that the Minister will not be able to give me answers about particular cases. I ask only whether the number of cases against Mr. Oliver currently with the OSS could be pulled together and looked at as a whole. Not only should the matters in each particular case be investigated, but the serial, continuous and widespread negligence and incompetence in those cases should be looked at together. Is it possible for the OISC to consider the conclusions made so far by the OSS and make an interim decision about the fitness of Mr. Oliver to continue to give legal representation? Is it possible to suspend any approval for Mr. Oliver to represent people seeking asylum until the cases have been investigated and a decision reached?

As I said in my introductory remarks, I sought this debate and raised these issues not to judge the worth of the cases of the people who seek asylum to remain in the UK. That decision is not for me. I want my constituents to have full and effective representation to ensure that any decision made about them is fair and just. In the case of unaccompanied minors from the former Yugoslavia, it is clear that they have been let down by Rodney Oliver. Their cases were not heard properly, and the decisions were not made with possession of the full information. I hope that the Minister will be able to look into the matters raised, and that some action can be taken to ensure that others do not fail to get justice as a consequence.

11.14 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) on securing this debate. I understand her motivation for raising these issues. They are certainly of importance to her constituents, and many other Members who deal with casework from similar backgrounds will also be interested in the supervision of solicitors.

As things stand, the legal profession is independent and self-regulating. It is therefore not appropriate for me to comment on complaints about solicitors in individual cases. The Law Society has responsibility for the conduct of solicitors. It has set up a separate body, which used to be known as the office for the supervision of solicitors or the OSS, as my hon. Friend called it, but is now known as the consumer complaints service or the CCS—I want to ensure that we get our acronyms correct—to deal with complaints about solicitors. In any case, where complaints are currently being examined, it is important that the investigations are allowed to proceed to a conclusion.

My hon. Friend asked about circumstances in which multiple complaints are lodged against an individual. In such circumstances, it will be up to the CCS to decide whether to pool the complaints and to look at them in the round or to scrutinise each in isolation. She also asked about the potential for suspension of a solicitor, perhaps when they are under investigation. Again, it is my understanding that that is a matter for the Law Society as the designated professional body; it has scope in those matters.

Where the Legal Services Commission—the body set up to organise the legal aid arrangements—receives a complaint about a supplier of legal aid work, it will provide advice on the appropriate complaints procedure. The LSC is not empowered to investigate the legal competency of solicitors, which is a matter for the Law Society, but under the terms of its contract, it may investigate suppliers' internal procedures and processes used in carrying out services, including those relating to customer services. It is a requirement of the LSC contract that all suppliers have an internal complaints procedure and that that is notified to clients.

The LSC carries out annual audits of suppliers where those procedures may be reviewed. Following an audit, it may register quality concerns and require corrective action as a condition of the contract. The LSC has also introduced a system of peer review, whereby it uses a select group of quality-assured solicitors to review the legal content of their colleagues' work. Where the outcome of an audit or peer review is poor, the LSC may intervene in the operation of the contract and impose further conditions or restrictions, and in some cases it may terminate the contract. Ultimately, the LSC may launch an official investigation, which is typically used in cases of fraud or criminality. That has more to do with the operation of the supply of legal aid work.

I should like to refer briefly to the changes to asylum legal aid that were introduced earlier this year, as they include new arrangements to improve the quality of advice given in asylum cases that are relevant to some of the general points made by my hon. Friend. The Government are committed to the provision of publicly funded legal services as a means of promoting social justice and economic well-being, and tackling social exclusion. In respect of asylum and immigration, the Government are committed to protecting people where there is a real and immediate risk of loss of liberty or life. Our country has a long and honourable tradition of offering sanctuary to genuine refugees.

The Government are also under a duty, however, to ensure that the taxpayer receives value for money in public spending. Asylum legal aid costs have increased significantly over the past few years, from about £81 million in 2000 to £204 million in 2003–04. There are many reasons for that; the main one is the increase in the number of people seeking asylum. However, asylum numbers have fallen significantly, from a high of 100,000 to this year's predicted figure of 35,000, and further falls are likely over the next couple of years. It is necessary to bear that in mind when we consider issues relating to the supply of firms and organisations that undertake publicly funded legal advice on asylum and immigration. The Home Office issues statistics on the number of asylum applications each year and each quarter. On the basis of that information, there were just over 80,000 asylum applicants in 2000, 49,000 applications in 2003 and almost 18,000 applications in the first six months of 2004. Again, the trend is downwards.

The increase in costs, together with evidence of over-claiming, duplication and concerns about the quality of some legal work, meant that we had to take action. New measures were introduced in April this year to bring legal aid on asylum under more effective control and cut unnecessary expenditure. Costs are being limited and targeted on the most deserving cases, and quality advice and representation are being rewarded through a new, independently assessed accreditation scheme for solicitors working on publicly funded asylum cases, which will become compulsory from April next year. Following those reforms, most firms indicated that they wished to continue with legal aid work and many new firms applied for contracts. The concern that many suppliers would withdraw from the market once the new measures were introduced proved unfounded.

Where there is a particular need to increase legal aid services for asylum seekers in a particular area, however, the Legal Services Commission has taken steps to ensure that capacity will be improved, through either the awarding of new contracts or increasing the amount of work done by an existing supplier, which is known as case matter starts—the number of cases that the supplier is authorised to proceed with. Consideration can also be given to expanding the regional services provided by the Legal Services Commission's two largest contractors: the Immigration Advisory Service and the Refugee Legal Centre. Sufficient matter starts are allocated to each supplier by the Legal Services Commission to cover the expected level of asylum work during the year, but there is flexibility to adjust the allocation if circumstances change.

On the specific situation in Reading, I reiterate that it is not appropriate for me to comment on issues raised by individual complaints, although my hon. Friend has aired the issues in this debate and no doubt the Law Society and its consumer complaints service will have noted her comments.

Currently, two solicitors' firms in Reading are contracted to provide asylum legal aid services. At the start of the year, 200 asylum case starts were available to those contractors, and to date 73 have been taken up. In addition, the Legal Services Commission allocated 150 case starts for non-asylum immigration matters, and to date 53 of those have been taken up. When requested, the Legal Services Commission has increased the number of asylum and immigration matter starts for both firms. The firms are taking on new asylum cases, and there is every indication that capacity exists to meet need in the Reading area. My hon. Friend's concerns were about the quality of those services, but it is important to set out the context; there is scope for people to get support through the legal aid system.

Additional suppliers are contracted to provide legal aid services for asylum seekers in Slough, Oxford and High Wycombe. The Immigration Advisory Service also provides an outreach service in Slough from its offices in Hounslow. The local office of the Legal Services Commission is in regular contact with suppliers in the area, so that issues of concern can be identified and dealt with promptly.

I want now to give my hon. Friend more details of the accreditation arrangements that are in place for the new legal aid arrangements. We take the issue of good quality advice exceptionally seriously. It is important that taxpayers' money is not used only for general advice, but for the best advice that is available. Accreditation involves direct testing of each solicitor and advice provider to ensure that they have appropriate knowledge and experience of the relevant law and procedure. Applicants undergo practical assessments, for example, conducting mock interviews and drafting statements. They are required to submit a portfolio of their work for discussion at interview.

The standards to be achieved have been determined by the Legal Services Commission, following consultation with the Law Society and the Office of the Immigration Services Commissioner. The assessment of individuals is carried out by external independent bodies, appointed and monitored by the Law Society. When the scheme becomes compulsory, individuals who are not accredited will be unable to undertake asylum legal aid work.

We want to ensure appropriate access to asylum legal services throughout the country to reflect the needs of those seeking asylum. Given the substantial reduction in the number of people claiming asylum, we intend to carry out a major national review of the future demand for asylum legal aid services. That will take account of the latest estimates of asylum numbers and the aim will be to ensure that suppliers of adequate quality are available throughout England and Wales in the areas where they are needed.

I understand my hon. Friend's need to raise such issues. I recognise that there are questions about how easy, simple and transparent the complaints processes are when people have a genuine grievance that they wish to pursue about advice that they have received from solicitors. That is something about which I and my colleagues in the Department for Constitutional Affairs are concerned. Several processes are under way that will touch on such matters, such as the Clementi review of legal services and the fundamental legal aid review. Both reviews are matters about which hon. Members have been in correspondence over the past few months.

We are especially keen to strike the right balance between access to free services and cost control, and the level of necessary regulation of those who give advice. We must achieve those important priorities. Having had the opportunity to hear my hon. Friend's worries, I shall certainly talk further to my officials about the lessons that might be learned from such cases. I hope that today's debate has been useful to those who are interested in such matters.

G8 (UK Presidency)

2.8 pm

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I thank the Minister for attending this important debate and I hope that interruptions, due to Divisions in the House, will be kept to a minimum. I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will agree that, although there may be differences between the parties on the issue, the House must remain committed to the principle of debt relief. I commend the work of the all-party group on heavily indebted poor countries for its persistent work in such matters.

The year 2015—the target date for the UN millennium development goals—is drawing ever nearer and the commitment made more than four years ago must now be honoured. We are almost a third of the way to that target date and now is a good time to assess the position and renew our commitment to meeting those goals. The moral case for debt relief is simple. People throughout the world are living half lives; they are lives without hope and basic necessities, and often people lose their lives prematurely. We know that they deserve better and we, as a nation, can do better.

In July 2005, we will welcome the world to Perthshire and host a summit that began as a club for the economic elite, but which has evolved into a mechanism for helping the oppressed and needy. As an institution, the G8 has shown that it has the ability and the will to address the debt of the developing world. The 1999 Cologne summit produced a comprehensive and fairer update of the heavily indebted poor countries scheme. The United Kingdom played a leading role and we can do so again in 2005.

The structure of the G8 gives the host country real power to shape the summit's agenda and the UK presidency will be an opportunity to make a difference to world poverty. The G8 presidency will also coincide in the second half of the year with the UK presidency of the European Council. That fortuitous alignment of the stars is behind the creation of the Make Poverty History coalition—a coming together of the UK-based non-governmental organisations, aid agencies and interest groups, backed by widespread public support. The coalition is well aware of the unique opportunity that 2005 presents to our country to lead seven of the world's most powerful nations. It is up to the Government to seize it and build on the good work that has already been done.

The moral case for debt relief is clear. Nations in Africa, Asia and South America face what can only be described as humanitarian disasters on an unprecedented scale. The Zambian gross national product per capita in real terms was nearly $1,500 in 1970. By 2000 it had been reduced to just under $900. That is a reduction of more than 40 per cent. in 30 years.

Developing nations have not shared in the increases in living standards that other parts of the world have enjoyed. To isolate a single cause for that is impossible, but the state of affairs at present is clear. Life expectancy, for instance, in Botswana is only 38 years; Niger's literacy rate is below 20 per cent.; and 36 per cent. of people in Myanmar lack access to proper sanitation.

Africa is blighted by poverty, but the problem extends to all corners of the globe. There is a danger, when highlighting the problems of the developing world, that in listing those appalling statistics we may lose sight of the individual lives that are involved. Lack of access to clean water may mean a 15 km round trip to fulfil the most basic of human needs. Walking more than 15 km every day means that a basic education is almost out of the question. Who has time to go to school when their prime concern is survival?

The third millennium development goal calls for the promotion of gender equality and the empowerment of women. Women are often responsible for gathering water in societies where opportunity is already limited. They are the first to suffer from malnutrition, as they give their children priority in the fight for survival. The lack of essential water supplies means that women are forced to sacrifice even the most basic education. Women's rights in developing countries are sometimes better served by building a well in the village than by calls for an international Bill of Rights, which might have little practical impact in a developing country.

Debt relief is not a panacea for the ills of the developing world, but it can, in most cases, make a real difference. Funding that would otherwise be used to service debts dating back to the 1970s, which were incurred to mitigate low commodity prices but which have been compounded by high interest rates and oil price surges, can now be invested in building a basic infrastructure, which will, in turn, help to address the rights and needs of local people.

So far, steps taken to reduce the debt of the poorest nations have produced real results. Debt relief has led to landmark educational improvements, essential immunisation schemes and vital water and sanitation projects. All are to be celebrated. Those achievements counter the suggestion that heavily indebted poor countries are unable to address the problems of their citizens. A recent study by the Jubilee debt campaign, to which I pay tribute for its work, shows that 65 per cent. of all revenue freed up through debt reduction has been spent on health and education projects.

Since the introduction of the HIPC project, social spending has risen by about 20 per cent. in participating countries. Uganda, Mozambique, Zambia and Tanzania have all been able to abolish school fees for primary education. Success stories are numerous and those countries have shown that they can truly help themselves if they are given a chance to do so.

Debt relief must be conditional on responsible economic policy and real efforts to tackle corruption, malpractice and unnecessary waste, but we must not forget the rights of developing states as sovereign nations. A solution to this is the creation of national debt relief committees such as those set up in Tanzania and Uganda, which allow the people of heavily indebted poor countries to hold their own Governments to account and to serve to strengthen national democracy. Work by Christian Aid in this area has shown that the demand for accountability already exists in developing countries.

We must also accept our own responsibility in the drive to ensure that development aid and cancelled debt revenue reach those who are most in need. Efforts made in clamping down on terrorists' assets should be extended to those who siphon off Government funds for their own benefit. Good governance is a must if developing nations are to have a chance of recovering from their parlous predicament, the origins of which can be traced back to the 1970s. We must, however, make the distinction between anti-corruption drives, which are essential, and disagreements over economic policy. Corruption is global and not solely the preserve of developing nations. It should not be used to veto or delay help that is already long overdue.

International institutions such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank are not a substitute for the voice of the people. They were not elected by the citizens of heavily indebted poor countries and they must accept that they lack the democratic legitimacy of elected Assemblies. A recent World Development Movement report highlighted the IMF's demand that Zambia privatise its state bank despite a vote in Parliament against such a policy. The decision taken by Zambia's Parliament was not simply a knee-jerk reaction, but a response to a 10-year process of privatisation at the behest of the IMF. In the same period, there has been negative economic growth, a rise in foreign ownership of capital and a fall in living standards. I am not suggesting that the IMF is responsible for that state of affairs, but it is absurd that Zambia was asked to take the same medicine over and over again without being allowed to look for an alternative cure.

The Zambian Government were explicitly threatened with the withdrawal of HIPC-prescribed debt relief if they abided by the decision of the nationally elected Assembly. Cases such as this fuel charges that the west is continuing a policy of neo-colonialism through institutions that it can dominate. The export of free-market ideology has not been kind to many impoverished countries, and we must learn that first-world economies do not always provide the solution for developing-world economies.

I call on the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for International Development to use their positions in the IMF and the World Bank to work towards policies tailored to specific countries and to end this one-size-fits-all approach, which has been shown seriously to damage fledgling economies. That would be an important step in addressing some problems that I have already mentioned regarding international monetary institutions.

Changes must ensure that the distinction is made between debts incurred through criminal and irresponsible activity and debt that a country should be required to pay back. In the future, there should be an administrative bankruptcy procedure for nations that cannot repay all their debt.

Finally, a shift in emphasis from a structural macro-economic policy to a focus on outcomes linked to the millennium development goals would ensure that debt relief achieved what it is intended to achieve, rather than acting as an accompaniment to economic ideology.

The much-vaunted success of the Asian tiger economies was based partly on protectionism and partly on state subsidy. Some leeway must be granted in heavily indebted poor countries to protect their firms and producers from international markets. Only yesterday, an article on the BBC's website highlighted the problems of international markets facing Mexican maize farmers in the state of Oaxaca. Their low-intensity farming methods do not allow them to compete with heavily subsidised US competitors, and they are forced either to adopt unsustainable practices or to face extinction. Mexico is not classed as a heavily indebted poor country, but that does not mean that it is not home to areas of extreme poverty.

The focus of today's debate is debt relief, but again it is important to note that debt relief alone will not solve the problems of a developing world or achieve the millennium development goals. We must adopt an holistic approach that combines fair trade policies with increasing aid alongside the reformed HIPC scheme.

At this point, perhaps we should consider the impact of the common agricultural policy on developing countries; the damage that it can do has been well established. However, although changes to the policy do not go far or fast enough, they are going in the right direction. When the CAP was established, it was based on intervention and subsidies. Heavily subsidised produce was exported to the world market, driving down world prices even more, which was very disruptive and damaging to developing countries.

In 1990, we moved on to the MacSharry reforms, which involved direct payments to farmers. Now we have come to the mid-term review: the emphasis is not on extending production in Britain or Europe, but on reinvigorating rural development and environmental practices in the countryside. We should compare that with what happens in America, where considerable and increasing subsidies are paid to promote production. That continues to have deleterious effects on developing countries. The European Union's common agricultural policy is not perfect by any means, but it is moving in the right direction and we should ensure that that progress goes on and increasingly meets the needs of developing countries.

The first steps of debt relief have been made, but we must ensure that our commitment is long term and that the early momentum is not lost. I welcome the Chancellor's pledge to meet 10 per cent. of the costs needed for the World Bank and the African Development Bank to cancel multilateral debts. That will ensure that those institutions' resources can be used to fund future projects in the developing world. It is important that debt relief should not be used to substitute for existing Government aid programmes. The Liberal Democrats also support the proposal for the creation of an international finance facility. If that were created and all the signatories contributed, the IFF could play an important role in increasing development aid to the world's poorest nations. It is estimated that the extra $50 million a year needed to achieve the development goals could be raised through the issue of bonds funded by long-term commitments from developed nations.

The Chancellor has referred to that as his Marshall plan for the third world. The ambition of such a project is commendable, but the Chancellor's metaphor highlights another reason for supporting developing nations. The 1948 Marshall plan was an investment in war-torn countries against the perceived threat of the Soviet Union. Today, we must again invest to ensure that there is prosperity and economic development throughout the world. Poverty breeds resentment and frustration with the status quo. The best way to address radical discontent is to take away the conditions in which it thrives. Ignorance, despair and alienation can be countered with education, health care and opportunity. Government-backed bonds are a real investment for the rest of the world. A more stable global environment would be one of the rewards, but there would also be increased opportunities for trade for British companies.

That view is shared by hon. Members in all parties. I welcome the comment made last week by the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed):

> "When will the EU and the US understand that the richer the world is, the more people are able to afford the goods and services that we produce? Is not it common sense, and in our common interest, to end policies that make the poorest poorer?"—[Official Report, 10 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 833.]

I could not agree more.

We have a moral duty to the people of developing countries to build on what has already been achieved on debt relief. We also have a duty to our own country to ensure that the global economy and international security are as favourable and as sound as possible. Both goals could be advanced by the Government in the next year.

It is vital that the burden of both multilateral and bilateral debt is removed from heavily indebted poor countries, that progress is made on the reform of monetary institutions and that the promise of the IFF is turned into real commitment from the G8, without which it will lack the capacity to make a real difference. I welcome the Government's work in this area and urge the Prime Minister to underline this achievement in Perthshire next summer.

If we expect other nations to follow, we must lead by example. We have done so in the past, and we should remind the other seven G8 nations of that next July. I almost feel like breaking into song and making a contribution to Sunday's re-recording of "Do They Know it's Christmas?", but I am sure that you would rule me out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that every hon. Member present would leave the Chamber on hearing my voice.

My final message to the Minister is this: 2005 is an important year—make it the year in which we pronounce the death sentence on debt for developing countries and make sure that Britain executes that sentence.

2.25 pm

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) on introducing the debate, which is important because it might be a little too late to drive home the agenda by the time we get to 2005.

It is important to recognise that although the half an hour of Prime Minister's Question Time is all that people generally see of our proceedings, many issues such as this, and others on which I share an interest with the hon. Gentleman, enjoy a great deal of cross-party support. Indeed, that is one of the great joys that most of us get from being in the House. When the Minister sets out the progress that he wishes to make, I am sure he will know that he has almost the entire House behind him.

I am also grateful to the hon. Gentleman for mentioning the all-party group on heavily indebted poor countries. I am the group's secretary, and I just wish that we had a snappier title. When the Jubilee 2000 campaign was set up, the whole of civil society—the non-governmental organisations, Churches, trade unions and others—began working with Members of Parliament. Jubilee 2000 was a nice, snappy title, so being the secretary was much easier. However, the words behind the acronym HIPC probably sum up not only the issue, but the difficulties that we all face.

It is ironic that the Band Aid event is this week, because the very same issue got me involved in politics 20 years ago. Like many others, I was moved by seeing the plight of people in Ethiopia, and we felt that we had to do something. Perhaps I was a naïve teenager, but I did not think it was enough to write to my local Member of Parliament—it was the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who is still in the House—and I got sucked into politics. Such issues have been my driving force during the past 20 years and during my time in this place.

One of my most moving experiences in this place was meeting Sir Bob Geldof recently. He told us exactly what we still need to do. We use a different language here, but Bob puts it right on the record, and there is no shirking our responsibility to sort this out. Just a few weeks ago, he showed us pictures of the situation in north and central Africa, including pictures of pot-bellied children. He said quite pointedly that, in one sense, their problem is not food, but the politics that prevent food or water from getting to them. We live in a world that can feed itself, but we are still unable to achieve that, so it is down to us to put structures in place to ensure that we can.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I, too, compliment the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) on introducing the debate.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) agrees, but is it still valid to suggest that, as well as debt relief, we must bring peace to the various conflicts in Africa? One way of doing that is to ensure that the developed world pays for peacekeeping directly or, as in the case of Darfur, through the African Union. However, anyone who saw Hilary Andersson's "Panorama" report on Monday will understand the dilemmas of a force that is too small trying to deal with an enormous problem. We must address that issue urgently.

Mr. Reed: I am grateful for that intervention. I know that my hon. Friend has visited Sudan at least once, and probably twice, and that he knows the situation well.

That brings me to an issue that I want to develop a little. As secretary of the all-party HIPC group, I recognise that we need a multi-faceted attack. We need the trade justice movement, and many countries, including our own, to increase the aid that they provide. Last night, during the Prime Minister's speech at the Guildhall, I was interested to hear about a modernised United Nations playing an increasing role. That is the means that we must all use to make our contribution.

However, we are talking specifically about the debt part of the campaign, and, as the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire mentioned, the 150 or so NGOs that have come together under the Make Poverty History in 2005 banner recognise that that is only one part of it. Nevertheless, it is crucial, because the matter has become very technical.

I recall from 2000 that the campaign set itself a very tight deadline—it was going to disband after 2000. Jubilee 2000 did its campaign work and disbanded, and there was a general sense that we had achieved a great deal. The headlines were good. The $100 billion of debt relief had been announced and it felt as if individually we had made an enormous contribution. However, part of the problem is that although the campaign did not disappear, because the same people are still campaigning, the mass movement disappeared, thinking that we had achieved a great deal.

The reality is that for many countries the HIPC initiative has not meant a great deal because of its complexities. Of the $100 billion that is always talked about, I think that only $29 billion has so far been delivered, because of the complexity of getting to the decision point and the completion point. Some $24 billion is still to be achieved, which I think will probably happen in the short to medium term, but in the long term we are still left well short of the $100 billion that was offered.

I must congratulate this Government, as I am sure most hon. Members will, as we and Canada have taken a lead on the issue and the agenda. People such as those who were at Birmingham a few years ago should be referred to at this point. As the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire said, the G8 used to be a self-congratulatory club of the leading economies in which issues such as this were not even discussed. I hope and understand that, fortunately, it will now be top of the agenda for the duration of the presidency next year. The fact that the issue is up there, that there is a Commission for Africa and that other things are going on shows that we have made progress.

The reality is that the vast majority of the complexity and the difficulties are caused at World Bank and IMF level. Most bilateral debts with the G7 and G8 countries have been written off, but this is a question of trying to get into the complexity of how the World Bank and IMF operate. It is at that level that we need to work more closely together to ensure that the multilateral debts are written off.

I am sure that most hon. Members who are present will have visited many countries that have benefited. If not, I am sure that they have seen other programmes. I know from my brief experience in Ethiopia last year that the sustainability is not that wonderful, even when the country has reached decision point. The collapse of coffee and other prices last year and the year before had an enormous impact on local economies. Even though Ethiopia was one of those countries at the forefront of its debt relief, the benefit felt by its ordinary citizens was fairly minimal because of the collapse of coffee prices. That is why, on its own, debt relief is not enough; it must be tied in with the Trade Justice Movement and aid. What we saw in Ethiopia was a clear example of that.

I visited a fair trade coffee grower and the difference in the amount of money that that individual farmer received compared with that received by one who was selling coffee and goods direct to the market was enormous; they were probably receiving about three or four times more. Sometimes we pay exactly the same price, but 10p or 15p more gives an enormous benefit to an individual farmer. That shows that even if we cannot change the world overnight, at least we can make the world better, one cup of coffee at a time. I often say that to people when they feel daunted by the prospects of trying to deal with the HIPC initiative.

We have good organisations in Loughborough—Christian Aid and others—that work closely together in the constituency. They often have lunches, for example. Sometimes it is difficult to get over the complexity of the decision-making process, but it is possible for individuals to start to make a small difference, one cup of coffee at a time.

A number of organisations have been lobbying quite heavily on the issue, such as Oxfam and others. They produced a paper in October entitled "Fools gold", which puts the case for 100 per cent. multilateral debt cancellation for the poorest countries. I will briefly raise a number of points from it in the hope that the Minister will respond to them.

As the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire will know, there has always been debate on which countries should and should not fit the HIPC definition. We often talk about the 42 countries, but, using different definitions, some feel that there should be slightly fewer and others that there should be slightly more. I would be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about the other low-income countries that would need additional resources through debt relief and aid to reach their millennium development goals.

The other point is that debt relief should not be financed through the existing aid budgets. I seek an assurance from the Minister that that is so in the case of the UK and also through the IMF. Debt relief should not be confined to the HIPCs; it should be extended to other countries, where possible.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) said, it is difficult to get to the decision and completion points in countries where there is conflict, but I hope that we can find other ways to ensure that debt relief, or its equivalent, gets through to the most vulnerable people. Things are particularly bad in war-torn countries or where there is conflict, so we need to find ways of ensuring that it gets through in those places. I am not sure that we have a complete answer on that.

Oxfam also suggests that we need to move things forward in countries with the greatest human development needs. That term also relates to places that suffer from conflict and deprivation.

Finally, there must be a fair, transparent and comprehensive international insolvency process. This is an interesting idea. Some proposals that get floated have little support at the beginning, such as the Chancellor's international finance facility. Support for that, however, is gaining momentum not only in this country—I am glad to hear that the Liberal Democrats are supporting it, and I believe that the official Opposition do, too—but internationally, as 40 or 42 countries have already signed up in principle.

I asked a question about that recently. I want to know how far those countries have gone towards promising to reach the $100 billion a year that is needed. I also want to know what time scale we are working towards in getting the IFF up and running. There are already some pilot projects, but at what stage do we say that we have completely achieved our aim and which countries have promised real money rather than letters of intent and good wishes?

So far, the picture has been mixed. There was a strong sense of purpose among those involved in the non-governmental organisations, the Church groups and civil society who put this matter at the heart of the agenda in 2000. We also congratulate the Government on what they have achieved with international partners to take things forward, but the devil is in the detail with HIPC. Things have not worked as well as they should have because of complexities and difficulties and because of the restrictions that the IMF and the World Bank have put on some programmes.

Uganda is often cited as the best example of debt relief working well. I spoke about this to the Ugandan high commissioner only a couple of weeks ago: where debt relief is directly related to Uganda's primary school building programme, it is possible to see in human terms what debt relief is all about. It is a great joy to see that, instead of the piles of documents, which each of us has seen, on the complexities of the HIPC arrangements.

I know that this is a complicated world, but let us try to look at these matters from the point of view of the person receiving the benefit upwards, rather than downwards from the perspective of the bankers, the IMF and the World Bank. We should simplify the process and get aid through by sustainable debt relief in the long term. We should use the momentum that we have to ensure that we make progress on this matter, so that we do not return to it in 20 years and say, "More could be done." I will not be around then, and I am sure Sir Bob Geldof hopes that he will not have to make another Band Aid record.

2.38 pm

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) on securing the debate. His timing is excellent. The United Kingdom's presidency of the G8 starts on 1 January. The Government's thinking about what they want to prioritise during their presidency must therefore almost be set in stone by now, so I hope that the Minister will be able to set out in detail what the UK will seek to achieve in international development terms.

I welcome the Minister's presence, and I also want to thank another member of the Government for his interest in and commitment to resolving the global debt crisis. I refer to the Chancellor, who has given support to innovative thinking on how to build the political will for large-scale debt forgiveness in the form of the international finance facility. That represents the most sustained engagement of a national Finance Minister globally. That must be welcomed.

As my hon. Friend said, the Liberal Democrats support the Government's efforts on the IFF, among other things. We welcome the Chancellor's announcement—technically it is a re-announcement—that the UK will commit up to £100 million a year to write off its share of the debt owed to the World Bank by up to 30 of the world's poorest countries.

The IFF comes with a health warning, to which I referred in Department for International Development questions last week. I understand that France and possibly Canada are supporters of the initiative, along with a number of other countries that might expect to benefit from the IFF. Unfortunately, as far as I am aware, the world's main player, the United States, remains opposed. I hope that the Prime Minister had an opportunity to raise the issue during his recent meeting with President Bush, and to encourage the US to express greater support for the initiative. Without the commitment of the US, the IFF will find it difficult to raise the significant additional sums that will be required to ensure that the millennium development goals are met.

We welcome the momentum that was built up at the October meeting of the IMF, the World Bank and the G7 Finance Ministers in Washington. At the end of that meeting, the Chancellor spoke of a growing consensus around 100 per cent. debt reduction. However, we need to monitor closely the development of that consensus. For example, in the weeks before the meetings to which the Chancellor was referring, the US Government floated for the first time a proposal to cancel 100 per cent. of the debts for up to 42 countries in the HIPC initiative. However, the US proposal envisaged a reduction in aid budgets in order to fund debt cancellation, so it did not include any new resources for poor countries.

I am sure that that way of financing debt reduction would not be acceptable to the UK Government. Again, there may have been an opportunity for the Prime Minister to raise the issues with the President, and I hope that the Minister will tell us whether any such discussions took place. Debt cancellation cannot replace aid. In fact, the cancellation of debt must be combined with more and better financial assistance for development so that poor countries can secure a sustainable exit from debt.

That is just one of the aspects of the debt cancellation agenda that needs to be monitored closely. The nature and shape of how we go about cancelling debt will be critical to our capacity to contribute to alleviating global inequality, so in addition to securing top-line political commitment, we need to ensure that that commitment translates into effective, sustainable and pro-poor policy and practice.

A number of other features will be critical to effective debt cancellation. First, debt cancellation must be pursued by fair and transparent means. The task of calculating how much debt should be cancelled must no longer be left to creditors concerned mainly with minimising their own costs. Instead, we need a fair and transparent international process to ensure that human needs take priority over debt repayments. Of course, that will be less critical if the international community adopts a policy of 100 per cent. debt cancellation, but even then, we will need to agree the criteria according to which countries will be included in the scheme. The debt sustainability ratio that is currently used is not sufficient, as my hon. Friend pointed out.

According to the World Bank and IMF, to which the G8 has effectively delegated the operation of the current HIPC initiative, a poor country's debts are sustainable provided that the ratio of the total debt relative to annual export earnings does not exceed 150 per cent. That is the target for which the bank and the fund aim when assessing how much multilateral debt can be written off, taking into account the bilateral debt cancellation promised by sovereign creditors such as the UK. It is clear, however, that even by that very narrow financial definition, at least 16 of the countries currently in the HIPC initiative will still have spiralling and unsustainable debt burdens after receiving all the relief currently available.

Most importantly, if even the most basic development targets, such as the internationally agreed 2015 millennium development goals, are to be met, no debt repayments can be sustained, given that poor countries desperately lack the resources that they need to meet those goals. In fact, it would make more sense to link debt to the achievement of the millennium development goals than to the ratio currently used. Furthermore, it will make no sense at all and will not be fair to poor countries, if they are still required after having received all the assistance possible under HIPC to service debts to the rich world at the expense of vital expenditure on basic services such as health and education.

The second of the two issues associated with debt cancellation that needs to be monitored is conditionality. International institutions such as the IMF and the World Bank must stop asking poor countries to jump through hoops in order to qualify for debt relief. For instance, poor countries should no longer have to privatise basic services as a condition for getting the debt relief that they so desperately need. By agreeing to cancel their share of multilateral debt and taking a lead on the issue generally, the UK Government have played an important part in breaking the logjam that has prevented international progress on debt cancellation. The next step is to sustain that commitment and for the UK to convince its global peers to follow suit and ensure that the way in which debt is cancelled is the most effective in tackling poverty and delivering on the millennium development goals. It is a commitment to meeting the goals that should be driving us.

As we all know, in 2000, the international community committed itself to meeting eight goals by 2015. They ranged from halving extreme poverty and hunger to securing universal primary education and from reducing gender disparities to reversing the spread of AIDS. These are eight crucial goals that provide the framework for our efforts to cancel debt and increase aid, and around which we desperately need to generate an increased sense of urgency and importance.

We should be looking not to 2015, but to 2005, which is a crucial year for the fight against poverty—a year of challenge and opportunity. In September next year, the international community will return to New York to review its progress in meeting the millennium development goals. I hope that the Minister will say how he expects the Commission for Africa's work to feed into that process and what organisation at the conference he expects to ensure that any recommendations made by the commission are followed through. At that meeting, we will clearly need to consider whether we are on target for 2015.

However, 2005 is the first date of importance, because the gender equity target is due for that year. As I have mentioned in other debates, my visit to Ghana has led me to think that there is no prospect whatever that it will meet the gender equity target. That is true not only of Ghana, as 60 per cent. of developing countries are unlikely to meet that target on present trends, and one has to doubt whether they will be in line to meet it by 2015. That is clearly a bad start, and it is shameful that there has not been a public uprising to respond and to tackle the issue.

Primary enrolments are going up in developing countries, but more than 100 million children did not go to school this morning. Many hon. Members participated in the event on those matters a couple of months ago. Our education goals require 80 million more primary school places in Africa alone over the coming decade. At the current rate of progress, more than 70 countries will fail to achieve universal primary education by the target date. In sub-Saharan Africa, we will not achieve what we have committed ourselves to achieve by 2015 until 2129 at the earliest. That is a very long way off. At our current rate of progress, as I am sure the Minister knows, we will fail to meet the agreed targets for all the other goals.

Next year's conference to review the millennium development goals will occur in September, when the UK will preside over two of the world's most important multilateral forums—the G8 and the European Union. As my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire said, CAP reform must feature significantly in the UK's presidency of the EU, as that can deliver substantial improvements to quality of life and well-being in developing countries. Next year presents an exceptional series of opportunities for the UK to take the lead in facilitating international action to cancel poor country debt, and to revitalise commitment and action on meeting the MDGs.

Delivering on those goals does not require a wonder cure or a technological breakthrough; it requires political will. The Liberal Democrats believe that the MDGs can be met and that the UK can play a bigger and more effective part in working for a better world. The Government have demonstrated their commitment by advancing solutions to the global debt crisis, but as hon. Members have said, resolving the challenge of developing country debt, important as it is, will not in itself be enough.

The Liberal Democrats believe that the Government need to use the unparalleled opportunity that they have been granted for international influence in 2005 to secure commitments to more and better development assistance and trade reform. We also have some ideas for UK-led international action, using the G8 and the EU, on HIV/AIDS, arms control, the environment and increasing corporate responsibility. We will return to those issues in the next couple of weeks.

Decades of effort to tackle global inequality remind us of the interrelatedness of the challenges that the developing world faces. As a result, we need comprehensive approaches that address the problems from a range of angles. Cancelling developing country debt is a crucial part of that comprehensive plan. As a result, the Liberal Democrats will support the Government's stated efforts to cancel debt and will encourage other players in the international community to do so, too. We will monitor closely the progress and outcomes of the Government's efforts. Finally, we will look for the same effort from the Government on the other challenges related to global poverty—now, in 2005, and beyond.

2.52 pm

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I thank the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) for initiating this debate. It is timely, because 2005 promises to be the year when the poor of the world find out whether the Prime Minister's bold words are matched by action. In April, the Commission for Africa will publish its report. In July, the UK will host the G8 summit in Scotland and begin its six-month presidency of the European Union. In September, a special UN summit will meet to review progress towards the 2015 millennium development goals. If we are serious about meeting those goals, then at Gleneagles next year Britain must take the lead in pressing for better aid, freer and fairer trade and faster and deeper debt relief.

Britain possesses a unique ability to facilitate action through a number of international organisations. We are the only country that is a member of the G8, the EU, the Commonwealth and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, as well as a permanent member of the UN Security Council and a major player in the voting councils of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. In the past, we have used that unique position to set the international agenda on development issues. Next year, we have the opportunity again to show global leadership in pressing for action on multilateral debt relief and for freer and fairer trade.

As the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) said, July 2005 also marks the 20th anniversary of Live Aid. That astonishing event raised £30 million for famine victims in Ethiopia and demonstrated yet again the remarkable generosity of the British people, but every year since 1985, Ethiopia has sent back to rich countries more than twice that amount in debt repayments.

Every year, the countries of sub-Saharan Africa—the world's poorest region—spend more than £7 billion on debt repayments. Despite the progress that has been made, many countries are still spending more each year on debt service than on health care and education. Clearly, the current debt relief process needs radical reform. The G8 summit next year provides us with the opportunity to secure an international commitment to achieve that reform. As U2's Bono has said,

> "2005 is our chance to go down in history for what we did do, rather than what we didn't do."

Britain has an excellent record on debt relief. In government, the Conservative party cancelled £1.2 billion of debt owed by the world's poorest countries. It was a Conservative Chancellor, Nigel Lawson, who initiated the first round of bilateral debt relief in 1988, and three years later, John Major led the international community in securing agreement for deeper and more comprehensive debt reduction.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) was a great champion of debt relief long before it became a high-profile public issue. In 1996, he played a key role in establishing the heavily indebted poor countries initiative, which began the process of cancelling debt owed to multilateral institutions. Even the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short) said:

> "There is no doubt that the previous Conservative Government took a strong position on debt relief."

We are grateful for her recognition of that.

We have continued that record in opposition. We backed Jubilee 2000, which successfully mobilised many organisations and individuals, including all the Churches of the United Kingdom, to campaign for debt relief. Where Labour has built on the previous Conservative Government's strong record by continuing and, I am happy to say, intensifying debt cancellation, we have been and will remain supportive. We certainly welcome the Chancellor's decision to cancel the bilateral debts of the poorest countries, but there is still much to be done on debt owed to international institutions such as the IMF and the World Bank.

The enhanced HIPC initiative has made a good start in delivering multilateral debt relief. By and large, it has succeeded in ensuring that the money that is released is put to good use and does not line the pockets of corrupt dictators and arms dealers. Well managed debt relief has produced a number of success stories. Uganda used the money to double primary school enrolment and invest in a successful HIV/AIDS plan. Mozambique's debt relief has enabled its Government to immunise 500,000 children, and Benin eliminated school fees in rural areas, allowing thousands of children to attend classes for the first time.

The slow and cumbersome structures of the HIPC initiative do not, however, reflect the urgent need for faster, wider and deeper debt cancellation. Even after getting full relief under the scheme, many countries will still have difficulties in servicing their debts. In the face of a growing HIV/AIDS crisis, we cannot allow red tape and bureaucratic inertia to cost lives. Some much-needed reforms have been made. The two-year extension of the HIPC initiative announced at the 2004 Sea Island summit will potentially allow a further 10 eligible countries to benefit from relief. Additional top-up relief will help countries that have been hit by deteriorating terms of trade.

The debate will turn to whether we should go much further and match the 100 per cent. bilateral cancellation already pledged with 100 per cent. multilateral cancellation for the poorest countries. The plan that the Government announced two months ago proposes just such a radical widening of the HIPC initiative. The Government must champion that plan in the strongest of terms. We cannot afford to miss next year's golden opportunity to generate an international consensus in favour of extending multilateral relief for the poorest countries.

Any relief on debts owed to the IMF should be funded, as the Government have suggested, by the sale or revaluation of IMF gold reserves. New funding commitments would be required to secure 100 per cent. cancellation in the case of debt owed to multilateral institutions, such as the World Bank and the African Development Bank. We are pleased that the Government are pledging to pay our share of the debt service owed to those institutions on behalf of eligible countries. They must now also be forceful in securing similar commitments from the other G8 countries.

At the same time as pressing for more relief, we must take the long view, and work towards achieving ongoing debt sustainability for poor countries. We must ensure that no country slips back into heavy indebtedness after receiving relief. We must also ensure that lending is more responsible than it has been in the past. Our Export Credits Guarantee Department has pledged to ensure that its credit is not misspent. Next year, we must push other countries to make similar commitments.

Next year will be crucial for shaping the path of debt relief for years to come. We also know, however, that it will be only a first step towards achieving the millennium development goals. People of poor countries possess the energy and dynamism to create wealth and work themselves out of poverty, but that potential is stifled by western protectionism in too many cases. Countries that secure good governance, pursue sound macro-economic policies and respect property rights should not be penalised by the protectionist approach of the common agricultural policy.

It is perverse to give poor countries aid and grant them debt relief, but impose restrictions on their produce. Most HIPCs depend on single commodity exports such as gold, copper, cotton, coffee and tobacco. Falling agricultural commodity prices have damaged the ability of almost all HIPCs to earn foreign currency and repay their debt. Reform of international rules to promote free trade and open markets would allow them to increase their proportion of world trade and help them to repay their debts. As well as being good news for British consumers, better access to western markets could be worth tens of billions of pounds for some of the poorest countries. Reform of the CAP could save the British taxpayer up to £3 billion each year. Next year, we should look beyond debt and the G8 meeting. Britain must use its EU presidency to push for a reduction in European tariff barriers, thorough reform of the CAP and a more efficient, poverty-focused European aid budget.

In Iraq, we have recognised the principle that the victims of murderous dictators who rack up huge debts should not be made to pay for their oppressors' follies. That principle should be extended to the countries of Africa. The sins and mistakes of the past should not be allowed to blight the future of an entire continent. Where stable civilian Governments have replaced military regimes, generous and carefully monitored debt relief should be forthcoming. Where people attempt to work and trade their way out of poverty, they should be allowed fair access to our markets. While the Governments of other developed nations drag their feet, Britain must push firmly for action.

The decisions on debt and trade that will be taken next year in the luxurious surroundings of the Gleneagles hotel will affect the lives of millions of the poorest people on the planet. For their sakes, we must make sure that we take the right decisions.

3.2 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) on securing the debate, and I join him in congratulating the all-party group on heavily indebted poor countries on its campaigning work in the House on these topics. I welcome his decision to congratulate, rather than ape, Bob Geldof, Fran Healy and others, who have produced the new Live Aid single. I am sure that he, too, will welcome the decision of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give back the moneys from VAT. I take this opportunity to congratulate Woolworths, which has, I believe, decided not to charge its usual levy for distributing the single. I hope that other distributors follow its example.

We know that one in five of the world's poor lives in abject poverty. We know also that roughly 1 billion people do not have consistent access to clean water and do not have the resources either to afford essential medicines that we take for granted, or, as the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) said, to send their children to school. Furthermore, some 6 million people die from AIDS, TB and malaria every year.

Those statistics are appalling, but nothing helps one to understand the impact of those epidemics quite like seeing it on the ground. It was sobering for me to see the project supported by Christian Aid and the South African Council of Churches in the Dukathole township in Germiston, just outside Johannesburg, in which a small group of remarkable women supports orphans and people dying of AIDS and TB, as well as those—often grandmothers—who look after the orphans and make sure that they go to school. Those women do a remarkable job.

We know that development assistance works. Kenya, for example, has taken the decision to abolish school fees. The UK has provided £10 million to help to pay for extra school places and to provide proper accommodation for the extra 1 million children who now want to come to school to learn to read and write—who want their opportunity to understand the world.

Another instance of development assistance working is the eradication of polio. The number of countries infected with polio has decreased from 125 to six. We are within sight of the fantastic achievement of the eradication of polio. Perhaps that will be achieved as early as the end of 2006, if we can continue not only the development assistance but the targeted effort to eliminate polio—to get the polio vaccine to the most affected areas and continue to bear down on the epidemic.

I saw for myself, on a visit to India, how the development assistance money for targeting polio is being spent. I pay tribute to the work of the Government of India, but also to Rotary International, which supports that work. I am sure that the House will be pleased to know that three children in a slum in east Delhi were inoculated against polio thanks to my efforts. I am not sure who was most terrified—the children, who screamed all the time while I was trying to administer the inoculations; the supervisors, who were with me; or the mothers. On balance, it was probably the mothers. The work is making a huge difference and we are in sight of the eradication of polio.

Hon. Members have spoken of the huge scale of the challenge of eliminating global poverty, which places on the developed world a moral responsibility to do more to that end. It is in our self-interest to act to eliminate poverty, because disease, political instability and pollution do not stop at national borders. What happens in developing countries has an impact on the UK and other rich countries.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire was right to secure the debate and highlight the fact that next year, as Britain takes the G8 presidency, and in the second half of the year, when it takes the presidency of the European Union, we shall have an opportunity to move the agenda forward. Before we take on the presidency of those organisations, the Commission for Africa will report in the spring, while in September the UN millennium declaration review takes place.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister created the Commission for Africa, demonstrating his personal commitment to look for solutions to its problems. That commission is bringing together leaders from the developed and developing worlds—Africa and other continents—and from civil society, as well as business representatives and Church leaders. The task of the commission is to try to understand why more progress has not been made in Africa and what can be done to move things forward. The commission intends to bring forward a comprehensive plan for the international community to support African development. Its report will be published early in 2005 and will be presented to the G8 for discussion at the Gleneagles summit in early July.

The millennium summit in 2005, reviewing progress towards the millennium development goals, is another key point. At the current rate of progress some of those goals will not be met until 2165—150 years too late. That summit is the opportunity not only to review progress, but to accelerate the political momentum and the political will that are needed to make further progress.

Professor Jeffrey Sachs will publish the findings of the UN's millennium project next year. It is already clear that the international community will have to provide more financial assistance if we are to get back on track to achieve the millennium development goals by 2015. Next year will provide the international community with an important agenda, which could be set by the United Kingdom, to achieve real change for the world's poorest people.

We know that more aid needs to be provided and that there must be a dramatic increase in assistance. If we are to achieve the millennium development goals, the World Bank and the UN have estimated that $100 billion will be needed each year over the next 11 years. However, only $50 billion is being provided at present. One of the things that the UK has already done to demonstrate leadership on the issue is to give the Department for International Development its largest ever increase in spend—9 per cent. each year over the next three years. If we continue to make progress at that rate, we shall hit the UN's 0.7 per cent. target by 2013.

Tom Brake: The UK's contribution is clearly significant, but it is only a small percentage of the total budget. The Minister may be about to refer to this, but what feedback are we receiving from the Americans on the role that they might be willing to play?

Mr. Thomas: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for leading me into my next remarks. We need to give credit where it is due and to recognise that the Americans have significantly increased their assistance, especially on AIDS. We must give credit to President Bush, in particular, for his lead in respect of increasing funding to the global fund and for other AIDS-related work.

The other specific point that I want to flag up in the context of the need for more aid, to which the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire alluded, is the international finance facility. It is the most developed idea for raising the additional finance necessary to meet the millennium development goals. He may know that the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunisation—GAVI—has approached the United Kingdom to explore whether the IFF's front-loading principles might be applied to GAVI to increase the resources available for child vaccination and immunisation. We are collaborating with the French and the Gates Foundation to take that initiative forward. We hope to launch that mini-IFF in the early part of next year and I hope that it will serve to provide additional political momentum for making the case for a global version of the IFF.

The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) made particular reference to the need to make progress on trade. That is absolutely right, but one outcome that would show that the international community recognised the serious situation of Africa is securing a positive outcome at the World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting in Hong Kong in December. It is true that, in the past 10 years, despite rapid growth in world trade, Africa's share of world trade has halved. We accept that more progress needs to be made on this issue. Studies have shown that, if we can achieve an ambitious outcome from the WTO talks, it will produce an annual global benefit of between $250 billion and $600 billion, lifting huge numbers of people out of poverty.

The framework agreement that was reached in August this year offers encouragement that a deal is possible next year. We shall use the opportunities of the G8 and the European Union presidency to make advances and build further political momentum to make the progress that we know is necessary.

Next year we hope to focus on improving the effectiveness of the aid effort, which can be hampered when donors do not work together in developing countries. We will be focusing on better harmonisation and co-ordination of the international aid effort. A high-level forum in Paris next March will provide another important opportunity to advance the case for and the practice of development assistance.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said, having the G8 presidency gives us the opportunity to renew the international commitment to making progress on two key issues: Africa and climate change. The G8 is required to report progress on Africa against the commitments in the Africa action plan in 2005. We will use that and the Commission for Africa report to identify gaps in international policy and push for future commitments, including actions to boost aid for Africa through debt relief and more resources elsewhere.

We believe strongly that more needs to be done on debt—I agree with the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire—because we need to ensure that no country is hindered by the burden of unsustainable debt, which we know is already experienced by many countries, in respect of making progress towards the millennium development goals.

As a number of hon. Members have said, the Government have been at the forefront of promoting further progress on debt relief. We continue to press for the full financing and implementation of the HIPC initiative, which is delivering real benefits to some of the world's poorest countries. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton mentioned a number of them, but a further example is perhaps worth bearing in mind—that of Ghana, which, because of the debt relief that it has secured, has been able to allocate more funding for health services, including exempting pregnant women from paying charges, and to generate more investment in schools, roads and water.

Some $70 billion of debt relief is being provided under the HIPC initiative to some 27 countries, helping to increase social expenditures by some $4 billion since 1999. We want more progress on the HIPC initiative, and I am sure that hon. Members will be pleased to know that it is being extended for two years to allow a further 10 countries, potentially, to benefit from it.

Mr. Williams: The hon. Gentleman makes the case for extending debt relief, but surely that depends on the success of the IFF. Indeed, the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) asked how many countries have gone beyond signing-up to the IFF by making the financial contributions required to achieve the outcomes.

Mr. Thomas: The two initiatives are separate but interconnected. We want more progress on debt relief and support for the IFF at the same time, so we continue to argue the case for the two to go hand in hand. The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington asked how many countries have signed up to support the IFF. A considerable number have done so and I am happy to write to the hon. Gentleman with the exact details of that.

We want to use the build-up to our presidencies of the G8 and the European Union to get additional countries from the G8, and other rich nations, to sign up to the IFF. That is why the GAVI pilot—the so-called mini-IFF—provides an opportunity to show how the IFF programme would work, operate on the ground and deliver the real, tangible benefits that all parties recognise it could deliver.

We want to go further on debt relief and we need to ensure that progress is made on multilateral debt relief. The IMF already has the resources to go beyond HIPC and cancel, through better use of its gold reserves, 100 per cent. of the debt owed to it by eligible low-income countries. We also want further debt relief from the World Bank and the African Development Bank. That will need to be funded through additional donor resources. We are committed to paying our share—just over 10 per cent.—of the multilateral debt service costs to those banks for those low-income countries that have strong public expenditure management systems in place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) asked how that additional relief will be funded. The comprehensive spending review, which included a large increase in aid assistance for DFID, earmarked some of that funding for making progress on debt relief as well as for traditional development assistance. We also agree that debt relief needs to be extended beyond the existing heavily indebted poor countries. The new United Kingdom initiative to which hon. Members alluded will help to pay our share of multilateral debt servicing for all low-income countries with sufficiently strong public expenditure management systems in place. We can then be sure that those resources will be used for poverty reduction.

My hon. Friend alluded to countries where there is conflict. He was right to say that they present the greatest challenge to making progress on the millennium development goals. We estimate that in countries where the policy environment is most challenging, there are more than 340 million poor people. We are seeking to bring donors together early next year to consider how to make more effective the development assistance that goes to those countries. Given the challenge of not always being able to work through Government assistance, perhaps because of corruption or conflict, we need to consider how we can be more effective in such policy environments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) spoke of the need for more ceasefire monitors, particularly in Sudan. He will be interested to know that the UK has funded African Union ceasefire monitors there. We committed some £2 million to that; we were the first donor to do so. I hope that my hon. Friend will be reassured to hear that an additional 3,000 ceasefire monitors are due to be deployed there shortly.

Mr. Reed: Clearly, the individuals in those countries that are in conflict, particularly Sudan, are in the worst situation—because of the conflict, because of corruption or even because of an inability to get aid through to them. What further steps does the Minister believe the Government should take, particularly in Sudan? I have received a number of e-mails from constituents on the subject—as must the Minister, in light of the "Panorama" programme—so how much further does he believe the Government can go to bring not only lasting peace, but the protection necessary to allow aid to get through to those who are most severely affected?

Mr. Thomas: We continue to put pressure on the parties in Sudan for an immediate ceasefire in order to respect the needs of those who have been displaced. We have already provided some £62.5 million of humanitarian relief, and the Prime Minister has committed us to doing more. We also seek to build the capacity of the African Union, so that it can better provide a response in places such as Sudan. Earlier this year, for the first time, it deployed troops under its banner in Burundi, helping to move things forward there.

I conclude by thanking the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire for this timely debate. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton challenged the Government to do more on international development, debt relief and the IFF. We accept the challenge. We have already shown leadership not only by launching the IFF, but by the substantial increase in assistance in the development budget and the lead that we have given in Europe on the need for more progress on trade. More needs to happen, and we on this side of the House continue to seek opportunities to build the political will and momentum to achieve just that.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): I am delighted to have secured this debate for two reasons: first, because I was prevented from taking part in the recent defence debates because of Standing Committee commitments, and, secondly, because this debate on the future of the infantry precedes tomorrow's debate on the Scottish regiments.

I have no doubt that emotions will run high, with the Black Watch at present in the eye of the storm in Iraq. However, the Black Watch is part of the British Army—it is not, as some have described it, part of a Scottish army—and I am sure that the Black Watch itself recognises that what is good for its future is good for all the single battalion regiments threatened with disbandment, merger or forced absorption into larger regiments. We should not be pitting regiment against regiment in the fight for survival. It is also particularly fitting to be discussing these matters just after Remembrance Sunday, when we remember the sacrifice of all our forces who fell in defence of the United Kingdom and to preserve our freedom as a nation state.

The Cheshire Regiment is the only infantry regiment that, in its long and distinguished history, has remained a discrete shire regiment, apart from the Green Howards, a local regiment that recruits from north Yorkshire and Teesside; I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) in his place. The Cheshires, together with many other regiments, took a terrible pounding during their recent tour of Iraq, just as they did in Bosnia. We should pay tribute to our British forces, which are the finest in the world. They are perhaps not always the best equipped, but they are certainly the best trained, and they are unique in having a regimental system, which ensures loyalty, stability and support, rather like a close-knit family.

When the Minister announced the future Army establishment figure of about 102,000 on 21 July, he did so in the knowledge that trained strength stood at 104,130, and that the increased target figure had been achieved over the previous three years. The Army Board is therefore recommending a cut in numbers not from trained strength, and the reduction of four shire and local infantry regiments will just involve moving personnel around.

To make the case that those redundant infantry personnel would move to other sectors of the Army—in particular, to logistics, engineers, intelligence and signals—is nonsense. The Army Board knows full well that infantry soldiers are a very different breed, and are not necessarily best suited to joining those corps. They do not have the appropriate qualifications, and neither are such moves actually necessary, because rapid improvement in recruitment to those corps in the past 18 months has nearly removed the shortfall—and, in the case of the Royal Corps of Signals, has achieved a 2.5 per cent. oversupply.

A year ago, the Minister of State, Ministry of Defence, stated in response to a written parliamentary question that > "there are currently no plans to disband or amalgamate Army infantry battalions".—[Official Report, 3 November 2003; Vol. 412, c. 433W.]

In March this year, the Army Board met the colonels for the first time. What happened in those four months to reverse the decision not to disband any single battalion regiment? We are told that the reason was the reduction of battalions in Northern Ireland and the ending of the arms plot. The future Army structure has its advantages, but the Army Board is being over-optimistic if it thinks that the present level of overstretch can be overcome and that normality can be brought back to intervals between roles as a result of what it is recommending.

Training, which is essential and keeps British troops at their very best, still has to be done after operational tours. It is a fact borne out by experience that when regiments have been amalgamated in the past, recruitment has deteriorated. On recruitment, I am awaiting a reply on whether any capping or restriction has taken place. Will the Secretary of State confirm whether the future Army structure relates to or is based on the proposed future rapid effect system formation?

The recent solution was to use the Territorial Army, from which personnel are disappearing fast; the TA is now some 12 per cent. under establishment. The Army Board does not appear to appreciate that the TA comprises, first and foremost, civilian volunteers. Neither they nor their employers will be a position to accept six-month tours of duty stretching to nine months. To state, as the Secretary of State did in a letter to me, that the TA knows what it has signed up to is arrogant. Those who say that TA members get paid should remember that their pay is about 40 per cent. of what a retained fireman receives.

Why do the cuts proposed by the Army Board fall entirely on four shire and local regiments? It is inconceivable that the executive committee of the Army Board has advised that three regiments should go out of two divisions. We know the pressure that the Army is under, yet the Army Board has deliberately pitted the Prince of Wales and King's Divisions against each other as to which will sustain the second cut. It is nothing less than a disgrace that senior command has put those in the front line under such extra pressure.

The Prince of Wales and King's Divisions also have 58 per cent. fewer Commonwealth personnel than the Queen's and Light Divisions. That is one of the criteria listed after recruiting levels. Why, therefore, are reductions not being proposed for the Queen's and Light Divisions, the Parachute Regiment, which has not been used in a paratroop role since the Suez crisis, or the Guards Division?

The shire and local regiments are ideal for peacekeeping and reconstruction work. Today's infantry has to switch rapidly from being an effective fighting force to becoming a policing and social force. The Americans in particular are finding out to their cost that they need such troops, and not just death-or-glory boys or those sitting 20 miles behind a supposed conventional front line surrounded by technology. The whole nation knows that the fight against terrorism and tyranny rests with the infantry, which is 24 per cent. of the trained strength of the Army.

The Prime Minister has pledged 12,500 troops to the European defence force, and 35 per cent. of them—the equivalent of seven battalions—are to be infantry troops. On the one hand, the Army Board recommends a cut in a certain sector of the infantry, while on the other, the Prime Minister guarantees a higher-than-ever commitment for that sector. The argument will be that the commitment rests on a case-by-case basis, but can one really see the Prime Minister saying to the European Union, "Sorry chaps, I cannot fulfil my obligations to you"? We can bet that the EU will find some beneficial crisis to bring about EU involvement and that those troops will be called up. Next month, under Operation Althea, the Grenadier Guards will be deployed to Bosnia and Herzegovina as part of an EU force.

The Ministry has made it very clear that those regimental cuts are not down to finance, so perhaps we had better look elsewhere. That is surprising when we see that General Sir Michael Jackson is quoted in today's paper as saying:

> "I would much prefer increasing the size of the Army but that's simply not on offer. I can either accept what's on offer—a reduced size of the Army—or go".

I have tabled three parliamentary questions on finance, but have not yet received a straight answer. Perhaps that is not surprising in the circumstances. General Jackson also said in an interview with Soldier magazine that > "the intent of the wider defence changes announced last month was to move towards the ability to dominate enemies by the so-called network enabling capabilities."

That is why four shire and local regiments are to go: manpower is to be replaced by technology that is not even yet available.

I say to the Secretary of State that there should be no cuts to those regiments until the technology is up, running and of proven capability. If General Jackson thinks that the future rapid effect system will be operational by 2010, I believe that he is much mistaken, as do many others. The recent House of Commons research paper on the defence White Paper "Future Capabilities" clearly points out the disaster areas: the Eurofighter, which was late and over budget; the Astute Class submarine; the Nimrod MR4A; and the Brimstone advanced air-launched anti-armour weapon. Neither should we overlook the Bowman communications system. What a gamble is being taken by throwing caution to the winds and thinking that technology will be delivered on time and on budget, while getting rid of what we know works.

Our forces are not conscripts; they are professional soldiers doing a brilliant job, often under terrible pressure. The Army Board, if the Secretary of State would like to listen, should take better care not to push them over the limit. This affects people's lives and is a very serious matter. However, one can see why General Jackson wants to strengthen the medium section of the Army to comply with the introduction of a rapid reaction force, which means airlift. He is planning a futuristic Army for 20 years down the line, but surely we must learn the lessons of Iraq and Falluja, where technology has played its part, but where street fighting in urban warfare is done by low-tech tanks and infantry. We are no longer fighting conventional wars. The enemy is all around us, dressed in civilian clothes. High technology can of course work in the right situation, but a boy herding goats who has a $20 grenade launcher can take out a multi-million pound piece of high-tech equipment without much difficulty.

The final decision rests with the Secretary of State, and the future of the British infantry rides on his shoulders. It is his head and that of the Government as a whole that will be on the block, and not that of the Army Board. We all know that we live in dangerous times and that British security is under continuing threat. The Government should act responsibly and show caution. In no circumstances should they introduce cuts to existing units until the war on terrorism has been won.

The answer is not to destroy the culture, values, tradition and loyalty of the smaller regiments. Experience has already taught us that larger regiments do not retain the same levels of recruitment. I look forward to meeting the Secretary of State later this afternoon with other colleagues from Cheshire. We will seek to impress on him our conviction that what works and works well should not be destroyed, and that it can never be replaced by unproven future technology.

I trust that common sense will prevail in the end and that the British infantry will not be emasculated in the way that is proposed.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) on securing this debate, and I thank her for allowing me a few moments to raise the concerns of several Yorkshire Members, including the hon. Member for Calder Valley (Chris McCafferty), about the future of our three Yorkshire regiments—the Duke of Wellington's, the Prince of Wales and the Green Howards, which is one of the oldest regiments in Britain and the one thought to be most at risk in Yorkshire. The Green Howards have recently returned from Afghanistan and served with such distinction that one of their number, Captain Pledger, received a very rare commendation from the commander of the multinational brigade.

If we are to win the hearts and minds of the local population in Afghanistan and defeat terrorism, that is exactly the kind of peacekeeping work that is so sorely needed, and it is what makes the British Army the envy of the world. The support of the local community is what helps to make the difference. In our service of remembrance at Old Malton priory on Sunday, the standard of the Green Howards Association stood proudly, as it has done for generations.

The Army proposed to cut four single battalion regiments. Thus far, I understand that the Army Board has identified a regiment each from the Prince of Wales Division, the King's Division and the Scottish Division, but is having difficulty identifying the fourth regiment. The outcry from Scotland, which will be debated here tomorrow, is obviously aimed at preventing any cut in Scotland, yet if the cuts were shared fairly, there would be two cuts in Scotland and only two in England. It would be completely unacceptable for all the cuts to fall on the English divisions. The Scottish regiments do not have a monopoly on regimental history, traditions and local ties, and the manning criteria set by the Army indicate that Scotland would be very fortunate to escape with one cut if the cuts go ahead.

The King's Division of northern England regiments has already agreed to accept one cut, as the Secretary of State knows, which is likely to fall west of the Pennines.

A second cut against the King's Division would be grossly disproportionate and very wasteful of highly trained infantrymen, and it would lead to undermanning and redundancies.

The Yorkshire regiments are being very positive and constructive in looking to the future by campaigning for a Yorkshire regiment of three battalions and one Territorial Army battalion. I suggest to the Secretary of State that that could be a real success story. This is a highly dangerous time to be cutting infantry battalions at all. The Northern Ireland peace dividend and the ending of arms plotting will not free up as many battalions as was first thought, given present and future operational commitments to which my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton referred.

If there are to be cuts, the Army Board should stick with the three cuts that it has identified and forget about the fourth.

On resuming—

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): I thank the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) for introducing this debate on the future of the infantry. I look forward to explaining once again why we are doing what we are doing and I welcome this opportunity to address some concerns that have been raised about the future size and structure of the Army.

The reasons behind the need to modernise the Army have been well rehearsed previously. Hon. Members will be familiar with our analysis of the changing strategic environment and the new challenges that it represents. We set those out in our December 2003 White Paper and our July 2004 announcement. It is clear both that no organisation can stand still and that the Army is no different. It must evolve and adapt to future challenges as our world changes. Only by doing so will the Army maintain its ability to tackle whatever task it is faced with and continue to achieve the operational success that is the hallmark of Britain's armed forces.

The changes planned for the infantry are part of that evolution. There are two key factors driving our plans. The first is the conclusion by the Army Board that the infantry arms plot no longer represents the best way to deliver operational capability. The decision to end the arms plot demanded restructuring the infantry to sustain the strength of the regimental system. The second factor is the progress towards lasting peace in Northern Ireland and the consequent flexibility to reassign units committed to supporting the Police Service of Northern Ireland, allowing a reduction in the number of infantry battalions.

That change provided the opportunity to transfer resources to strengthen other parts of the Army and concentrate on those capabilities that can best deliver the effect that we require. The decrease in the support needed by the PSNI led us to conclude that the future requirement for infantry battalions would decrease from 40 to 36. Given that making those reductions would free up some 2,500 posts, this offered an opportunity to reinvest the posts to deliver the robust and resilient organisation that we need to meet the challenges of the future.

Let me make it clear that the driver behind the exercise is not financial. In the last spending review, the Government announced an extra £3.7 billion for defence. The exercise reflects the need to ensure that the Army of the future is properly configured to meet the priorities and challenges of the future, rather than of the past. Some 550 of the posts freed up will be reinvested in the remaining infantry battalions to develop more robust and resilient units. The rest will go towards strengthening high-demand trades that are crucial to a sustainable expeditionary capability, such as intelligence, signallers, engineers, logistics—in other words, those areas under still greater pressure as highlighted by our recent operational experience.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): The Secretary of State will be aware that I commanded his, mine and others' local regiment, the Worcestershire and Sherwood Foresters, when we were a Warrior battalion in Tidworth. We were there for nearly six years, which, at the time, was an unusually long tour. We pretty well negated the effects of the arms plot. My battalion was reinforced by the Cheshire Regiment, the Staffordshire Regiment and regiments across the Prince of Wales Division. I am told that it worked well. We were not a super-regiment; we kept our identity. If it ain't broke, why fix it?

Mr. Hoon: Because it is not working as we would like. The problem with the hon. Gentleman's illustration is that trickle posting certain positions in that way puts extra pressure on the battalions from which those people have come. We have experienced that cascading difficulty for some time.

Furthermore, the proposed reform is simply the continuation of changes that have been brought forward by previous Army Boards and Governments. Half the Army was organised on one basis while the other half was organised on an entirely different basis. In a sense, that is unfinished business for the Army and it really is time that it was completed.

Ann Winterton: The Secretary of State has made a fairly lame excuse. The Government have been in power for seven years and they can do more or less what they like. Frankly, the situation in the world has changed during those seven years and we are now having to deal with terrorism. As I am intervening, will he also confirm whether the future Army structure will be based on the future rapid effect system?

Mr. Hoon: I shall deal with that matter in due course. I gave way to the hon. Lady on the basis that she was about to address the point I was making. My argument is clear: we cannot continue indefinitely with two different structures for our Army—different structures that previous Governments anticipated would change and failed to carry through. This is the Army finishing that business.

I want to make progress. I challenge any hon. Member to say that, given the reduction in the commitment to Northern Ireland—which is real—we should simply put those four saved infantry battalions into the regular order of battle inadequately supported by the enabling trades, rather than look at where the pressures are in the Army today. If Opposition Members really had genuine concern about our armed forces, they would be saying, "Secretary of State, you should be helping those parts of the Army that are most under pressure." I am not suggesting that infantry battalions are not under pressure, but they are not as much under pressure in the context of tour cycles, tour intervals and leave at home with families as precisely those whom we intend to augment. Unless and until Opposition Members can deal with that issue, all they are doing is making cheap points for the benefit of their local newspapers.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): Until now, I thought that the Secretary of State had been reasonable. However, most informed members of the defence community have seen a credibility gap in that infantry battalions are being disbanded to free up posts for intelligence logisticians. As a result, members of the Black Watch, whoever they are, will be transferred to be logisticians or signallers. No one doubts the fact that there is a requirement for such people, but as General Jackson said in The Sun today, the problem is that he would like a larger Army. That is his premise.

Mr. Hoon: I shall deal with that issue in due course.

Bringing to an end the infantry arms plot will ensure that we have far more military capability from our resources. Again, I invite hon. Members to consider the issue carefully. If their complaint is that there is far too much pressure on infantry battalions, what we are doing will relieve that pressure significantly. I shall explain why: for several decades we have moved infantry battalions from role to role and place to place every few years. That action maintained broad experience and variety, but it also hampered the availability of infantry battalions. Times have changed and the Army Board has rightly taken the view that the diminution of our capability through the arms plot is impractical and inefficient.

Some hon. Members will be familiar with the detail, but let me restate it. Of the 40 battalions in the order of battle, seven or eight are unavailable at any one time because they are moving or re-roling. I have heard no objections from Opposition Members to that. Let me give some recent examples. In March, the highlanders moved to Germany to begin their armoured infantry training, which meant that they were unavailable for some seven months. In September 2003, the Scots Guards began its conversion and was similarly unavailable for six months. In terms of physical disruption, our local regiment, the Worcestershire and Sherwood Foresters, to which the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) kindly referred and which is serving in Afghanistan, where I visited it last week, will shortly move from Chester to Hounslow. Neither place is particularly near Worcestershire, Nottinghamshire or Derbyshire, where most of the men were recruited.

Patrick Mercer: I am again grateful to the Secretary of State for allowing me to intervene. None of us, particularly those who have suffered at the hands of the nonsense that is the arms plot in today's Army, would argue with him. However, the fact remains—I think he is being a little disingenuous—in respect of this being unfinished business. It is not half the infantry that has been reorganised; it is a third. We went through this process in the 1960s and it failed. The Cheshires, the Staffords, the Sherwood Foresters and the Worcestershire Regiment were to be grouped, believe it or not, as the Mercian brigade. The same tired idea is being resurrected. That organisation was known in the Army as "the Mexicans". I promise him that it is not a good idea to reintroduce it—if it ain't broke, don't fix it.

Mr. Hoon: I had a long conversation with the commanding officer of the Worcestershire and Sherwood Foresters last week and I gently reminded him of what happened in 1970, when people from the Sherwood Foresters—perhaps the hon. Gentleman was among them—said that it would be impossible for people from Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire and the Sherwood Foresters ever to work satisfactorily with the Worcestershires. Now, there is a campaign to preserve that merged identity. I find that slightly ironic in the circumstances.

I want to stress to hon. Members another effect of frequent changes of location. They are massively disruptive to the family life of members of our armed forces. That is such an issue in terms of retention that we have to address it. Because of changes in society, family stability has become much more of an issue. Ending the arms plot will mean that the Army is able to offer much greater stability for soldiers and their families.

Those significant benefits are powerful arguments for change and they explain why those serving in the Army overwhelmingly welcome our proposals. I recognise that there is a concern about our armed forces on the other side of the House and among all hon. Members who have contributed to the debate. However, that concern must not simply be historic, relating to regimental names and titles. Those who genuinely believe that the arms plot must come to an end have also to follow through the logic of how to achieve that.

The hon. Member for Newark has made one suggestion, and I will reflect on it. However, the reality is that the Army believes that the best way to deal with an end to the arms plot is restructuring of the kind that has been outlined. Therefore it is important—

Patrick Mercer: What about the Guards?

Mr. Hoon: We can deal with the Guards in due course, as part of the process. I do not suggest that the logic does not apply equally in that case. In future, battalions will be fixed by role and largely by location. That will release resources routinely tied up in moving location or retraining so that they can, instead, be used on operations. As a result, the Army will be more capable and more effective because—to answer one of specific points raised by the hon. Member for Newark—more battalions will be available for operations and because the new structure will provide continuity of expertise in role and greater brigade coherence, which is dissipated by the arms plot.

That increase in available battalions is over and above the increases resulting from the reduced commitment to Northern Ireland. We will be better off in terms of operational availability. It will be possible for the career development of officers and senior non-commissioned officers to be much more carefully planned. At the moment, it depends partly on what role a battalion has at any given time.

To make that work, however, individuals will need to move between battalions for career development and increased breadth of experience. In the interests of preserving the regimental system and the value that it brings, we need a future infantry structure based on larger regiments of two or more battalions. I emphasise that that is not a new concept. Nearly half the infantry is already organised in that way and it operates extremely effectively. Multi-battalion regiments will allow individuals to move around for personal development while a sense of regimental identity is also maintained. That way, it will be possible to deliver the advantages of ending the arms plot in terms of operational effectiveness and family stability while preserving the benefits and traditions of our regimental system.

All the divisions of infantry have been tasked to consider how they can best model themselves to take full advantage of ending the arms plot, taking account of the need to reduce by four battalions in total. Their recommendations will be put to the executive committee of the Army Board. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made clear, no decisions have been made, and it is important that the Army is given the opportunity to determine the structure that will best deliver the operational effectiveness we need.

In due course, the Army Board will make recommendations about the future organisation of the infantry. They will be presented to Ministers for final approval, and I expect to announce the outcome before the Christmas recess.

Mr. Simpson: I am grateful to the Secretary of State, who is being very generous in giving way. A few minutes ago, in the context of the reorganisation of the Army, he gave the impression that the restructuring will affect the Household Division. Can he say in what way?

Mr. Hoon: It is important that there is consistency. Part of the argument that I made to the hon. Member for Newark is that we cannot go on with two different structures. Therefore, we need to look at the implications of this for all elements in the Army. No one will be immune; this applies equally well across the board.

Given the emphasis that is placed on history, the point needs to be made that very few of our regiments or corps exist today in the same form as they existed in the relatively recent past. Since 1958, 54 infantry regiments have been subject to amalgamation, 21 of them since "Options for Change" was published in 1990. I have mentioned the amalgamation of the Worcestershire Regiment and the Sherwood Foresters. At the time, that was strongly resisted in the east midlands, but it has produced a strong regiment that works extremely effectively, notwithstanding the fact that there are still people in the east midlands who want to return to having a Sherwood Foresters Regiment. Such is the case in many parts of the country, but it is important that we deal with the reality of operations today and the threats we will face in the future.

There has been a constant process of change and regeneration in which new organisations have been created that have fostered previous military renown while developing their own traditions and reputations to engender loyalty and camaraderie. Many of today's excellent large infantry regiments are perfect illustrations of that process. I have no doubt that the new structure to be recommended for the infantry will not only seek to retain existing geographical linkages, but in due course enhance them. With soldiers and their families at last having a chance of greater stability, the result can only give even greater identity between regiments and their local communities. Given the support that regiments can depend on, that can only be good for all of us. It is important that Members think about the future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Time is up.

Renewable Energy

4.13 pm

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): It is a pleasure to speak before you this afternoon, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to have my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary listening to me. I am also glad to have the opportunity to discuss the important issue of fiscal matters relating to renewable energy.

The Government have made clear their strong commitment to reducing emissions from carbon fuels. They have made it equally clear that their chosen vehicle for encouraging the development of renewable energy is the renewables obligation. Earlier this year, they announced a review of that obligation, which we are approximately two years into, and set out their terms of reference for the review in a helpful fashion.

I want to state at the outset that nothing that I say today is intended to challenge the future existence of the renewables obligation, and that the suggestions that I proffer humbly to my hon. Friend are made to encourage an adjustment within the obligation to bring about what I hope will be greater diversity in the means of providing renewable energy in the UK.

The renewables obligation seeks to ensure that 10 per cent. of our electricity is produced from renewable sources by 2010. It is fair to say that progress is being made. According to the DTI's digest of UK energy statistics, during the year to 31 March 2004, 3.3 per cent. of UK energy was attributable to renewable sources. However, the target is a challenging one, and the issues are important.

I attended a meeting in Wrexham with my constituents and Welsh Water, one of the local water companies, to discuss three 100-year record flooding events that had happened in the past five years. Pressing problems have been caused in local communities—problems that accepted science now recognises to be attributable to global warming. Our task to extend renewable energy production is an important answer to the challenges posed by global warming.

Progress in the UK is overwhelmingly in the sphere of wind power, both offshore and onshore. I welcome that development; I have always been a strong supporter of wind power. There is little doubt, however, that the development of wind as a source of renewable energy increasingly encounters opposition. The Campaign for the Protection of Rural Wales has a particularly negative attitude to onshore wind power in particular. Even offshore wind power is causing a great deal of controversy, and there was recently particular difficulty with a proposed wind farm in south Wales. Wind is becoming an increasingly controversial renewable energy source, and the renewables obligation needs to be refined to allow other forms of renewable energy to prosper.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): On wind and the possibility of using wind turbines, does my hon. Friend agree that it is important not only that we produce renewables through wind turbines, but that British industry succeeds in providing those turbines? Is he aware that DeWind in my constituency has now pulled out of the wind turbine market because it is unable to secure contracts in the UK and abroad? The big players are squeezing some of the new companies out. Does he agree that the fiscal measures introduced by the Government need to assist British firms, make use of the growth in renewables and benefit local economies, such as my own in Loughborough?

Ian Lucas: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. In fact, he touches on issues that I hope to return to later. It is important that we see the development of renewable energy as an important energy and manufacturing industry for the future. I hope that the company in his constituency will be part of that.

Diversity in renewable energy supply will help the wind industries to which I have referred. If there were slightly fewer applications for wind farms and more applications for the development of renewable energy in other fields, I suspect that the pressure imposed on wind farms, and the opposition to them, some of which is pretty cynical, would be lessened.

To touch on the remarks that my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) has just made, the renewable energy industry in the United Kingdom is waiting to happen. It is primed, and companies are willing to enter the renewable energy market. They are simply waiting for the right incentives and indications from the Government. At this stage, it would be helpful for me to make it clear that I was delighted that the Sharp Manufacturing Company of Japan opened its European manufacturing base for photovoltaic cells in Wrexham earlier this year.

Sharp has been in Wrexham for more than 20 years now, and in the past it has been involved in the production of microwave ovens and video recorders. Video recorders are now a passing industry, and it was essential that a new product be brought to Wrexham for the plant to prosper. The decision to situate photovoltaic cell manufacturing in Wrexham is a testament to the excellent work force in the town, the superb relations with the local trade union, Amicus, and the excellent stewardship of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his marvellous team at the Treasury, which includes my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary. The decision cannot really have been taken because of the photovoltaic cell market in the UK, because, unfortunately, it is extremely small at the present time.

For Wrexham, the prime market for European PV cells is Germany. Most of the units that are currently produced in Wrexham are exported there. The 100,000 roofs programme in Germany has been a phenomenal success. Capacity in photovoltaic electricity increased from 40 MW in 1997 to 400 MW by 2003. In 2003, there was 50 per cent. market growth in Germany. It is worth while to examine the instruments used by the Germans in achieving their success. The German Government concentrated on revenue rather than capital support, and I think that that is one of the major distinctions with regard to the approach that is being pursued in Britain. They specified a fixed long-term price for electricity produced from PV cells. The price was higher for photovoltaics than for some other renewable sources, but it brought certainty to the market for PV manufacturers. German Government advisers emphasised in conversations with me that it was the certainty that fuelled the successes of the programme. The necessary private investment was further encouraged by fixed interest, long-term loans for consumers.

As I mentioned, the approach to support for photovoltaics in Britain has been quite different. The Government have supported the industry by the use of capital grants and initiatives ranging from the domestic solar PV systems field trial in May 2000 through to the major photovoltaics demonstration programme. Unfortunately, the effect to date has been limited. As Keith Howarth points out in his useful article "The poor man of photovoltaics" in the Autumn 2003 edition of Building for a Future, PV in the UK just seems to be too expensive, and it takes 70 years to recover present installation costs. That contrasts markedly with the situation in Germany, where revenue support, combined with cheaper installation costs, gives payback within 17 years.

How can we achieve greater diversity in our renewables supply? I have seen the terms of reference of the review of the renewables obligation, and I have noted that, despite the fact that the obligation is itself an instrument that interferes with the operation of the free market, there is a marked reluctance to interfere further with the renewables market. Both fixed price tariffs and feed-in mechanisms are rejected. I am pleased, however, that the Government have recognised in the terms of reference the importance of developing longer-term technologies and have left the door open on providing revenue support for them.

To date, I do not think that we in the UK have recognised the potential that exists for industry here in the renewables field. In north Wales, we are at the forefront of those developments. The North Hoyle wind project off the Rhyl coast is already producing energy, and phase two of the project will introduce a step change in the scale of production. St. Asaph business park has the largest single solar cell power source in the UK and Sharp in Wrexham is expanding rapidly. Last week, I was delighted that a call from the company for 60 extra employees by Christmas appeared on the front page of my local newspaper; its solar cell production is increasing so rapidly that it is taking on that number of jobs in the local economy.

At present, the demand comes from abroad. We have much to learn from the German experience. Even with the current difficulties in the German economy, 3,000 people are employed in the German photovoltaic manufacturing industry. The potential in the UK is huge. The Deputy Prime Minister has announced his intention to build a large number of new homes in the south-east. For example, up to 170,000 homes are to be built in the Milton Keynes and south midlands area in the coming few years. In my constituency, there is increasing pressure for new housing in the public, housing association and private sectors.

Let us imagine for a moment what would happen if PV cells became as standard as double glazing. First, a new form of renewable energy would have become a significant player in the UK. Secondly, householders could supply their own energy to the grid, easing problems of security of supply. Thirdly, a manufacturing industry with thousands of high-quality jobs could be created.

In Wrexham, we have experienced just an indication of what can be achieved by new investment from abroad in a market that is developing. The company has decided to enter the European market and is expanding rapidly, in both Germany and Spain, because of the action that has been taken by the Governments in those areas. I urge the Treasury to consider the types of incentives that have been provided in those countries. There is a thirst for new manufacturing industry in my constituency, and I think that that could be responded to by developing the industry in question.

I am sure that a way can be found, compatible with the renewables obligation, to encourage a more diverse renewables base in the UK. I know that the Renewable Power Association will forward its ideas when the review is considered. It is fortunate that a Treasury Minister is responding to the debate, because the Treasury will play an important role in decisions about the development of renewable energy in the years to come.

The 2010 target is a very challenging one. All parties recognise that that is the case, and much work needs to be done in the coming five years. The prize could be to tackle our renewable energy problems, approach solutions to our climate change challenges and create a new manufacturing industry. That is a prize that is well worth striving for.

4.27 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) on securing the debate. I have known him since he was elected to the House, and he has always been articulate on the challenges of global warming, as his speech made clear. I have also seen how strong an advocate he is of the interests of his constituency and the companies there. I may return to the points that he made about the developments at Sharp PV.

My hon. Friend made it clear that his principal concern is for a greater diversity of sources of renewable energy in the UK. He set out a clear and practical long-term vision of PV cells being as commonplace as double glazing. The context of the debate is important. The policy developments and reviews that he mentioned are taking place in the context of the energy White Paper that the Government published in February 2003. Underlying everything that we are doing and may consider doing are the four principal objectives that were set out in that White Paper.

The four goals of our overarching energy policy are, first, to set ourselves on a path to cutting the UK's carbon dioxide emissions by 60 per cent. by 2050; secondly, to maintain, at the same time, the reliability of our energy supplies; thirdly, to promote competitive markets in the UK and beyond—which perhaps distinguishes us from Germany—and thereby to help to raise the sustainable energy growth rate and improve the UK economy's productivity; and, fourthly, to ensure that every home is adequately and affordably heated.

In general terms, the effective way for the UK to achieve those goals is to conserve our existing energy resources and use them better. My hon. Friend has argued persuasively for improving energy efficiency and increasing the use of alternative energy sources such as renewables; those have been identified as important ways of doing that. That is why the Government have set targets for energy efficiency and the use of renewable energy.

[John Healey]

The energy White Paper reiterated the aim that we set out first in January 2000 for renewables to supply 10 per cent. of UK electricity by 2010, subject, of course, to those costs proving acceptable to the consumer. Our aspiration is to double the renewables share of electricity by 2020 from that 2010 target. We have introduced a comprehensive set of measures to pursue those targets and secure those general energy policy aims.

Although my hon. Friend's debate is about fiscal measures, they are only one part of the strategy. It seems from his speech that he is more interested in non-fiscal measures, particularly the renewables obligation. Fiscal measures that we have taken include the introduction of the climate change levy, with exemptions for renewable generation; the introduction of reduced rates of VAT, which benefit renewable sources such as ground-source heat pumps and micro-CHP systems; backing biofuels through the fiscal system; and the introduction of the world's first emissions-trading scheme.

If we look beyond all the fiscal measures, however, we can see that we have also taken several steps to promote energy efficiency and the use of renewable energy. Principal among those for renewables is the renewables obligation. However, I think that my hon. Friend is aware that, alongside that obligation, the Government are funding further research and development, as set out in the spending review published by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in July.

The renewables obligation is the main non-fiscal instrument by which we are encouraging renewable energy. It requires all licensed electricity suppliers to supply a specific proportion of their electricity from certified renewable sources. As my hon. Friend knows, that obligation increases steadily from 3 per cent. of sales in 2002–03 to 10.4 per cent. in 2010–11. Late last year, that obligation was extended to 15.4 per cent. by 2015–16 to give potential investors, whom he is concerned should be encouraged, greater certainty with which to plan returns in respect of business investments of the sort that we want to encourage them to make over the next few years. With the climate change exemption, those two mechanisms are expected to provide about £1 billion of support to renewable energy by 2010.

Early indications are that the renewables obligation is working well, with investor confidence growing. In 2003, 2.2 per cent. of electricity was supplied by sources that are eligible under the renewables obligation. We expect that by 2010, wind source will provide 7 to 8 per cent. of electricity, half of which will be from onshore sources with the rest coming from large-scale hydro and landfill gases.

Mr. Reed: Will my hon. Friend give way?

John Healey: I was about to come to a powerful point that my hon. Friend made in an intervention about his keenness for British business to win a share in the growing and increasingly important market in green technologies and green generation. I will ensure that my colleagues in the DTI are aware of his point, as I know that it forms part of their concerns.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham is right to say that we will shortly begin a review of the renewables obligation. In the original White Paper, we committed ourselves to reviewing it in 2005–06 and to taking account of the carbon prices anticipated under the new EU emissions trading scheme, as well as the emerging costs of renewable technologies. The DTI, not the Treasury, is leading the review and aims to complete it by December 2005, with a view, potentially, to introducing any changes to the obligation around the beginning of April 2006.

A central consideration of the review will be to ensure the delivery of the 2010 target, while maximising value for money for consumers. My hon. Friend rightly said that the terms of reference were published on 4 November, following the publication of draft terms of reference in the summer.

From the 90-odd submissions that were received by the DTI when it published the draft terms of reference, it was clear that there was strong support for a limited review on how to improve the effectiveness of the renewables obligation while avoiding changes to the main operating principles of the scheme. The final terms of reference reflect that. The key areas for the review to examine are the effectiveness of the renewables obligation since it began in April 2002; all aspects of the working arrangements for the renewables obligation; the potential impact of the EU emissions trading scheme on carbon; the prices and future cost competitiveness of renewable technologies; and the extent of the obligation beyond 2015–16—the longer term that my hon. Friend is concerned about.

I shall ensure that my hon. Friend's points are brought to the attention of DTI Ministers as part of the consultation. They and I look forward to receiving the submission from the Renewable Power Association, which he mentioned. I am sure that that will contribute to the consultation.

It is clear that there is widespread support in the renewables industry for a technology-neutral renewables obligation that rewards low-cost technologies, coupled with wider support for the longer-term technologies. In the Chancellor's spending review settlement in July, he allocated to the DTI £60 million in each year up to 2007–08 to deliver projects identified under the renewables innovation review, bringing to over £500 million the support between 2002 and 2008 for longer-term renewable technologies.

In addition, £20 million has been allocated in each year of the spending review for 2004 onwards for future energy research and development. That will allow the DTI to fund fuel cells, cleaner fossil fuels, carbon dioxide capture and storage, and hydrogen research. The money has gone into the DTI technology strategy fund.

Turning to solar and photovoltaics, in 2001 the Government made a commitment to embark on a major initiative with the industry and others to achieve a UK solar photovoltaic cell programme, in line with those of our major competitors. That was the start of the Government's provision of significant funding for photovoltaics. The initiative consists of three separate programmes—domestic and large-scale field trials, to which £10 million has been committed; a major photovoltaics demonstration programme, for which the commitment was increased in September to £31 million; and support for PV research and development, through the DTI and the Engineering and Physical Sciences

Research Council. The additional £6 million that was added to the major PV demonstration programme in September will allow the DTI to run the programme for a further year, until March 2006. That will support the market until decisions on the future funding of PV are taken.

In that context, my hon. Friend mentioned Sharp. I was aware that Sharp had been in Wrexham for at least two decades, but I was delighted to learn that it had, within the past year, chosen Wrexham as the base for its European PV manufacture. It is new to the UK market in that field, but not to the UK. As he said, it is likely to sell much of what it manufactures in the PV field to Germany rather than to the UK domestic market, which is still in its infancy.

On the major PV demonstration programme that I mentioned, Sharp is already involved. It is aware of that programme and my hon. Friend might like to know that it is involved both in stream 1—the small scheme for householder applications in which, I think, 57 of the householders who successfully applied used Sharp to supply their installations—and in the larger community building schemes of stream 2. Its contribution to that programme is second only to that of BP Solar.

Although photovoltaics is unlikely to make a significant contribution to the target of 10 per cent. of our UK electricity being provided from renewable sources by 2010—we may argue about the contribution that the technology might make towards our 2020 targets—it is clear that its potential contribution to UK electricity supplies in the long term will be significant. It also has the potential to make a significant contribution to our exports.

The Government are considering the next steps for photovoltaics funding. In that respect, the debate is rather timely. The Government, and principally the DTI, are considering those questions in the context of the spending review settlement and the renewables innovation review. That review proposes a technology-blind capital grants programme, under which renewable features are integrated in the fabric of buildings alongside energy efficiency technologies. Support for building-integrated PV would be an important part of such a programme.

The Government first set out their climate change policies in 2000. The programme made provision for the review to commence in 2004. That review has now started. Since the publication of the first climate change programme, Government policy on tackling the climate change challenge has moved on substantially. The review of the climate change programme provides an opportunity to examine all our policy measures and to value the most cost-effective ways of meeting our climate change objectives. It will be an opportunity also to ensure that our domestic actions are in line with, and in many cases in advance of, what is being achieved internationally—

It being seventeen minutes to Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 17 November 2004

[MR. JOHN MCWILLIAM in the Chair]

Scottish Regiments

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watson.]

9.30 am

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): Here we are again, Mr. Deputy Speaker, back in Westminster Hall with Scottish regiments on the agenda. I wish I could say that it was a pleasure to be here, but given the confusion surrounding the fate of the Scottish regiments, I cannot be that generous. It is the same venue and the same plot—perhaps I should say the same arms plot—but with a slightly different cast. In place of the Secretary of State we have the Minister of State, Ministry of Defence, the Armed Forces Minister, who I am sure will respond to the debate in his usual congenial, consensual and constructive manner.

Before going any further, on behalf of my colleagues I extend sympathy and condolences to the family of Private Paul Lowe, whose funeral will take place today. That follows the funeral yesterday of Scott McCardle and precedes the funeral of Sergeant Stuart Gray. Those three brave young men lost their lives in the deserts of Iraq. I have come to know the Black Watch pretty well during the past few months. It is more than a regiment: it is a community, and I am sure that it will offer all necessary support and comfort to those bereaved families.

This is our last opportunity to debate the fate of our regiments before the Army Board or the Government meet to decide their fate. It is the last chance that hon. Members will have to put their case for the retention of the regiments. We debated the subject two months ago, so it is worth looking to see whether any real progress has been made. I have considered what has gone on during the past couple of months, listened to some of the debates and read some of the press comments, but I do not know. Are we any clearer about the Government's intentions about the future of the Scottish regiments? Most important, are we any closer to reassuring the many constituents that we represent that the Scottish regiments, to which they have such an attachment, are any closer to being saved?

The campaign to save our regiments goes on; it has started to grow in strength. Indeed, it has been encouraged during the past couple of weeks because the Government have started to buckle under its pressure. That makes me wonder why the campaign to save our regiments has been so passionate and vocal. The campaign has galvanised communities and has touched every part of Scotland. Every newspaper in Scotland is running a campaign to save the Scottish regiments—and last week, some prematurely claimed credit for saving them.

What is it that people like about the regiments? It might be tradition. People like the fact that the regiments have a past, especially the distinguished and illustrious past of our regiments. It might be that our regiments enjoy fantastic community links—the fact that father, grandfather and son may all have served in the same regiment. It might be that, historically, our regiments have performed an almost unimaginably dangerous task on behalf of us all. I am sure that many shared that sentiment at the Remembrance services on Sunday.

All that might be true, but the campaign to save the Scottish regiments has an extra potency and bite in Scotland. I do not want to talk about the war in Iraq. I do not want to talk about the deployment of the Black Watch in the American sector. However, we must all recognise—I choose my words carefully—that in Scotland the war in Iraq is at best controversial. We can at least say that there was unease about the deployment of the Black Watch in the American sector. It is in that context that the campaign to save the Scottish regiments takes place.

The thing that the Scottish people singularly cannot understand is that, while those regiments and those brave young men are out there doing the Government's bidding in Iraq, the Government plan to stab them in the back by amalgamating the regiments out of existence. That is a heady brew, and it is particularly unpalatable in Scotland. That is why the campaign is gaining strength. That is also why the Government's attempt to spin and brief their way out of the situation completely backfired last week.

Yesterday, we heard that the Black Watch may be coming home in advance of the expected date of 3 December. There was even talk of the regiment arriving home in the next few days. Let us hope so; if one group of people deserves to come home before the end of the mission, it is the brave young men who are fighting in the desert. If they remain in the desert, we will at least know that the decision is political. General Walker was quite clear about that yesterday. He said that the decision to keep British troops deployed in Iraq

> "would be a political decision and militarily irresponsible."

So, we now know that if the Black Watch does not get home in the next couple of weeks, the decision will have been political. Will the Minister confirm that there is a view to having these brave young men home ahead of schedule?

That brings us to the politics of what is going on. Just for a moment last week, the Government seemed as if they were prepared to consider the issue seriously and perhaps to offer a few concessions to those of us who care very much about the future of our Scottish regiments. However, that moment disappeared almost as quickly as it had appeared. I am sure that I am not alone in seeing last Tuesday's spinning, briefing and counter-briefing exercise as bordering on appalling. To brief and spin about the future of our Scottish regiments when they stand in the line of fire was a particularly cynical act.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Joyce) scuttled backwards and forwards to Millbank, briefing anybody who was prepared to listen that the Prime Minister and No. 10 were going to get involved, but that was as duplicitous as it was thoroughly wrong. We know how determinedly on message the hon. Gentleman is, and it is unfortunate that he is not here, but as you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I had a conversation with him yesterday and I said that I would mention his activities. The hon. Gentleman would not get out of bed for a scuttle without the full tacit acknowledgement and endorsement of No. 10. So, we have to ask why he was put up to it or, if he was not put up to it, why he did it. Finally, why was he left hanging out to dry?

To the hon. Gentleman's credit, however, he did a fantastic job. I am not praising the things that he did, but he managed to get on the front pages of all the newspapers. The headline in the Daily Record is "Saved"; in The Herald, it was "Blair signals fresh hope for campaign to save regiments"; and in The Scotsman it was "Blair orders MoD to 'save the regiments'". It was a fantastic exercise, and it was a real credit to the hon. Gentleman that he did such a fantastic job—the only problem is that the regiments were not saved. The Prime Minister decided that this was not a matter for the Government—it was a case of "Nothing to do with me, guv." He actually thought that we would swallow that and that the fate of the British infantry had nothing to do with the British Prime Minister. That has to be the biggest pyramid of piffle since the time of the ancient Egyptians.

If that is what the Prime Minister thinks, he should perhaps have told his Defence Secretary, who appeared on "Jonathan Dimbleby" on Sunday, saying that he hoped that the Black Watch might get something out of the changes; he thought that it might be able to preserve its name. Of course, he said that it was a matter for the Army Board, but his ambition was that the Black Watch would get something out of the review. So, we have the Prime Minister saying, "It's nothing to do with me, guv", the Defence Secretary saying, "We've got some ambitions for the Black Watch beyond this change", and the Army Board seemingly left to make the decision. The problem is that the restructuring of our infantry has everything to do with the Government, because they set the parameters for the review, said that four battalions had to go and made the final decision about the fate of the Scottish regiments.

The Minister is a member of the Army Board, as is the Secretary of State. Do they just sit in silence when the board deliberates? They could put the case for the Scottish regiments if they were that way inclined, but no—the only case that we have heard them put in the past few months is the case for amalgamations and disbandment.

Speaking of the Army Board, I come to our good friend General Sir Michael Jackson. It is probably he who has thwarted the ambitions of the hon. Member for Falkirk, West and other Scottish Members who thought that they had brokered a solution at last Tuesday evening's briefing meeting. Some of my hon. Friends and I were at that meeting, which was hosted by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sarwar), and I found some merit in the case that was put. I could not believe, two hours later, that the meeting, which had been described as a get-out-of-jail clause for the Government, had become the "Saved" clause in the Daily Record.

I do not know what happened in the intervening two hours, but the proposals that were discussed had some serious merit. The idea for the Scottish Brigade—the coming together with the rest of the regiments—was reasonably sound. The fact that the Royal Scots and the King's Own Scottish Borderers would be disbanded was very disappointing. There were problems with the solution, and I say that candidly. We saw only two sides of a bit of paper on the proposal; we did not see the details.

It takes more than a cap badge, a regimental name and a regimental dinner to make a regiment. Community links and recruitment are important. However, there was merit in the compromise; it is even said that the Prime Minister liked the plan. According to Downing street sources, he found it attractive. He thought that it might get him out of a hole—that, apparently, is what he told General Sir Michael Jackson. Unfortunately, the general was not in a mood to play, and told the Prime Minister that selection and retention of aim is a fundamental principle of war. Seemingly that is military language for "Go and get stuffed."

The general believes that if the Black Watch or any other Scottish regiment is allowed to remain independent, that would run a coach and horses through what he is trying to achieve, the one-regiment solution for the existing Scottish regiments.

So, what is the future for the Scottish regiments; where does all this chaos and shambles leave us? Well, not in a very satisfactory place. The only encouraging sign that I have detected in the past couple of months is that the Government seem to be buckling under pressure from campaigners. I hope that that pressure will now be piled on until we get a satisfactory response and conclusion.

I come to my questions to the Minister. Will the Government accept that the future of the Scottish regiments is a matter for Government—a political decision—and stop hiding behind the Army Board? Will the Government reject the Jackson plans and respond positively to the widespread and overwhelming opposition to them? Finally, will the Minister or any of his colleagues here this morning look members of the Black Watch, deployed in the desert of Iraq, in the eye and tell them that their regiment has a future?

9.42 am

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): I am glad to be called to make this contribution to the continuing debate on the role and future of the Scottish regiments and commend the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) for having secured a further debate on the issue. It is highly charged both because of its local implications and because of its significance for the future effectiveness of the British Army.

On the local side, I am happy to concede that I have major concerns, as do many of my constituents, about the future of our local regiment, the Black Watch, in the light of the MOD's intention to create a Scottish super-regiment. I, and many others, believe that a super-regiment would submerge and eventually extinguish all the individual loyalties, traditions and histories of the Scottish regiments as we know them. That might not matter to the MOD or to General Jackson, but it has created a profound reaction in Dundee, which has traditionally supplied the industrial muscle to balance the rural brawn that recruits from areas such as north Tayside and Perthshire have brought to the regiment.

I am not sure, Mr Deputy Speaker, whether you have ever been in Dundee, or are aware of the city. I am sure that you are, given that you are well travelled in Scotland.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I did work in the Dundee, East by-election.

Mr. Luke: I remember your telling me that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so you will know that Dundee is an industrious, hardworking, radical town. Throughout its turbulent history, it has faced change and change again. One of the greatest assets of the city is its people. They are very conscious and proud of their family ties; they are creative, determined and, if sometimes prone to internal dispute, united in the face of intrusion from outside the city boundaries.

Given the long history of recruitment to the Black Watch, virtually every family has a connection with the regiment. My grandfather and great-grandfather served in it. My father, unfortunately, was a Gordon Highlander, but we did not hold against him the fact that he was not one of the "gallant Forty Twa".

So close is the relationship that many claim that the drumbeat of the Black Watch band echoes the city's collective heartbeat. Indeed, a drum of the Black Watch sits high on a ledge above the city chambers in the city square, where I served in the council for 18 years, commemorating the proud ties between the city and the regiment. The regiment has the freedom of the city of Dundee, and has the right and honour to parade through the city, bayonets fixed, colours flying and drums beating.

It is to be hoped that on its return from Iraq—we hope earlier than the prescribed period—the Black Watch will again take the opportunity, as it has done so many times, to exercise that right and to allow the city to rejoice in its safe homecoming from Iraq following a successful tour of duty. Obviously, the dead will be honoured. I associate myself with the comments made by the hon. Member for North Tayside about the sad funerals taking place, in Fife in the main.

That would also be a chance for Dundee to renew its commitment to the campaign for the retention of its own regiment: the Black Watch. Many people in Dundee believe that, if the MOD has its way, the spectacle of the Black Watch marching through the city, as is its right, the members of it being freemen of the city of Dundee, will be lost for ever and will become a thing of the past. The opposition that the Minister faces from this part of Scotland should come as no surprise to him. The issue unites politicians from across the political spectrum.

While stressing the unanimity at a local level, I have to make clear where I diverge from the hon. Gentleman. It has to do with how I see the role of the Scottish regiments, which I hope will—as is widely speculated and as is touted by my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Joyce), who is missing—be brought together in a Scottish Brigade, serving, as they have throughout their proud history, Crown, flag and country. They make a unique Scottish contribution to the British Army in the service of the monarch and carry out their duty under the Union jack, within which the cross of St. Andrew provides a strong and patriotic background setting. They act in defence and promotion of the interests and security of the United Kingdom: an entity to which, as a Scot, I am deeply committed.

I am a strong supporter of the British Army and the British Government in their efforts, as active participants in NATO and other alliances, to ensure the security and well-being of all the countries of Europe, and throughout the world. On those points, perhaps I differ with the hon. Member for North Tayside and his party, but we are united in wanting to ensure that the Black Watch is retained as a unit in the British Army.

The point is: what would be the rationale behind the long histories of those regiments, and what would their brave, selfless and professional service in the British Army amount to if we did not think about those things in the terms that I alluded to earlier when talking about Crown, flag and country? That was the rationale that lay behind my great-grandfather and grandfather joining the ranks of Dundee's regiment, the 42nd Regiment of Foot, in the first and second world wars. Their patriotism was channelled through that regiment and that is why such regiments are so important to the Scottish scene, and why I and so many people are passionate in the cause.

My concern at the threats to the Black Watch and the reduction from six to five Scottish regiments in the new round of cuts is based not only on my family connections, but on a wider concern that the Government are embarking on the cuts and the reorganisation at a critical time, when the security of this country and our allies is under threat from random attack.

The message that we, collectively, should send out from this debate is our commitment to campaign for the Scottish regiments to remain as fully functional separate units in a Scottish Brigade, in the British Army, to support the needs and requirements of the UK Government in countering the growing wave of terrorism. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has put aside his and his party's—I see his party leader here today—separatist agenda to join us in putting a strong case for the Scottish regiments to retain their unique identities within the British Army. To assist in that cause, we must combine to put the case.

In conclusion, I reiterate the call made by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sarwar) last week, when he asked the Prime Minister to take note of the concern in Scotland over the future of the Scottish regiments. I further ask the Government to rethink the proposals for the reduction in the strength of the British Army and to do all that they can to promote and encourage recruitment to both regular and territorial units of the Army throughout the UK.

I call for the Government to signal that they are willing to scrap the proposals to create a royal regiment of Scotland and to commit themselves to creating a Scottish Brigade that all the Scottish regiments will operate under, keeping their individual identities. That is the message that Scotland wishes and waits to hear. It is the message that the Black Watch deserves to hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I offer no criticism of those who have spoken thus far. I have no power to control the length of Members' speeches, but I remind them that the purpose of the debate is for the Member initiating it to get an adequate reply from the Minister.

9.50 am

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) on having procured this debate.

I want to lay out my credentials. What on earth is an Englishman and a former English Army officer doing here, speaking about Scottish regiments? The answer is simple. I am married to a Skye girl; I served with the Queen's Own Highlanders with great pride and pleasure, despite being described during the whole of a four-month tour in Northern Ireland as "that redcoat"; and a cousin by marriage is about to command the Royal Highland Fusiliers, if it continues to exist.

It seems extraordinary that at the present time of emergency, difficulty and tension, the Government are planning to axe four infantry battalions—it does not matter whether they are Scottish, English, or Welsh. The infantryman is the single most flexible soldier in the British Army. Despite the great phrases, "boots in the mud" and "boots in the dust", technology can never replace the hugely experienced Tommy, Jock or Taffy on the ground, doing his job, killing when necessary, rebuilding when necessary and dishing out sense, kindness and justice wherever he goes. That is what all our soldiers are good at, be they Scottish, English, Welsh or Irish.

To lose four of our battalions now is madness and I want to challenge two comments by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Defence that the size of the Army is not about to shrink. That is just not true. On 21 July, the Secretary of State for Defence made it very clear that the target for the Army is currently 108,500. The Army has failed to meet that, more of which later, but the new target will be 102,000. Whichever way it is cut—"cut" is the word—that is a defence cut. On the back of that, I fear that we shall lose regiments such as the Royal Scots and the King's Own Scottish Borderers, which have survived untainted for 300 years. The Royal Scots came into service in this country in 1633. It has never been amalgamated and has never been merged with any other unit. It has won countless honours and Victoria crosses for this country. Why tinker with a regiment like that? Why tinker with the King's Own Scottish Borderers? That must be wrong.

A second argument is that recruiting in Scotland cannot support six infantry battalions. That is complete and utter rubbish. The Royal Scots Dragoon Guards—I know that it is not an infantry battalion—has been seriously under strength for almost 10 years. When the recruiting restrictions on that fine regiment were removed and it was allowed to spread its wings and to use every tactic and technique allowed to regiments, recruiting to the RSDG rocketed to full manning, only for the Government to slash 100-plus of its well trained men. I believe that any Scottish regiment can bring itself up to full strength if it is allowed to. I did that with my regiment and I am sure that the situation in north Nottinghamshire is no different from that in parts of Scotland. I believe that this country has the potential to maintain six fully manned Scottish infantry battalions, and if the Government would remove the recruiting cap and put the proper resources into the Army Training and Recruiting Agency, that could be achieved. Let us have no more nonsense about recruiting.

Interestingly, anyone who read The Times on Sunday will have seen a picture of Colin Campbell commanding that famous regiment, the 1st Battalion, the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders in Crater. It seems that we are stuck in time in some sort of aspic. We seem to be in the same position as in the late 1960s and the Argylls are under threat yet again with a certain officer leaving his regiment to come into Parliament to argue the case for the Argylls. Anyone who looks carefully at the picture will see what he is wearing on his hat. We used to call the Argylls' cap badge a soup plate. That may be slightly rude, but there we are. He does not have an Argylls' cap badge in his glengarry; he has a super-regiment cap badge of the Scottish Brigade, which came into existence in the mid-1960s and was scrapped in the late 1960s because it failed. What are we again to have? Another super-regiment because of tired, thoughtless and exhausted thinking and because no one in the Ministry Defence has been able to produce anything that is fresh and original.

Yes, we must move forward, the arms plot must go, and more battalions are coming back from Northern Ireland. However, even with the add-back from Ulster and the battalions that are no longer involved in the arms plot, the 24-month gap between battalion deployment tours is nothing like 24 months. It will still average out at less than that.

That is not right. It is an unfair deal, not just for Jock and Tommy but, more importantly, for the wives and children who need to spend time with those men. That is why recruiting is suffering and people are not staying in the Army. The departure of corporals and sergeants—experienced men—adds to the recruiting problem. The Government have embarked on an evil spiral.

The other greatly misguided comment that we have heard in the past couple of days is that the infantry is already half large regiments and half single battalions. That is not the case. The Prince of Wales's, King's, Guards and Scottish divisions are all single battalion organisations. Only the Queen's and Light divisions have gone down this path.

If one were to take, let us say, the Argylls and put their name in brackets after the 4th Battalion of the Royal Scots Regiment, would the name and identity survive? Would the tartan, hat and cap badge survive? Ask the Royal Lincolnshire Regiment or the Royal Leicestershire Regiment. Their names were in brackets after battalions of the Royal Anglian Regiment for a while. Where are they now? If one were to go nine miles from my house and try to join the Royal Lincolnshire Regiment, the response would be, "What on earth is that? I have never heard of it." That regiment, with all its wonderful history, is gone—it has died.

The proposal is desperately misguided and dangerous for the country. It dishonours Scotland's dead, and, militarily, it is enormously foolish. I urge the Minister to think in a fresh direction, as it is not yet too late to save those wonderful regiments.

9.58 am

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): I shall begin by echoing the comments of the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) in paying respect to all those who have lost loved ones in recent months, especially in the terrible conflict in Iraq, in which we are still engaged. I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate. The hon. Gentleman has managed to achieve another debate some two months after the previous one that was held in Westminster Hall on this very issue. It is basically the same debate, but its name is slightly different.

I wish to thank the Minister for taking time on two occasions to meet me and talk about this issue. I also wish to put on record my thanks to the Secretary of State for managing to schedule in his diary meetings with me, in particular the meeting last week with three colleagues from the Liberal Democrat party: the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and the hon. Members for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood) and for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore). There were also ex-serving members of the King's Own Scottish Borderers at that joint meeting. As individuals with a military background, they were allowed to put their case to the Secretary of State, which is very important.

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's comments. The meeting that we had last week was productive. Does he agree that the passion that Donald Fairgrieve and the other KOSB representatives brought to it was very telling? The single most important issue for them was the prospect of the KOSB losing its identity in an ill-judged merger with the Royal Scots, which they found ludicrous, even offensive.

Mr. Brown: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. He is exactly right. His comments return to those made by the hon. Member for North Tayside. It is a matter of communities and the feeling of the wider family. I remember saying to the Secretary of State last week that if we look at the south of Scotland, only one thing links the east coast with the west coast, and that is the King's Own Scottish Borderers. We have our differences in a number of other areas, but that is the one link across the south of Scotland.

We are all incensed by what appears to be going on and with what the future may hold for our Scottish regiments. I am so incensed that I have even managed, albeit for a couple of minutes, to have a one-to-one-face with the Prime Minister earlier to further make the case. We should leave no stone unturned when it comes to what we feel.

Doing nothing is not an option. We have all met constituents over recent weeks and months, some of whom have absolutely no contact or connection with the military. Others are widows of ex-serving members of the armed forces and, in my area, of the King's Own Scottish Borderers, or those who have brothers and uncles who have served. Some are serving at the moment. The future of our armed forces has to be secured.

After the Remembrance day parade and church service in Dumfries on Sunday, it was interesting to take the opportunity to speak to a number of personnel. As one would expect, different people have different views. Some people wanted absolutely no change, but it was good to hear them recount their stories of the time that they served—10, 15 or 20 years plus, for many of them. They said that they wanted absolutely no change, and that we must secure the individual identity of the King's Own Scottish Borderers.

Others, when we got into deeper conversation, realised that today's young men and women are perhaps looking for a secure future with the regiment, but realise that serving in the modern Army is different from 15 or 20 years ago. Some of our young men and women spend a significant amount of time with their regiment, and are then drawn away to support other regiments and to supplement and complement what those regiments are doing because of recruitment shortages.

The question has to be asked: who are we to determine that the same old ways should remain, especially when we consider the future of married personnel? The Government have talked long and hard since they came into power in 1997 about family-friendly policies. We should also, as best we can, have family-friendly policies for those who serve in our armed forces. They are doing a job of work, just like any other member of society who is gainfully employed. Will a political decision be made as soon as we reach the end of the road, or a military decision?

If we look back to the early 1990s, many of us have been in this situation before, although some of us were not in this place at the time. It happened then. We saw the highland regiments amalgamated; we should consider the difficulties from then until now. Recruitment and retention have been serious problems.

The thing that sticks in my craw more than anything else is the suggestion by the Scottish Council of Colonels that we should merge the Royal Scots and the King's Own Scottish Borderers. The council has come up with the worst of all scenarios, as far as I am concerned. I do not say that from a political point of view, but the idea beggars belief. To be open and honest about what happened in the early 1990s, there was a regrettable problem with the Royal Scots in terms of its recruitment and retention. A decision was made then not on military grounds but on political grounds to save someone's political neck. That mistake has come back to haunt us today.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): As the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) will remember, it was the Gordon Highlanders that paid the price to save that political neck.

Mr. Brown: I bow to the hon. Gentleman's greater wisdom. I know that there was a problem that should have been dealt with properly and that there should have been no political shenanigans in the early 1990s.

From what I can gather from speaking to ex-members of the King's Own Scottish Borderers, it was also said in the early 1990s that the shortfall in some of the other regiments would be made good. Lo and behold, that commitment was not fulfilled. I say to the Minister today what I have said to the Secretary of State previously. If at the end of the process there is a commitment to 36 sound and strong regiments that can do a job at any time for this country, whether that is on behalf of this country or to help another nation, that is what we should aim for. If the commitment is to make up those numbers and regiments, we in the House and throughout the country want to see it fulfilled and not merely swept aside, as has happened in the past.

I have heard this morning about the issue of names in brackets. The English language is strange, and the use of brackets or parentheses can mean different things to different people. As I have said all along, I want to see young men and women in my locality in southern Scotland—and further afield, as the footprint for the King's Own Scottish Borderers stretches further than merely south Scotland—have the opportunity to join our armed forces and the KOSB for many years to come. That is vital.

If the King's Own Scottish Borderers name has to be retained, we must put the recommendation from the Scottish Council of Colonels in the bid immediately. I have written to General Sir Mike Jackson saying that I believe that we had a positive meeting last week with the Secretary of State for Defence. I made the case in that letter for him to consider what is being said. There are ways out, not just for the Government, the Secretary of State for Defence or the Prime Minister, but for the military, which appears to be making recommendations that make no sense to anyone.

I hope that the Minister will take on board what has been said today—I am sure that he will, because he has done so in the past. We are looking for a positive outcome, and it is vital that the individual identities of the regiments remain.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Three Members are trying to catch my attention, but I cannot call them all. However, if the next two are brief, I can get them both in.

10.9 am

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): I thank the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown). My hon. Friends and I have been glad to work with him in meetings and campaigns about the future of the King's Own Scottish Borderers, including in what I thought was a constructive meeting with the Secretary of State last week.

The King's Own Scottish Borderers has its regimental headquarters in the barracks in Berwick-upon-Tweed, where its regimental museum and association are also based. The regiment has the freedom of the borough, and it marches through it on Minden day every year and on many other occasions. We are proud of the regiment, which recruits in Berwick, the borders, Dumfries and Galloway, and Lanarkshire. It has an excellent recruiting record: over the past 10 years, it has regularly been the first or second-best recruited Scottish regiment and in the top half of all infantry regiments.

Regimental pride is of great importance to the community support that former members of a regiment and their families extend to one another and that communities extend to them. It is also a potent factor in recruitment. Although it would be easy to dwell on the sentimental, nostalgic and honourable reasons for keeping the separate identity of the King's Own Scottish Borderers, the reasons that should be persuasive with the Army Board and the Minister are sensible, practical and highly relevant to the future of the Army—in particular the regiment's ability to recruit throughout the area.

What came as a real body blow to serving and former members of the regiment, as well as to the local community, was the completely ill-judged proposal to force an amalgamation with the Royal Scots, a regiment that has had serious recruitment difficulties over the years and is being pushed into the merger to deal with that problem. As the hon. Gentleman said, the problem should have been dealt with some time ago and is not a problem for the King's Own Scottish Borderers. Why damage success in this way? The foremost consideration in the minds of everyone concerned with the KOSB is to maintain its identity because of its practical value in recruiting for the British Army and providing good soldiers.

On closer examination of the figures, one realises that recruitment in some regiments, including the Royal Scots, depends heavily on Commonwealth citizens. Some of them are extremely good soldiers—for example, Fijians are superb soldiers and we are glad to have them. However, that is also an index of the weaknesses of recruitment in some regiments. The King's Own Scottish Borderers has about nine Commonwealth citizens compared with 89 in the Royal Scots. That is a measure of relative recruitment ability.

It was a bad day when the Scottish colonels—the colonel of the King's Own Scottish Borderers was away in Afghanistan—made a recommendation that did not recognise the key judgment supposed to be at the heart of how to configure these regiments, which is the sustainability of future recruitment. That phrase was used in the official documents concerned. On that count, the KOSB should remain a clearly defined unit of the British Army, preferably a regiment.

There are alternative solutions for the Royal Scots name. It could go to the brigade, to the overall structure, to the TA or be used in a different kind of merger. However, it certainly does not make sense to sacrifice the qualities of the King's Own Scottish Borderers to find somewhere to put the Royal Scots. Therefore, I hope that the Minister, the Secretary of State and the Army Board have already agreed that they must reconsider the one extremely misguided merger in the Scottish proposals.

We can all see the writing on the wall and the amount of military pressure for the creation of a single Scottish super-regiment. People have different views on that. Clearly, some problems have to be addressed, such as the ridiculous and inefficient disruptions of the arms plot, and the destruction of the relationship between a regiment and its region, which is particularly marked in England by the circulation of regiments. It is right to address those problems, but some people find it hard to accept that a super-regiment is the right solution.

Of crucial importance to us in the borders is that the King's Own Scottish Borderers continues to contribute its flow of recruits and its regimental traditions and qualities to the British Army. The borders want that to happen and it is the logical course to follow. Therefore, I ask the Minister to pose the right questions to the Army Board to ensure that the ill-advised recommendation of the Scottish colonels is set aside and the issue is reconsidered.

10.14 am

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): As the Member of Parliament for Perth, where the Black Watch has its regimental headquarters, I am pleased to have been called to speak briefly today. I add my condolences to the family of Private Paul Lowe, whose funeral will take place early this afternoon, and I extend my condolences to the families and loved ones of the other six Black Watch soldiers who have died in Iraq.

This is a sad day for the Black Watch, but it will also be a historic day for it and the other Scottish regiments because this may be the last opportunity for debate before the Government implement their plans to axe the entire regimental system in Scotland. We should be clear that the ultimate decision lies with the UK Government—a fact recognised by my constituents, many retired and serving military personnel, and even the Secretary of State for Scotland during Scottish questions on 26 October. It is a pity that neither the Secretary of State nor his deputy, the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, is present at this important debate.

We should also be clear that the impetus for the decision came from the Chancellor and his Department. That was recognised by Colonel Tim Collins, who, speaking to the BBC on Sunday, said:

> "These reductions are about saving money for the Treasury. It is not about making the army better and it is not about fixing something that is broken."

We have also heard much from the Government about the arms plot argument. That is the apparent basis for the proposed scrapping of the entire regimental system in Scotland. However, senior military figures including Brigadier Gary Barnett, who retired last year having served as colonel of the Black Watch for the preceding 12 years—a man, therefore, of immense military experience—have challenged that purported rationale for the scrapping of the regimental system in Scotland; Brigadier Barnett termed it a red herring. The Minister will be aware of the brigadier's recent detailed submission to the Secretary of State for Defence.

The proposals make no sense militarily, particularly at a time when there is overstretch of our armed forces. A Black Watch officer serving at Camp Dogwood, directly in the line of fire—I am not in a position to release his name—wrote to me and said:

> "Recently, the Black Watch moved from Germany to the UK to become the Army's training battalion. In this role, we should train other battalions for operations, but not deploy ourselves. However, for the first time in the Army's history, and because of troop shortages, we have returned to Iraq a year after we left.
>
> The contradiction between deploying the training battalion on the one hand and yet cutting four battalions on the other, needs to be addressed. The Army has a policy of a 24 month tour interval between 6 month tours. And yet we are back here", in Iraq,

> "after 12."

That point was echoed by many other Black Watch soldiers who have written to me from Iraq, young serving soldiers who want their regiment to be retained and who reject utterly the Government's proposal. I will briefly quote one of those young serving soldiers, currently at Camp Dogwood:

> "The recent decision to reduce the armed forces can only add to the stress and pressure put on us and our families what with the ever increasing commitments and deployments we are volunteered for. Some of us have been separated from our families for 400 days in the past 2 years.
> I am writing to you to fight on my behalf to reverse the decision to reduce our Armed Forces, as I am fighting for my life out here in Iraq in support of the politicians".

In conclusion, it is clear that the Black Watch wants to keep the regiment. It is also clear that the people of Scotland want to keep the Scottish regiments. Will the Minister take the opportunity afforded to him today to end the endless spin and uncertainty that has caused so much anger and distress among the soldiers and their families? Will he tell us today whether soldiers in the Black Watch are coming home to their regiment, or whether they will be amalgamated out of existence?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank hon. Members for their co-operation. If the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sarwar) is brief, I shall call him.

10.19 am

Mr. Mohammad Sarwar (Glasgow, Govan) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak, and I congratulate the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) on securing this timely debate.

Hundreds of my constituents have raised the future of the regiments with me in recent weeks. Last Tuesday, I organised a cross-party meeting with my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) to discuss the issue with the Keep Our Scottish Battalions campaign. I am grateful to the hon. Member for North Tayside and others who attended that lobbying. We met Clive Fairweather, a former commanding officer of the Scottish Division Depot, and Stuart Crawford, who was previously a lieutenant-colonel in the Royal Tank Regiment. The following day, I asked the Prime Minister about the future of the Scottish regiments during Question Time. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Minister are certainly aware of the depth of feeling about the issue throughout Scotland.

I appreciate that the Chief of the Defence Staff is still considering how best to proceed with changes to infantry deployment and that the Army will make its decision soon. I hope that the weight of public opinion in Scotland will lead to a positive response that retains the regiments' unique historic identities and traditions.

Simply merging Scotland's infantry regiments would be a mistake. Each of them has a proud history of service to our country. The idea of a Scottish Brigade that incorporates our regiments without losing their special identity, as proposed by the Keep Our Scottish Battalions campaign, is worth considering. For centuries, Scottish soldiers have shown professionalism in serving around the world. I am particularly troubled that disbandment could be considered while the Black Watch sees active service in the most dangerous region of Iraq. While the Minister will be aware that I did not support military action in Iraq, we all share a deep respect for those who have served there during the past two years.

I want to pay tribute to my constituent, Russell Beeston, a Territorial Army soldier in the 52nd Lowland Regiment who was killed 15 months ago in southern Iraq. When I joined thousands of Glaswegians in George square on Sunday, we all remembered his sacrifice and that of the Scots and British serving our country from all our regiments. In Glasgow, the Royal Highland Fusiliers has a proud local history of recruitment in my constituency. That could be lost with the merger.

[Mr. Mohammad Sarwar]

I turn now to the training of Scottish recruits. When infantry recruits in both the regular Army and the Territorial Army were trained in Scotland, they were able to maintain close contacts with their families at home. Now all members of the Scottish infantry are trained in Yorkshire and it is more difficult for families to visit or support young recruits. Far more recruits drop out of training. The Minister has always taken a keen interest in improving the standard of training for all recruits throughout the United Kingdom, and we should reconsider training Scottish recruits in Scotland.

My right hon. Friend the Minister might say that he cannot give us further assurances at this time. The hon. Member for North Tayside and others may consider that this debate is the last chance to make the case for Scotland's regiments and the last opportunity for the Government to make their position clear. I am sure that the Minister is listening carefully to the genuine concerns that have been expressed about the matter. I am also certain that the debate will not be the final word on the matter. Two strong grassroots campaigns will continue to lobby their elected Members of Parliaments about the issue, as will many of our constituents. We must all respond accordingly.

10.23 am

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) on securing a second debate on the future of our Scottish regiments. It comes at a particularly appropriate time, a few days after Remembrance Sunday when we commemorated the sacrifice of the men and women who served in our armed forces. That sacrifice continues to this day with the war in Iraq.

The large number of hon. Members who have contributed to the debate have shown what great importance we attach to the future of our Scottish regiments. For many months, great uncertainty has been hanging over the future of the regiments and that uncertainty cannot be good for morale. The uncertainty started in July when the Secretary of State announced that one Scottish battalion would be axed and that the Army structure would in future consist of regiments made up of two or more battalions. It can be deduced from simple arithmetic that the Government intend to reduce the number of Scottish regiments from six to either one or two.

I am not arguing that the status quo should prevail for ever. Naturally, time and circumstances change and the Army must change with the times. However, while changing we must keep the best of what we have inherited from past generations, and the British regimental system, based on geographic areas with which people identify, is an important inheritance that we must keep. Surely one of the lessons of Iraq and Afghanistan is the importance of highly trained and motivated infantry. The British regimental system, based on recruitment from geographical areas, has produced the finest infantry soldiers in the world.

Now is not the time to reduce infantry numbers. In recent years, the infantry has seen action in Iraq, Afghanistan, Sierra Leone, Kosovo and Bosnia and has carried out peacekeeping duties in many other parts of the world. It is also often called on to help out at home, such as during the firefighters' strike and the foot-and-mouth epidemic. That epidemic should serve as a warning for the Government that Army assignments can appear unexpectedly out of the blue. Our armed forces are already overstretched; the future is uncertain, so infantry numbers should not be reduced.

Many hon. Members have referred to the proposal of the Council of Scottish Colonels to merge the Royal Scots and the King's Own Scottish Borderers into a single battalion, reduce the other four Scottish regiments to battalion status and make the five battalions form one new regiment. I do not know what remit the colonels were given, but it looks suspiciously as if they were told to go into a room, play a form of Russian roulette and not come out until they had decided which two regiments should be merged. The Royal Scots and the KOSB were the regiments that lost out.

Like all hon. Members who have spoken this morning, I urge the Government to reject the proposal, which would mean a loss of identity for two regiments that have a long and proud tradition of service to the country. The other four regiments would also suffer a loss of identity by being reduced to battalion status. Recruitment is bound to suffer if the six regiments are merged to form one or two large super-regiments. Throughout Scotland, people identify with the local regiment, which in my case is the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders. That was obvious at Sunday's Remembrance day parade, when the vast majority of veterans were wearing the famous red and white Glengarry. The message from recent history is that abolishing regiments is not a successful strategy. For example, when the Cameronians were disbanded, 17 per cent. of that regiment's soldiers left the Army.

Several hon. Members have referred to the Scottish Brigade solution. I have a suggestion for the Government that would streamline efficiency but keep regimental identity. They should reverse an earlier round of cuts under which the Scottish division headquarters was moved from Edinburgh castle to Warminster. The existing six Scottish regiments should be kept, but made part of a Scottish division with headquarters in Scotland that has an effective command and control function instead of simply an administrative function, as at present. That would provide a streamlined command and control structure, yet retain the six distinctive Scottish regiments.

Those regiments have contributed so much to the defence of our country through their long and proud history. If the Government see sense, our six Scottish regiments will remain and make a vital contribution to the country's defence for many years to come.

10.29 am

Mr. Peter Duncan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale) (Con): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart), and I express my sympathy with his remarks on the recent bereavements. They remind us of the high price paid by the British Army, and it has been paid by our forces over generations.

There is a considerably improved turnout on the Government Back Benches for this debate, which is obviously related to the Minister's appearance today.

However, the gap between him and his Back Benchers is tangible. I see plenty of room for the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Joyce), if he had managed to join us, and for the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, who could have joined us today for this important debate for Scotland.

It is not the first time that we have debated this issue, and if the Government press ahead with their agenda of cuts, it will not be the last. The proposals have upset and astounded many people in Scotland and throughout the UK. Despite the Defence Secretary's attempts to finesse them, there is no doubt that they signal the end of the six Scottish regiments as we know them. Imprecise talk of identities and traditions is no smokescreen for radical change. A cap badge in a super-regiment is no substitute for a single-battalion regiment in its own right. To pretend otherwise is misleading and ultimately futile.

People have been upset not only by the cuts but by the way in which the Government have handled the issue, especially in recent weeks. In the past month or so, the position has changed more times than I care to remember. First, the Defence Secretary said that the only option was abolition of the Scottish regiments and their merger into one or two super-regiments. Then at Prime Minister's Question Time, the Prime Minister said that no decision had been made. Then at Scottish questions, the Scottish Secretary told me that it was important to take account of public opinion. During First Minister's questions in the Scottish Parliament, the First Minister then said that he supported retention of the regiments, before my colleague David McLetchie caught him out and forced him to admit that he was in favour of the proposals for cuts.

Last week, the soldiers and their families had to endure the ultimate insult: Downing street sent that loyal foot soldier, the hon. Member for Falkirk, West, on a spin mission to the Scottish press on Tuesday night to say that four of our regiments would be saved in their current form. That was a partial victory, we thought, but it lasted all of 12 hours, until the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition obtained a response from the Prime Minister declining to back up the Falkirk, West line. Instead, he said again that no decision had yet been made.

If the No. 10 spin machine believes that communities throughout the south of Scotland can be persuaded to support a compromise involving the loss of two independent historic regiments—the King's Own Scottish Borderers and the Royal Scots—it is seriously mistaken. Three hundred years of history and some of the strongest community ties in the British Army cannot be cast aside. My constituents, in particular, will continue to fight any Labour proposal to scrap the KOSBies. I support the traditional regimental structure in Scotland and throughout the British Army, and I will continue to fight for the independence of the KOSB.

What is happening is simply not good enough. Soldiers, their families and the whole of Scotland need to know what their fate is. I urge the Minister, in replying to the debate, to tell us today when there will be an answer. The Black Watch would especially welcome that. Her Majesty's Opposition realise that the deployment of Black Watch troops to central Iraq was a military request in a time of war, and we stand by the Government in that undertaking. As tragic events have unfolded, we have continued, and will continue, to support the Government when we think that they are taking such hard but necessary decisions. Unlike some in the House, we will never use the deaths of Scottish soldiers as a vehicle to score political points. To do so would be extremely questionable. However, we will continue our campaign, which is ruthlessly focused on saving all six of our historic regiments.

Scotland's six regiments have battled for Britain for hundreds of years. Our soldiers have fought, bled and died in the name of freedom. In the past century alone, they have protected this island's liberty in two world wars. They have defended our interests in Korea and the Gulf. They have dealt with our internal troubles in Northern Ireland and sought to keep the peace in the Balkans. They have fought to give others, in Afghanistan and now in Iraq, the same freedom as we enjoy. All six regiments have a proud and distinguished history. Four have seen action in the continuing liberation of Iraq. Speculation continues that the Highlanders and the Royal Scots are being readied to go to Iraq, which would mean that all six regiments would shortly have been at the forefront of operations in that theatre.

As I said, the way in which the Government have treated soldiers and their families, especially those of the Black Watch, disgusts me. Families of troops are well aware that their loved ones live a dangerous if incredibly rewarding life. Our soldiers have wives and children, and mothers and fathers, and they deserve to be treated with the utmost respect and admiration, especially at times of war. That has not happened in the past few weeks. That is why I urge the Government to tell Parliament today when they will announce the final decision on Scotland's regimental structure. If they do not know the date for that, the least they can do is admit it. I hope that between now and then the Government take stock and re-evaluate the consequences of the action they seem intent on taking.

Let us not pretend that the Army has asked for this. Yesterday, General Sir Mike Jackson said:

> "I would much prefer increasing the size of the Army but that's simply not on offer. I can either accept what's on offer—a reduced size of the Army—or go."

This is a political decision that goes right the way up to the Prime Minister. It is not a military decision, and that shows. We would be hard pressed to find an Army man who thought that this was a good idea in any respect.

If the Government had set out to choose the most inappropriate, ill-informed and insane time to cut our armed forces, they could not have picked a better time than now. We as a nation have been involved in several conflicts in recent years—not to mention our ever-increasing peacekeeping obligations. Nobody ever said that preserving freedom and helping others to do the same was easy. It comes at a price; that price is maintaining our full fighting force. This is not the first time that cuts in our armed forces have been proposed. However, I cannot remember cuts being proposed at a time of such severe military overstretch. As well as being a wretched betrayal of our troops, it undermines the security of our country.

Many Members in attendance this morning are committed to saving our Scottish regiments.

[Mr. Russell Brown]

Mr. Russell Brown: I am listening intently to what the hon. Gentleman is saying, and if he is going to come on to the topic that I am about to mention, I apologise. I have not heard what his party's position is. He is talking about cuts and financial constraints. Is his party in favour of retaining all the regiments in their current form? If his party were in power, how would they achieve that on a declining budget?

Mr. Duncan: Our policy certainly is to retain all the regiments as they are at present. I have made that perfectly clear, and I will restate it shortly.

The hon. Gentleman mentions a declining budget. That contradicts what the Secretary of State for Scotland said yesterday in this Chamber; he suggested that the budget was increasing. The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues should get their figures correct.

Many Members are committed to saving our Scottish regiments, and I am delighted to see so many of them present. No matter which party they belong to, they must be realistic about how that will be achieved. Scottish National party members argue—somewhat hypocritically—for the maintenance of Scotland's full complement in the British Army. That will add to the momentum of our campaign, but in the final analysis whether the six Scottish regiments are retained is a matter of political will-power. The final decision will depend on who is Prime Minister. Members must be realistic and concede that, notwithstanding a humiliating U-turn by the Government, the only way to save the regiments is for the Conservative party to form the Government after the next general election. For the information of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown), the Leader of the Opposition has stated that within the very first week of our being in power, the next Conservative Government will reverse any Labour cuts to our Scottish regiments.

This is a noble cause that is supported by the majority of Scots; even the Minister has to acknowledge that.

10.39 am

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I thank the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) for securing this debate on the role and future of the Scottish regiments. I also acknowledge the contributions made by my hon. Friends the Members for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke), for Dumfries (Mr. Brown) and for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sarwar), by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and by the hon. Members for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid), for Newark (Patrick Mercer) and for Perth (Annabelle Ewing), and of course the contribution of the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Duncan).

In recent debates and elsewhere my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and I have made clear the importance of Scotland's relationship with the armed forces and, more widely, with the Ministry of Defence. I am conscious of the fact that a good number of Members present never attend defence debates. I excuse the hon. Member for Newark and the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) who, of course, is on the Conservative Front Bench, but I welcome the new converts to the cause of defence. I look forward to them standing side-by-side with the Secretary of State and me when we campaign for more resources for defence, something that they have not done to date.

The debate centres on the restructuring of the infantry. It is perhaps the most high profile area of change announced in July by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I welcome the opportunity to explain once again what we are doing, why we are doing it and what the implications of not doing it would be.

I am, of course, aware of the debate that surrounds the future of the Scottish regiments. After all, I represent a Scottish seat. The debate highlights how much the Army matters in Scotland. Scotland's infantry regiments have a proud history and continue to serve this country courageously. That was most recently demonstrated by the Black Watch deployment. I commend the bravery of the deployment and offer my condolences to the bereaved families. This is a sad period for the Black Watch. I accept that everyone in the House supports that sentiment.

I wish, however, that we could get a bit more honesty from the party that the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) represents. The SNP does not want to preserve the Scottish regiments as we know them. It has made it clear that, in an independent Scotland, we would withdraw from NATO and would not participate in EU missions, as they are linked to NATO. The SNP would downgrade the Scottish regiments to occasional peacekeeping missions. It is difficult to know precisely where those missions would be because the SNP opposed what our forces were asked to do in the Balkans, in Afghanistan and in Iraq, and questioned our engagements elsewhere.

So, I question the motives of the SNP on the issue. I doubt whether its argument is about preserving the capability of the Scottish regiments. I remind the House of the statement made by an SNP spokesman, who called the Union flag "the butcher's apron". That is an outrageous slur on the courageous men and women of the British Army, not least those serving in the regiments that we are considering. So it is little wonder that I do not take the hon. Member for North Tayside or his party seriously when we are discussing the future of the armed forces.

Throughout its history, the Army has been subject to change—sometimes that change has been dramatic. It must evolve and adapt to meet future challenges. The reason is simple. To ignore reality would be foolhardy and damaging to the high standards expected of a modern fighting force. The changes planned for the infantry are part of that evolution. There are two key reasons for those changes.

The first reason is the conclusion by the Army Board that the infantry arms plot no longer represents the best way to deliver operational capability. I note what the hon. Member for Perth said when praying in aid for a retired brigadier, but the weight of military experience on the Army Board is substantially against her. I expressed my views about where the SNP is coming from. I am only commenting about that particular issue.

Annabelle Ewing: Will the Minister of State give way on that point?

Mr. Ingram: If I have time, I will give the hon. Lady an opportunity to speak.

I read the report from the brigadier in question and I recognise his considerable experience. However, we must set that against the breadth of experience on the Army Board.

So, one reason why we are implementing this change is the considerable arguments that have been advanced—not for the first time—that there is a need to change the arms plot and dispose of it.

The second issue is the progress towards lasting peace in Northern Ireland. I will deal with the impact of events in Northern Ireland. The improved security climate helped us judge that we could remove four battalions from the 14,500 troops allocated to the Province. That provided an opportunity to consider how best to organise the Army for expeditionary warfare. The judgment was that the Army would be best served and best prepared for the challenges of the future if infantry battalions were less reliant on reinforcements when deployed on operations and our forces had the right balance of key enablers: logisticians, engineers, signallers and intelligence personnel. We decided that some 550 posts freed up by the change in Northern Ireland would be reinvested into the infantry to develop more robust, resilient units, and the rest would be used to strengthen the key enablers who are crucial to sustainable operational capability.

However, the most important factor in changes to the structure of the infantry is the decision to end the infantry arms plot—a process whereby we have moved infantry battalions from role to role and place to place every few years. Although the arms plot maintained broad experience and variety, it also hampered the availability of infantry battalions. Currently, only 26 to 27 of the 40 infantry battalions are available for deployment at any time and some seven to eight battalions—about 20 per cent. of the total infantry strength—are unavailable due to the arms plot. I shall give some examples.

In March 2003, the Highlanders moved to Germany to begin their armoured infantry training, which meant that they were unavailable for some seven months. In September 2003 the Scots Guards began their conversion and were unavailable for six months. The Black Watch has been subject to similar disruption, which was brought home to me recently when I visited Black Watch families in Warminster. Not to put too fine a point on it, that is impractical and inefficient and no one has argued against it today, apart from the hon. Member for Perth. I do not think that anyone can deny its impracticality and inefficiency.

Annabelle Ewing: I was quoting Brigadier Gary Barnett, and I am pleased that the Minister recognises his breadth of military experience as a colonel of the Black Watch for some 12 years. The suggestion that the scrapping of the Scottish regiment system is a precondition for the phasing out of the arms plot is, as Brigadier Barnett said, a red herring.

Mr. Ingram: I suggest that the hon. Lady reads again the totality of what has been argued. If she is now saying that the brigadier accepts the removal of the arms plot, perhaps we have unanimity in the Chamber. Let us understand the importance of what is driving this change: the need to have a more efficient and effective means of utilising our infantry battalions.

Ending the arms plot will make most of the 36 battalions available for deployment, as opposed to the 26 or 27 at present. The logic and benefits of that change are undeniable. Ceasing the arms plot will increase our operational capability, not reduce it. Doing so will also assist in achieving a more predictable tour interval across the infantry. I do not gainsay some of the problems that we are experiencing in some areas on tour intervals. We are trying to get back into a better balance.

In future, the battalions will be fixed by role and, largely, by location, which will release the resources that are routinely tied up in moving location or retraining. The Army will, therefore, be more capable and effective, because as well as more battalions being available for operations, the new structure will provide continuity of expertise and role and greater brigade stability. In future career development for officers and senior non-commissioned officers could be much more carefully planned, and individuals would be able to move between battalions for career development and increased breadth of experience. At present that is largely dependent on the role played by an individual battalion, which is restrictive and inefficient.

I could mention many anecdotal comments that I have heard. I probably meet more members of the armed forces than anyone else—probably even more than a good number of generals—because it is the nature of my job to meet them and their families. I have many anecdotes, some from Scottish regiments, many of which come from serving warrant officers, who say "Keep going, because this is about the future Army structure, not about the past Army structure." We can trade comment on this matter, but the important thing is that the debate is out there and many people realise its benefit. It is about career development and the capacity within the armed forces to best use essential resources.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: No.

Multi-battalion regiments are not a new concept. A substantial part—we could argue over whether it is half or one third—is organised that way, and operates effectively. That concept has been a success. Let me make it clear that we value highly the benefits and traditions of the regimental system; that is not in dispute. What is being proposed will not undermine the system, but will underpin it.

Mr. Duncan: Does the Minister think that a multi-battalion single regiment will assist or take away from Army recruitment in Scotland?

Mr. Ingram: There is an important debate to be had on that, and I will come to recruitment issues later, but that point is hard to prove one way or the other.

Mr. Simpson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: No, because I want to deal with some of the issues raised.

The frequent moves caused by the arms plot are destructive to family life, and have an adverse impact on retention. It is reflective of the change in wider society that family stability has become much more of an issue for people. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries pointed out, the Government seek to be more family friendly. That is one benefit to ending the arms plot.

The end of the arms plot will also mean that single-battalion regiments, including the Scottish regiments, will need to reorganise themselves to meet the requirement for regiments of two or more battalions.

Pete Wishart: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: If I get time. [Interruption.] Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will give way when I am ready to give way. If hon. Members want me to answer the issues raised—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the Minister gives way, he gives way; if he does not, he does not.

Mr. Ingram: If the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) rose to apologise for his butcher's apron comment, I may be prepared to accept his contribution.

I was making the point that the end of the arms plot will have consequences on the structure and organisation of the Army, and on what will then happen to single battalions. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made it clear that no decisions have been made. It is important that the Army is given the opportunity to determine the structure that will best deliver the operational effectiveness that we need. When it is ready, the Army Board will make recommendations on the future organisation of the infantry, with a final decision being announced before the Christmas recess.

Pete Wishart: I thank the Minister for tearing himself away from the traditional and usual Ministry of Defence speech. I know that he is an avid reader of the Daily Record; can he therefore account for why we saw those headlines last week? What on earth happened on Tuesday night? Why were the regiments saved on Tuesday night, only to be told that it was nothing to do with the Prime Minister on Wednesday morning?

Mr. Ingram: I could say, "Stupid boy" to the hon. Gentleman. I wish that he would not ask me to account for newspaper headlines. I do not write the newspapers; I do not even read many of them, because the quality of information imparted is not good and does not deal with the breadth of issues. I take his point that I am an avid reader of MOD speeches. That is because these are important and technical matters, not debating points. The reason why I am setting this out at some length is so that, hopefully, the audience outside the Committee will understand the misrepresentation that has been going on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is not a Committee.

Mr. Ingram: I apologise for that technicality, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I mean outside the arena in which we are debating this issue. We hope also to get our argument over. That is important, because there has been a great deal of misrepresentation and misinformation.

I answered my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sarwan), who asked when we would impart that knowledge. I said that the plan is to do so before the Christmas recess.

Mr. Simpson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: No, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. We have many opportunities to debate these issues in defence debates, and I want to deal with the issues that have been raised this morning.

We have not set out to destroy the regimental system, or, as some have argued—although I have not heard it raised in this debate—to create a corps of infantry. Those accusations are simply not true. The regimental system has served the British Army extremely well, and we recognise that it is at the heart of the British infantry. It is vital that we maintain the traditions of the infantry, but that does not mean that the current structure is the right one for the future. That is where the debate lies.

Very few regiments and corps exist in the same form today as in the past. There has been a constant process of change and regeneration; new organisations have been created, which have maintained previous traditions while developing their own. Some of Scotland's regiments are perfect examples of that. The Royal Highland Fusiliers, which recruits in my area of East Kilbride, was formed in 1959 from the amalgamation of the Royal Scots Fusiliers and the Highland Light Infantry. They were previously the 21st Regiment of Foot and the 73rd Regiment of Foot. We can see the long traditions when we unravel what is inherent in the amalgamated and reformed regiments. It is important that traditions carry on in the new structures.

I have no doubt that the new structure for the infantry will not only contain existing geographical linkages, but enhance them. With soldiers and their families having the chance of greater stability, the result can only be even greater identity between regiments and their local communities. It is important that hon. Members understand that the decision to reduce the infantry by one battalion in Scotland and three in England was taken only after careful consideration of a number of factors. It was not a case of members of the Army Board meeting in a smoke-filled room and being told to get on with it: there was careful analysis by military planners and people who have spent all their lives serving their country.

Mr. Sarwar: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Ingram: I will give way in a moment. Had the Army Board looked only at the sustainability of manning, the options for the future of the infantry would be very different.

Mr. Sarwar: Does my right hon. Friend accept that if the historic and unique names of the regiments were lost, that would be detrimental to future recruitment?

Mr. Ingram: That becomes a point for debate, and I am coming on to recruitment. Over the past 10 years, compared with other regiments, Scottish regiments have had difficulty recruiting and retaining personnel. Of the six most undermanned regiments in the infantry, four were from the Scottish division. On average, over that period, the Royal Scots were undermanned by 126; the Royal Highland Fusiliers by 69; the King's Own Scottish Borderers by 39; the Black Watch by 73; the Highlanders by 83; and the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders by 32. That is not a criticism; that is a recognised fact.

I was speaking to a regimental sergeant-major of the Argylls recently, who said that Scotland cannot sustain six regiments. That was his opinion, but the fact of the matter is that he understands what many people have not grasped: demographic problems are affecting recruiting in Scotland. There is a declining population in the key areas of recruitment. Given the number of Scottish battalions, there is also an imbalance, and they struggle to recruit sufficient personnel. Per head of population, Scottish battalions need to recruit roughly three times the numbers of soldiers than other battalions. These demographics will become much more difficult in future. We must attend to the matter now, as we are thinking of the future.

I have tried to set out a range of issues that we are addressing within the Ministry of Defence, and I appreciate that there is a deep feeling about these matters. I am conditioned by it too because I represent a Scottish constituency, but I really do question the motives of some who raised the debate.

Benefit Office Closures

11 am

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): I shall commence as the highland retreat beats its way from the Chamber. I am pleased to have the opportunity to introduce a debate on benefit office closures, which are taking place not only in Wales but throughout the United Kingdom. I want to talk in particular about the impact of such closures on service delivery, as Parliament has not yet had an opportunity to explore that aspect—in fact, we have not had an opportunity to explore any aspect of the closures. The announcement was made at the very last hour on the very last day of the now defunct September recall, and we did not have time to digest it. We returned to our constituencies only to have jobcentre staff furiously phone us on Friday saying, "We must talk." It is a great pity that there was no consultation with members of the public, staff and unions before the announcement was made.

Since the announcement, in my constituency—I am sure that this is reflected throughout the UK—there has been a wave of concern, protest and real anger that the Government are implementing the plan. The anger has arisen in Wales because we have seen such a proposal before: the Conservative Administration brought in a blueprint for change about 10 years ago. The unions, Welsh Labour MPs, Plaid Cymru and, I am sure, the Liberal Democrats fought it tooth and nail, and we were successful. Benefits Agency offices, local processing facilities and not only jobs but services, too, were kept going in communities. The lack of response, particularly from Welsh Labour Back-Benchers, to the impact of the Labour Government's plans is therefore extremely disheartening.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): Like me, my hon. Friend is concerned that the bulk of the jobs that are likely to be lost—some 6,000 of them—will be lost from an objective 1 area in Wales, and that the whole change is predicated on the idea that the vulnerable in society will make their first contact by telephoning an office.

Mr. Thomas: I agree with my hon. Friend, and later I shall expand on that point. It is deeply ironic that whereas high street financial institutions are now reaching out to us saying, "We are opening branches again, you can contact us in person and you can have direct personal customer care," the Government are saying that any level or quality of service can be delivered via telephone or e-mail. I shall address the effect that that will have on disabled people, people with learning difficulties and the most vulnerable people in society, who use such services.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): It is indeed ironic that the private sector is genuinely decentralising but the public sector is centralising through such closures, and doing so in an entirely arbitrary way. The staffing levels that have been set for the centralised offices bear absolutely no relation to what it is possible to achieve in rural areas such as the hon. Gentleman's and mine. Customers will suffer because accountants are calling the shots.

Mr. Thomas: It always pains me to say this, but the hon. Gentleman has a good point. He is right to draw attention to the fact that an arbitrary staffing level has been set for call centres and that it cannot be sustained in rural areas. A whole swathe of territory in mid and west Wales—I am sure that many other parts of the UK are similarly affected—of more than 100 square miles, with 350,000 people in it, will not have a single office with a processing facility. All such work will be shoved to what I call the periphery of Wales, but other people prefer to call its main corridors, along the M4 or the A55 in the north. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the exercise is accountant-driven.

I wish to thank the staff and the union at my local office, the Aberystwyth benefit office and jobcentre. They have reacted magnificently to this threatening and disturbing news. They have come together and united behind local councillors and organisations such as Access Ceredigion, which is a disability rights organisation in my constituency, and Age Concern. We have persuaded Cambrian News, the newspaper for all mid-Wales, to run a campaign among its readers to retain the services in my constituency—and, I think, in that of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik).

We are discussing public services that at the moment are delivered directly to the public. They are worth fighting for. Civil servants do a decent job and deliver a good-quality service; we should not endanger the quality of services for the most vulnerable and needy.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): In my constituency, the Department for Work and Pensions plans to close the social security office completely, with the loss of 54 jobs. As my hon. Friend rightly says, those people are not faceless bureaucrats; they provide key front-line services to vulnerable members of our society. Does he agree that if the proposed closure goes ahead, it is likely that voluntary bodies and local authority welfare departments will be expected to pick up the pieces on the cheap?

Mr. Thomas: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right. As might be expected, all the hon. Members who have intervened have anticipated what I was about to say.

When the pension credit was introduced in my neck of the woods—I do not know about Perth—there was a huge increase in the number of pensioners who had difficulty contacting offices and understanding the system. Many pensioners came to see me, but I am sure they were only a fraction of those who approached the citizens advice bureau, the local authority, Age Concern or similar organisations that were trying to pick up the pieces on a voluntary basis, without being properly funded to do so.

It is convenient for the Government, as it has been for many financial institutions, to move the cost of accessing services from themselves to the individual, so that it is members of the public who pay for the national telephone call, the e-mail, to log on to the internet, or to be kept on the line for 10 minutes because the person they are talking to says they cannot find their record or their number. Companies have used that trick and now the Government want to use it as well, but that will not do, because we are talking about people who are receiving what the Government say is the minimum that they should have to live on—the minimum to which they are entitled because of a disability or other circumstances. There is a real threat in the Government's actions.

Wales has a problem with continuing disability and sickness benefits. Although it has been announced today that unemployment has increased slightly, it has generally decreased; despite that, the uptake of disability and sickness benefits is on the increase in Wales. That could in part have happened because the Benefits Agency has—rightly—reformed its culture in the past few years: it no longer refuses to tell people what they are entitled to, as it used to do under the Conservatives. The increase in take-up of such benefits is also due to a trend of moving people off the unemployment register and on to sickness and disability payments. The Government say that they now want to reverse that trend, but it will be difficult to do that and to deal with people without having the staff in the offices who understand what is going on in the community and the reasons why people make such claims.

We expect at least 6,000 job losses across the civil service in Wales. That is what the Public and Commercial Services union has forecast, and I think it is a fair estimate. It is a pro rata forecast based on the fact that we in Wales have a slightly higher number of civil servants per capita than elsewhere in the United Kingdom and a much greater reliance on public sector jobs: about 60 per cent. of our gross domestic product is public sector, compared with the UK average of 40 per cent. We are particularly concerned about the first wave of cuts, which will result in 2,000 jobs being lost as local offices are closed and centralised benefit processing centres are created. Those centres will have the minimum number of employees—150 or 200—needed to function. The Government have said that they must have that number of people.

The current system has many virtues. I will talk about my local Benefits Agency office, although practices may vary. The staff there have allocated claimants alphabetically. They know the claimants, so that when someone goes in to consult a member of staff, they talk to a person they met last week, or the week before that, or the previous year. They know that there will be face-to-face contact and that the member of staff will have local knowledge. The fact that the office is local means that a huge support mechanism is in place. In the public meeting that we called to discuss the closure—a very well attended public meeting in Aberystwyth—several people said how grateful they were to the staff for helping them, for example, through periods of bereavement when they did not know where to turn. It is difficult to provide that type of help on the phone, and impossible by e-mail. We all know how psychologically important it is to have eye contact with somebody who is in a state of distress and searching for advice and help. That eye contact will be lost if the office is closed.

I hope the Minister will be able to tell me what alternative procedures will be put in place. Obviously, I am arguing against any closures, particularly in mid-Wales, because we need to retain some provision between Llanelli and Wrexham, but if there are to be closures in Wales or elsewhere in the United Kingdom, what arrangements will be made so that a face-to-face service can continue to be delivered?

With pension credit, surgeries were set up. The only reason that pension credit worked at all in my constituency was that the local service in Swansea made a huge effort to hold local surgeries in the towns and villages of Ceredigion. They are still doing that, but one of the unseen side effects of the new policy that was not much publicised in the announcement is that that service, too, will be reduced. Both benefits processing and the Pension Service are to be hit by a 10 per cent. cut, which will remove the face-to-face link with pensioners. Furthermore, the Child Support Agency is to be hit with up to 50 per cent. cuts in face-to-face services. I have a large pile of CSA cases that I have been wrangling with for four or five years—I am sure that all hon. Members have similar piles. How much more frustrating will it be it if those individuals are not able to call in to a local office for an update about the problems that they are having with the Child Support Agency? Throughout mid and west Wales we will lose that service.

Owing to historical accident, we in Wales have a higher proportion of claimants than the rest of the UK. Our population is much more geographically dispersed than that of the UK. Closing the Aberystwyth office will mean that there are no offices between Llanelli and Wrexham. People living an area where—despite the fact that it is rural—car ownership is lower than average will be asked to travel longer distances.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Annabelle Ewing) remarked, the change will put pressure on voluntary organisations, councils, politicians and councillors to fill the gap. The primary disability rights organisation in my area, Access Ceredigion, has just lost its local authority funding and it closed last week. At the same time as these cuts are happening, the organisation that brought millions of pounds in extra benefits to Ceredigion is closing. Ten thousand people in Ceredigion claim some form of disability benefit, which is what happens when there is an ageing population in a seaside constituency. Those people will lose their direct contact and their ability to access support through the social fund, bereavement benefit and maternity allowance payments. The whole process will be removed from the local community and relocated at the other end of a phone, where it might not be got hold of.

We all know the history of numerous Government IT projects. One only has to consider the CSA—and when are the magistrates courts going to get their integrated computer system? I think that that system is about seven years overdue. We are putting a lot of faith in technology. We have kept two magistrates courts in Ceredigion, which shows that we have a record of fighting for local services and keeping them. We will try to do so again.

Services are being replaced by unreliable technology that cannot meet human needs, especially the needs of vulnerable people who are suffering and are uncertain about their rights and their future. As my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) remarked, it is ironic that this is happening in an objective 1 area—precisely the type of area that, as the Government acknowledged to the European Union, needs to be uplifted and supported. That means more than just an increase in wage levels in such areas. If people are in need of Government support, they should receive it.

It is doubly ironic that jobs are being lost from Aberystwyth just as the National Assembly decides to decentralise and put jobs back into Aberystwyth. Before anyone thinks, "Oh well, jobs are coming to Aberystwyth so I shouldn't be concerned," let me point out that the jobs in question were centralised 10 years ago by the Conservatives, so we are getting back only what was centralised by the previous Government, and now a Labour Government are centralising again. We are dealing with fashions and trends that go around but do not actually take service delivery into account. I am particularly concerned about that.

I have had lots of correspondence from those who use the service, and I want to read briefly from one constituent's letter, which I received at the start of the week. My constituent writes:

> "As a client of Aberystwyth Benefits Office I am hoping that the Government can be made to 'see sense'"—

I agree 100 per cent.

> "I am . . . on Income Support with a Disability Premium at age almost 58. I have no car", and my constituent lives five miles outside Aberystwyth, in the country.

> "I have found the staff at Aberystwyth Benefits Office very helpful and I am angry at the thought of them losing their jobs. If saving money is the Government's objective would it not be a better plan to avoid involvement in dodgy wars?"

The public know what is going on, even if some politicians do not.

> "If the Government can treat Ceredigion in this way, then I really feel the sooner we have control over all decisions for Wales, the better."

That is what is happening. The Government's policy is driving people to nationalism, so perhaps we should support that policy, but the fact is that the cuts are seen as an attack on local services and delivery. People are asking why a Labour Government are introducing them when the Labour party has always stood for local services and delivery and always opposed what the Conservatives have said. I see that there are no Labour Members from Wales present apart from the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies), who I understand is on duty this morning.

Finally, I turn to future savings. The statement that we received on 16 September—we have not had anything since—said simply that the modernisation programme > "will lead to more efficient and effective services for our customers".

That broad statement in no way addresses service delivery. It refers to the Government's objective of saving money, but it does not address the quality of services. However, I want to put on record my understanding that the maintenance and ownership of the buildings has now been put out to Land Securities Trillium Ltd., so when the buildings or offices are closed or run down, there is no huge saving for the Government, because the financial benefits of the offices go to the private company.

The plans need to be re-examined. It is a disgrace that we have not had an opportunity to debate them in detail in Parliament. I have not been able to go into great detail in the short time available, so I have concentrated on examples from my constituency and mid and west Wales. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy is to meet the Minister before long to discuss these matters further. As well as a delivery system for mid and west Wales, we need the Government to think again about how they treat the most vulnerable people in our society.

[Mr. Thomas]

11.18 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) on his impeccable timing in securing the debate—within hours of learning from the latest employment figures that 103,000 more people in Wales are in work, partly as a result of the contribution of Jobcentre Plus and partly because of the Government's overall macro-economic policies. More than 2 million people throughout the country are better off because of the individual efforts that staff have made in the past two years to help people claim the right benefit to move into work and to ensure that employers get the right people to fill their vacancies.

I was pleased to see in the Cambrian News, which I often read, that the hon. Gentleman regards the services provided by civil servants in Ceredigion as first class—indeed, he reiterated that point in his contribution. On their behalf, I thank him for those comments, and I add my own tribute to their work.

As Members of Parliament, we all have a responsibility and duty to fight to improve services in our local communities, but I say to the hon. Gentleman and to others who have contributed to the debate that fighting to improve services is not the same as fighting to maintain buildings. Through Jobcentre Plus and our range of other services, we are working in new ways. Of course, as we have made clear, the focus is to ensure efficiencies in the provision of services where possible, but it is also to ensure that we provide the highest-possible quality of service to the people whom we serve.

The ways of working are now different. Gone are the days when we expected jobseekers or pensioners to traipse along to a benefit office to collect their benefit, and then off to an employment office or a jobcentre to look for vacancy information. People physically had to go to the jobcentre to look at a bewildering array of jobs, and had very little support. Jobcentre Plus is not just about offices; it is about the service that we provide, day in, day out, to thousands of people. We are making sure that people can access services without having to go to a Jobcentre Plus office. Comprehensive information is available in local libraries and other places, as well as on the internet. Also, there is a touch-screen service through the job points, an increasing number of which are being installed in convenient locations, including our own offices. They are making more than 400,000 vacancies readily accessible. We are consulting locally on the most appropriate form of provision in each area.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) claimed that the changes were being made in an arbitrary way, and the hon. Member for Ceredigion supported him in that.

Lembit Öpik: My point—and, I am sure, the hon. Member for Ceredigion's—was that the threshold for how many staff are required to make a centre viable is arbitrary. We think that more than 100 members of staff are needed. That threshold is the arbitrary measure that makes it pretty much impossible for any centre in my constituency or the hon. Gentleman's to be viable.

Mr. Pond: Questioning how viable some of our jobcentres are is inevitable, since we are talking about very few staff serving very few people in some jobcentres. However, the numbers are not arbitrary. There is no clear and fixed threshold, although there are guidelines. District managers have to make a decision on how best to provide the highest-quality service to customers in each area. In doing that, they have been consulting with local MPs, local voluntary organisations, staff, the trade unions and many other organisations, including welfare groups, to find out how we can provide our service most efficiently and at the highest quality to the people whom we serve.

Mr. Llwyd: I confess that I have not been consulted at all about the closures. Let me mention one thing that disturbs many of us present today: at the beginning of May, the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions met the First Minister in Cardiff, and they discussed a range of subjects, but the Secretary of State did not even mention that the closures were on the horizon. Why did he not even consult the National Assembly for Wales?

Mr. Pond: I understand that the hon. Gentleman is having a meeting in the near future with my ministerial colleague, which will provide an ideal opportunity to run through some of his concerns. We would be happy for other hon. Members who have contributed to this debate to sit down with us and discuss some of the issues face to face, because we all recognise that these are important issues for our constituents. Valuable though today's opportunity to raise the issue is, it is not possible for us to talk through precisely how we will move ahead at local level during such a short debate, especially when we are talking about several different communities.

In trying to work out the best way forward, our plan is to take account of a wide range of factors in relation to the location of new centres. In some places, such as Aberystwyth, we can refurbish existing premises; in others, we are investing in brand-new acquisitions. We are to open a new 250-seat contact centre in Bangor by December 2005; that contact centre will play a pivotal role in the provision of Welsh language services. I am sure that hon. Members accept that that is one of the ways in which we can improve the provision of Welsh language services in a way that is not always possible through the current office structure. It is also important to stress that the choices remain subject to detailed planning, which is still ongoing. We welcome the discussions with Members on how we should move forward.

When a full Jobcentre Plus presence is neither practicable nor viable, we will adopt more flexible approaches, such as the installation of job points, the use of telephones that give direct access to our facilities and other services delivered through the premises of some of our partners—I am talking mainly about local authorities. Such approaches may be particularly helpful in some areas. We can also consider ways—postal signing, for example—of helping people who find it physically difficult to make the journey to a Jobcentre Plus building. We are running a pilot to establish how telephone signing might work, while making sure that the tailored provision of the personal adviser service is available to people who are able to visit the jobcentre. Sometimes, we shall be able to meet the travel costs of people who are not on a regular signing cycle so that they can get face-to-face support.

Mr. Simon Thomas: In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, the Minister talked about consultation and achieving the best way of delivering services to our communities. The statement of 16 September said clearly that the 37 sites will cease to be viable and will close altogether. Is the Minister now saying that if a strong case can be made on service delivery grounds for retention or for a change in those plans, he and his Department will be open to persuasion?

Mr. Pond: I am saying that we will have real discussions with hon. Members. However, they have to accept the fact that we seek to achieve two objectives: greater efficiency and better-quality provision. The assumption in this debate has been that there is a trade-off between the two, but I believe that we can achieve an improvement in both. We shall be happy to discuss the way forward with hon. Members in more detail than is possible in this debate.

In the last few minutes remaining, I should like to focus on staff, particularly those in Aberystwyth. That issue was also raised when we had to make rationalisations in office provision. I want to send out the message that we are committed to doing everything that we can to provide help and support for our staff, whose work we value greatly. We shall continue in our discussions with the trade unions. As we have said, redundancy will only be a last resort in this case, as elsewhere. We will do everything we can to help people to relocate, if that is necessary. We are talking to other Government Departments nationally to establish whether there are alternative forms of employment that people could pursue within the public service—we know of people's commitment to public service. We are currently in discussions with the Welsh Assembly and the Welsh Development Agency to establish whether, given their timetable and ours, we can work more closely together to make sure that jobs are available.

I emphasise that although we have to rationalise some of our processing procedures, we are increasing the overall number of front-line staff. Jobcentre Plus will increase customer-facing staff by 17 per cent. Through the substantial investment that we have made in recent years, we hope to achieve a more efficient system that will provide a better quality of service for the people whom we serve. That will allow us to continue to deliver a high-quality service, and although any job losses are regrettable, we are doing everything we can to minimise them. At the end of the day, the improvement in efficiency will release resources to make further progress towards achieving the objectives that everyone in this Chamber shares: dealing with the problems of child and pensioner poverty, and getting even closer to full employment than today's figures show.

Lebanon

2.7 pm

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): I rise to speak with some trepidation as a relative newcomer to this elevated plane of international relations. I was pleased to secure this debate because I have had a long-standing interest in Lebanon, and the British people have closely followed the issue for decades. Obviously, it was on television much more frequently during the dreadful happenings of the 1970s and 1980s, with the civil war and the Palestinian refugee camps, and the Israeli invasion in the 1980s, followed by occupation and events such as hostage taking, which is now commonplace in Muslim countries such as Iraq and Afghanistan. No one can forget the trials and tribulations experienced by the three hostages, Terry Waite, John McCarthy and Brian Keenan, in Lebanon during the 1980s. I have read all the accounts of their time in captivity when they were stowed away in darkness in a country that is full of light. They inspired this debate and my involvement in the all-party group on Lebanon.

Issues relating to Lebanon no longer appear so much on our television screens, and some people—such as Nabih Berri and Walid Jumblatt—who became household names as leaders of militia groups during the 1970s and 1980s have now moved into mainstream politics. I was a member of the parliamentary delegation—to which I shall refer later—and was lucky to visit Lebanon in September to meet both those people and other representatives of political parties in Lebanon.

One of the reasons why I am speaking in the debate is that I have been involved with the all-party group on Lebanon, which was formed last year to improve relations between ourselves and Lebanon and which has been reasonably active. I know that a lot of its members are not here today because they are abroad or because they have been delayed by the Division, but I want to pay tribute to people such as my hon. Friends the Members for Erith and Thamesmead (John Austin) and for Edmonton (Mr. Love), and the hon. Members for East Devon (Mr. Swire), for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) and for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), who have formed the nucleus of the all-party group. Those people are much more experienced in international relations than me, and they have helped me to feel my way through my role as an office bearer and as part of the deputation that went out to Lebanon in September.

I want to draw attention to the fact that this is the first time that Lebanon has been debated for a considerable period. The two previous debates took place on 15 July 1994, when John Gunnell, who was then the Member for Morley and Leeds, South, was successful in securing a debate on the refugee problem in Lebanon, and on 28 July 1989. Those debates took place a long time ago and since then there has not been much discussion in Parliament of the situation in Lebanon. It is worth making the point that when the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) stood up on 28 July 1989, he said that he was grateful for the opportunity to have that Adjournment debate. Like the one in 1994, it was a half-hour debate. I am glad to have an hour and a half for this debate, although I know that the Minister is supposed to go to Brussels today, and is stretched in that regard, so I will try to limit my comments.

The hon. Member for Canterbury said:

> "The public view is of a country filled with warring factions all as bad as one another, but I believe that that is not so and that, although no one faction or side is wholly blameless, we can make some sense of Lebanon, and it is in the West's interest, as well as being its duty, to do so."—[Official Report, 28 July 1989; Vol. 157, c. 1460.]

Those words about the west's understanding Lebanon and doing all that it can to aid it are as relevant today as they were then—even more so given what has happened internally in Lebanon in the past four or five months.

As part of a deputation from the Inter-Parliamentary Union, I was lucky to visit Lebanon at first hand and meet a wide range of people, from President Lahoud all the way through to people at the grass roots who were involved in health issues throughout the country. It was an interesting and informative visit, which was heavily promoted by our sister organisation in the Lebanese Parliament, the all-party UK friendship group, which is chaired by Mr. Yassine Jaber.

Yassine Jaber is an influential person. He is an MP for the southern part of Lebanon, which we visited as his guest. We visited the Fatima gate, as many people do, to see the border between Lebanon and Israel. It is a guarded frontier post, from which shots often come, but it was relatively quiet when we were there. Yassine Jaber took a lot of time to show us the country from the north to the south.

Yassine Jaber has played an influential role in creating in Lebanon a sense of the need to build bridges between the UK and the Lebanese Parliament. He was a Minister at some stage, and since the resignation of Prime Minister Hariri, he has been promoted on a temporary basis—I believe that the Administration in a formal sense is still being considered. He is now a Minister serving Lebanon. I am sure that, in that post, he will continue to highlight the need for better relationships between us and Lebanon.

Indeed, that was one of our major aims when we set up the all-party Lebanon group, with the Lebanese ambassador, Mr. Jihad Mortada, in attendance. We were looking to strengthen the ties between our two countries. It is amazing that most of the politicians in Lebanon have a dual existence. Obviously, they are based in Lebanon, but they have strong contacts elsewhere—many of them with the UK, if not with America and western Europe. They are keen to stress the need for better relationships to be struck between our two countries.

I also pay tribute to the hon. Members who came on the trip. The leader of the deputation, who cannot be here today, was my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd), who is active on the issue of reconstruction of Iraq. We also had my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Diana Organ), and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden), who is certainly interested in the Palestinian situation. I will refer to that issue in my summing-up.

It was important that we went and listened to what was being said. We went at a time when things were stable, despite all the troubles of the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s. An impressive range of reconstruction programmes are going on, primarily in Beirut, which is an impressive centre for any country. However, it was also a time when, despite that reconstruction, there was a lot of uncertainty in the country about where it stands politically, and about where politics there stand.

Just before we arrived, there had been the issue of the extension of President Lahoud's term of office, which was believed by many to be at the behest of the Syrians. That issue certainly caused a lot of controversy. A fairly substantial vote had carried that measure, but a significant number of people in Walid Jumblatt's group, and others—specifically the Maronite Christians—were unhappy about it.

Prime Minister Hariri was under a great deal of pressure while we were in Lebanon. He was the one politician whom we were unable to meet, because he was in Spain accepting an award, from the UN, I think, for the reconstruction of Beirut. He has gone because he was under considerable pressure, and has been replaced on a temporary basis by an MP from Tripoli, Prime Minister Omar Karameh. He has been Prime Minister before, but there are a whole set of uncertainties about the President, the status of the Prime Minister and the relationship between Lebanon and its closest ally and partner, Syria.

We arrived just after UN resolution 1559 was passed by the General Assembly in New York. That was the major issue of contention. Many people asked why that had been done, especially in Lebanon. There is an outstanding remit for the Syrian troops to leave Lebanon. I tabled an oral question and received a written answer from the Minister on that subject. People accept the need for the Syrians to go at some stage, but they are concerned about the strategic need for some Syrian presence to balance what they see as a threat to their integrity and independence from the Israelis.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West) (Lab): On that point, my hon. Friend speaks about things flying over the border from the Israeli side. On Monday, two rockets were fired in the other direction, into Israel. My hon. Friend will recognise that our relationship with Lebanon has the Syrian perspective and experience and the Lebanese experience of Syria in Lebanon bound into it. Given that Syria opposes the middle east peace plan, does he not think that if Syria took a more constructive position that would be good for us, the Lebanese and the Syrians?

Mr. Luke: I do not support the occupation, and a lot of people were unhappy about the occupation—or rather the presence, as it is not an occupation, of Syrian troops in the Lebanon. They feel that it is necessary for strategic reasons. It is a breach of the agreements set down in the Taif agreement in 1989, which talked about the eventual withdrawal of Syrian troops. However, there is a great deal of tension. The south of Lebanon is now dominated by the Hezbollah group, which has been on a war footing against the Israelis in the past and has taken the credit for moving the Israelis out of Lebanon. There is a series of tense border issues. The big issue put to us by the Members that we met was that they wished to keep as calm as possible. The Lebanese do not want to get involved in any conflict with Israel. They told us that they want to work constructively to discuss and resolve some of the issues that have been left open by the occupation.

Water is such an issue. There is a river in the south of Lebanon that flows through parts of the area still occupied by the Israelis, for example the Shebaa farms. That water needs to be used in the north of Lebanon for agriculture and cultivation as well as by the Israelis. The Lebanese want to discuss the arrangements positively with the Israelis.

There are tensions and the Syrians heighten them, so it is to the benefit of everyone to work for an agreement and that the Syrian presence is removed. It is not merely the Syrian presence that upsets people opposed to such actions in Lebanon. As well as the 15,000 troops placed there as a strategic force to balance out the Israelis, there are rumoured to be about 5,000 intelligence officers or people who are not attached to that force and who have an undue influence in Lebanese civil society. There is a need, under the Taif agreement, struck I think in September 1989, to modernise civil society and bring it up to date to what would be considered an acceptable norm for western countries. There is still progress to be made and the physical reconstruction has perhaps not been mirrored by such modernisation and the withdrawal of the Syrian troops.

That modernisation is an end goal. People in Lebanon accept that, but they are still worried about strategic issues related to ongoing problems with the Israelis. The point was made that it is only a 45-minute drive from the Israeli border to Damascus. One of the reasons that the troops are there is perhaps to hold back the threat if there were ever a war between those countries again. It is in everybody's interests to find a lasting and peaceful settlement to all the existing issues, and there are problems on all sides.

The problems I have mentioned were all raised on our visit and resolution 1559 is a specific ongoing issue. Part of our role was to discuss how the parliamentary scene in Lebanon could be safeguarded and improved, and how we could build links and act as a bridge. Lebanon has been a bridge between the west and Arab countries in the middle east, but we wanted to see how we, as parliamentarians from Westminster, could form another part of that bridge and bring about a two-way exchange of knowledge, friendship, understanding and, I hope, economic aspects.

The political situation is fluid at the moment rather than fixed. A lot of impressive work has been done in Beirut, but there is still a big economic problem. Most of the work has been done on borrowed money and there is a large deficit that will need to be controlled if Lebanon is to make economic progress. Despite the fact that Beirut is a cosmopolitan and westernised city, certain areas in the Beka'a valley, the north and the south, are very rural and poor and need attention. The British Council works in those areas. We did not get a chance to visit any British Council programmes—we would have liked to do so, but time was short and we needed to address a series of other ongoing issues during our time in Lebanon.

There is still the question of the 400,000 Palestinian refugees, some of whom have been in Lebanon since 1948, and some have been displaced in subsequent wars. There are issues about their ability to work and discrimination against them. There is a law that Palestinians are not able to hold jobs that would be done by professional people. I was not able to visit camps such as Shatila as the numbers allowed in were restricted, but my Liberal Democrat colleague did.

We met the United Nations Relief and Works Agency chief in Beirut. He raised the problem of money that has been received from organisations such as the Department for International Development but that cannot be used to put in proper sanitation or to make sure that medical services work properly because of the Lebanese Government blocking it. UNRWA operates all the medical centres and schools for those who live in the camps.

The British Government can do a lot to help reform and modernisation. The Westminster Foundation for Democracy has been doing a lot of work throughout eastern Europe and the middle east to see how we can assist people to improve and reform their situations. We should be taking a much more active role.

I come now to the Lebanese economy. We saw quite a bit of wealth in Lebanon. We were guests of the Deputy Prime Minister on his yacht. It would not embarrass the Queen to have such a yacht. He was flying out the next day to raise with the UN his unhappiness with resolution 1559. Such wealth, however, is not mirrored throughout the country.

We visited a new health centre in the south of the country. Although it was an impressive building, its equipment and treatment left much to be desired. It was a charitable institution, created by the Speaker of the National Assembly, Mr. Berri, and his family. Such institutions are set up by charitable establishments, not through Government or foreign aid.

The relationship of Syria and Lebanon must be addressed. In answer to a written question, my hon. Friend the Minister stated:

> "My Rt hon Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed the implications of UNSCR 1559 with Syrian Foreign Minister Shara'a when they met in London on 18 October. We will work for the withdrawal of Syrian presence and a strengthening of the Lebanese institutions."

Given that commitment, we would like to see more work done on such matters. My hon. Friend continued:

> "We expect all Lebanon's neighbours to respect Lebanon's sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence."—[Official Report, 9 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 623W.]

I sincerely hope that that happens.

Lebanon has made startling progress since its troubles. To an extent, it is a modern, vibrant society—more modern than Syria and other middle eastern countries. It is a country that prides itself on its relationship with the west, specifically the United Kingdom. We need to build on that to make sure that we have a strong ally in that area and that peace can emanate from that country throughout the region. I hope that the Government will do whatever they can in that area. I am sure that the all-party group and the Inter-Parliamentary Union will continue their activities. I am glad to have had a chance to initiate a debate on Lebanon and I am looking forward to hearing what others have to say.

2.27 pm

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): I wish to echo many of the thoughts of the initiator of the debate, the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke). I congratulate him on securing the debate because, when we returned from the IPU visit to Lebanon, we were all determined to raise issues in connection with that country. We want people to recognise the incredible change that has taken place within Lebanon in the past 10 years or so. It is impressive how the Lebanese have reconstructed Beirut, which so many of us remember from newsreel reports. It is a modern, vibrant city with new shops. It is the sort of place that it was perhaps 25 years ago.

Although the economy is undoubtedly fragile, improvements are taking place. Since my return, I have noted in the travel press much publicity to attract tourists back to Lebanon. Its enormous wealth of archaeological history would be extremely interesting to many people, and I encourage people to visit that country, which has not been on the tourist destination map for some time, to see its impressive display.

We received an amazing welcome and hospitality. For some time, Lebanon has felt a little isolated within the world community and it wants to welcome people back to the country. I hope that people will respond. Inevitably, it has difficulties and we caught glimpses of them from time to time. The Syrian influence is a two-edged sword. Clearly, some people feel that the Syrian presence has enabled the country to reach a more stable position and to sort itself out. However, others feel that the Syrians have outstayed their welcome and become rather too engaged in some aspects of public life. A case can be made for both those views.

Nobody whom we met—whatever their political stance and whether they were from the poorer or richer end of the economic spectrum—wanted to go back to how it was 10 years ago. They will do anything that is necessary to ensure that that does not happen. That is the strength of their desire to go forward; they recognise and remember the terrible things that happened during the civil war and do not want to return to that situation. Although things are not perfect, politically or economically, there is a great will and desire to make things better and not to go back.

Let me say a few words about the Palestinian camps. I was able to visit Shatila. To those who have been to Gaza, I can say that Shatila camp is every bit as bad, except that one can step outside and, within some 25 m, can be on a modern highway with the impressive buildings of an ordinary city, Beirut. Not only Palestinians live in the camp; Syrians, Lebanese and others live there. Nevertheless, there is undoubtedly a need to try to establish some basic living conditions. The camp is in need of proper clean water, sanitation and protected power. It was horrific to see major electric cables snaking along the alleyways, through puddles of water, with five to seven-year-old children playing next to them. Those of us who have been brought up with health and safety measures and security concerns were horrified. Those are some of the basic things that could be achieved. I hope that, whatever difficulties the Lebanese authorities have—I know that they have some; we discussed the matter with the ambassador—it will be possible to bring some health and safety measures and basic sanitation and water to the people there, regardless of who they are.

Let me also mention our visit to the border with Israel. That was an interesting experience, in that there is a wire fence and it is very clear that Israel is on one side and Lebanon is on the other. Inevitably, there is a feeling that "If you stay on your side and we stay on our side, we can get on." I suspect that there will not be a meeting of minds, but the fact that there is a clear border, respected by both sides, whatever their continuing animosities and political situation, provides an opportunity for peaceful coexistence.

I hope that many of the things that we saw in Lebanon—the creation of an agreed border and the maintenance of people living either side of it—can be translated into the situations in other parts of the middle east that are experiencing difficulties. Beirut can give hope to the sorts of places that we have seen in the occupied territories and now, sadly, in Iraq, in Falluja—

Mr. Joyce: Does the hon. Gentleman think that there is a case for persuading Hezbollah to change its behaviour on the border? Was that what he said? We would all want that to happen.

Mr. Breed: As I said, there is no doubt that people in Lebanon do not want to go back to the past. They recognise the difficulties but do not want to magnify them. They recognise that there will be differences of opinion, but they certainly do not support a return to violence in any way. I think that some influence can be brought to bear on the militia that still have some camps and still have a presence in Lebanon. I think that they are beginning to understand that the Lebanese people do not want such a situation in their country. They want to get on with their lives, pursue peace, build their economy and get away from the things that we saw in the past. Perhaps they can provide an example to others in the way that they handle the militia and the terrorists within their borders.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): First, I apologise profusely to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke), who initiated the debate, for arriving late. I would like to press the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) on Hezbollah's role on the border. Surely a militia such as Hezbollah should be replaced by the Lebanese army in the border area. That would give confidence to everyone in the region.

Mr. Breed: I agree and I hope that such a move will take place. The Lebanese want to control their own security. In line with that, they would ultimately like the Syrian presence to be removed, so that they can deal with the proper security of their own people. That may be a little way ahead, but they are moving in the right direction all the time. To an extent, the passage of time assists the process. As I said, people are determined not to go backwards but to look for ways to improve their democratic processes, which are not perfect as yet, and their internal economy, which is still subject to considerable corruption. People recognise that and are trying to bear down on it. They recognise that they have a critical role to play in the middle east, not least because of the Palestinian refugees who are still within their borders. I wish them well. I was impressed and came away from Lebanon far more optimistic than perhaps I was when I went there. I hope that that optimism will be seen to be well placed as we see the country make progress in future.

2.38 pm

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed), who understands the situation in the middle east and has a strong commitment to it and particularly to issues relating to Palestine, which was reflected in his speech. I pay particular tribute to the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke), who initiated the debate. He modestly suggested that he was not qualified to do so, but clearly he and his colleagues in the IPU have done the House a very important service through their work in Lebanon. We hope that they will continue and develop that in future.

Given the time constraints on the Minister and others, and given the strange business in the main Chamber this afternoon, I hope to be brief, although perhaps I shall not quite be finished before the next interruption. I shall seek to avoid repeating points that hon. Members have already made, except in a couple of cases.

Most of us associate Lebanon with the difficulties of the 1970s, '80s and '90s. That region of the world was barely out of the television headlines, for terribly sad reasons, throughout that period. It has still had its troubles recently, although there has been a great deal of progress. As both contributors so far have highlighted, the economic situation in the country is fragile, even if it is making progress. Many problems still surround the politics of the country, not least because of the complex demographics and the religious mix. All that has been reflected in the recent, slightly difficult goings-on to do with the country's constitutional arrangements. Lebanon has important democratic credentials in a region where that is sometimes a rare experience. Our concern is that what we have seen in recent times might lose the Lebanese people those valuable credentials. The political crisis in the country has created real unease, to a sufficient degree that the United Nations Security Council passed resolution 1559, expressing anxiety about the need for free elections, to disarm the armed militias and for foreign forces to be withdrawn. Syria's 15,000 or so troops are clearly the main concern, and we should certainly like to see them being withdrawn in line with that UN resolution as quickly as possible.

The security situation in Lebanon is difficult, both internally and because of its strategic significance in the middle east. The proximity of Israel and Syria has led to much conflict and the threat of further conflict. Understandably, Syria has a concern about Lebanon and has been a key player at many of the crucial moments of Lebanon's history and development. However, our fear is that Syria is now overplaying its hand, and must recognise that the concerns of the international community are legitimate by complying with the recently passed resolution.

It is understandable that Israel has concerns about its own security situation. For decades, Lebanon has been used—by Lebanese or others—as a base from which to attack Israel. The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Joyce) rightly pointed out the recent attacks from Hezbollah, and there is evidence that they have developed new technology and new capabilities that can only make that situation more difficult. The whole position centres around, and will come to bear on, the middle east peace process. I conclude by saying that we have heard, since President Bush was re-elected and the Prime Minister visited him, that the middle east peace process will be the cornerstone of their foreign policy. We must hope that we shall see the fruits of that in Lebanon, sooner rather than later.

[Mr. Michael Moore]

2.42 pm

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): I start by congratulating the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke), not just on securing the debate but on reporting to us on his recent interesting visit to Lebanon. We pay tribute to the work of the all-party Lebanon group, which is designed to increase relations with that country, and we hope that that goes well. Although the hon. Gentleman has described himself as a newcomer to international relations, both in this debate and in others in which he has taken part, he in fact speaks like a veteran and brings depth and understanding to our debates, for which we thank him.

I also thank the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed), whom I know well as a near neighbour, for his encouraging report on what the all-party group found in Lebanon on its visit. I am aware that I am about to be interrupted, but I should like to put on the record a few thoughts about that strategic country. In biblical times, the name Lebanon was synonymous with prosperity and riches, and many references to cedars and wine from Lebanon were a tribute to its fertility, fruitfulness and prosperity. It was, perhaps, the most prosperous part of the region.

Mr. Luke: The hon. Gentleman refers to the cedars of Lebanon. The Lebanese are still very proud of them, although the actual number of cedar trees is being reduced. There is, however, a very progressive programme—I do not know how well it is going—to reforest much of Lebanon with cedars.

2.44 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

2.56 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Streeter: Sadly, to anyone growing of our generation, the names of Lebanon and Beirut are synonymous with conflict, destruction, civil war and strife. However, we have had a happier report from the two hon. Gentlemen who have just come back from Lebanon. Indeed, since the Taif accord there has been a growing measure of stability in the country, which is extremely welcome. Beirut is once again a bustling and safe city, and prosperity is returning, although, as has been mentioned, Lebanon has a debt overhang problem, which it must tackle. None the less, we welcome those more positive reports and, as we know, there is a strong Lebanese community in the United Kingdom, which makes a positive contribution to this country.

Issues of concern have been raised, including Hezbollah's continued presence in Lebanon, particularly on the southern border, and its aggressive attitude towards Israel. I hope that the Minister will touch on Government policy towards Hezbollah.

Mr. Love: If one reads the reports about activity at the border, one sees that they normally speak of finely tuned rules working between Hezbollah and the Israeli authorities. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that although there continues to be friction on the border, it is well controlled?

Mr. Streeter: I think the hon. Gentleman is right. In the turmoil of the middle east, the current situation on the border is relatively calm and peaceful, although there are incidents. It was he, I think, who suggested that Hezbollah's presence on the border should be replaced by a proper Lebanese border control, and that would be most welcome.

The continued presence of Syrian forces and Syria's continued reach into Lebanese politics are, of course, matters of concern. We have heard reference to Security Council resolution 1559, which was passed recently and which we support. It would be interesting to hear how the Government intend to continue the conversation with Syria on complying with that resolution. I would be interested in the Minister's assessment of the Lebanese population's attitude towards the Syrian presence. We have heard that it takes some comfort from their presence because of concern about Israeli attitudes, and that is understandable, but it would be interesting to hear the Minister's take on that.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East expressed concern at recent events, including the extension of President Lahoud's term of office. Such things sometimes happen around the globe, although they nearly always happen in controversial circumstances and nearly always turn out to be a mistake. I would be interested to hear the Government's view of that extension, of the resignation of Mr. Hariri and his Cabinet, and of the implications the new Prime Minister might have for stability in the country.

It is reassuring to hear from the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall that the people of Lebanon do not want to go back to the old days of strife and civil war, but it would be interesting to know the Government's assessment of the implications for stability of recent changes. We have also heard about recent opportunities for a new initiative on the middle east peace process. Those opportunities are there—with the Prime Minister's commitment and President Bush's recent words and, we hope, a new Palestinian leader to be elected on 9 January, whom the Palestinian people will get behind and who will support engagement in the peace process and withdrawal from Gaza. All of those things are positive.

Will the Minister comment on the engagement, or lack thereof, of Syria and Lebanon in the road map and the middle east peace process? Does he think that there should be a greater buy-in to that process by and for them, and that they should be bound to an overall settlement? Does he intend to raise the situation in Lebanon with President Chirac while he is in the country, to see if the President of France can shed any light on the situation, given their long relationship?

Is not the situation in Lebanon an example of how complex it is to try to increase democracy in the middle east? That country has some kind of elections, but not as we know them. Whatever we do to encourage democracy in any middle east country, or anywhere else in the world, is it not important that any such democracy has its own local flavour and grows out of the community, provided that the rule of law, freedom of speech and some kind of representative governance are part and parcel of that democratic process? It should not be about exporting Westminster or US-style democracies, or about imposing anything on those people; it should be about encouraging their version of democratic principles to take root and take hold.

Is it not also the case that, of necessity, the pace of change will be slow in most middle east countries, and that we would be mistaken to try to force the pace of change at an unsustainable rate? We can take some encouragement from the progress that Lebanon has made over the past 10 years. It will be interesting to hear the Government's view on the likely impact of recent changes.

The plight of Palestinian refugees has been mentioned. What future does the Minister think they will have if we are fortunate enough to see some kind of final status agreement reached between Israel and Palestine in the next three to six months? How will that affect the 400,000 Palestinians living in the refugee camp that was described so vividly by the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall? Does the Minister believe that some of them will have the opportunity to return to Palestine or Israel under the right-to-return proposals, or is their future to remain in Lebanon? If so, I strongly support the call for improved facilities for them.

3.3 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) on securing the debate, throughout which he demonstrated his knowledge and understanding of the political situation in Lebanon. His comments, and those of other hon. Members, showed a degree of modest confidence that progress is being made in the Lebanon; that came through strongly in several hon. Members' contributions. I welcome this chance to set out the Government's view, not only of the difficulty facing the Lebanon, but of the opportunities that exist for it to prosper and make a real contribution to peace and stability in the region.

Britain has had long, close and constructive relations with the Lebanon. The two countries are joined by ties of affection dating from the Lebanon's achievement of independence, with British support, in 1943. Lebanon's sovereignty and independence continue to be of special importance to us. Lebanon has historically done a great deal to develop modern political thought in the Arab world as a whole, and has brought to that role the tolerance, learning and openness that are marks of its society. Lebanese educational institutions retain their leading place in the region, and the vigorous, lively ethos of the Lebanese media, which enjoys a wide degree of freedom, has been a positive stimulus to the emergence more widely of an increasingly open and free Arab press. Those elements—modern education and a free press—are essential to the development of what the people of the region aspire to more than anything else. Many of us who travel to that part of the world would underline that point.

Democratic forms of government derived from the Arab world's long and rich culture are also important; that relates to the point made by the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter). Such government does not mean that we simply transplant the systems that we have in the west; it means the emergence of a home-grown version of democracy from the needs and aspirations of an increasingly articulate Arab public opinion—a version that fits the culture, mores and traditions of the country. That is how the process should go forward.

I started by describing Lebanon's cultural influence on the region. It would not be enough to consider the situation in Lebanon without setting that in the wider political, international and regional context; that is why Britain attaches particular importance to the health of Lebanon's democratic institutions, which reflect a long tradition of parliamentary rule successfully practised in the region. Those institutions are under pressure at the moment, and our concerns should be directed towards them.

My hon. Friend raised the issue of United Nations resolution 1559. One of the reasons that led the Government to support that resolution was our concern that foreign intervention in the operation of Parliament, the Government and the judiciary is unacceptable, and is degrading and damaging the ability of Lebanon to face important policy challenges with the necessary commitment and support of the Lebanese people. We share the concern of many Lebanese citizens about corruption in the public sector, the ultimate inability of Governments over a number of years to provide adequate economic and social policies and the weaknesses of the judicial system.

My hon. Friend asked a question about resolution 1559. I shall paraphrase him; I think that his point was that he recognised the need for Syria to withdraw from Lebanon, but had worries in the short term about the results of complete withdrawal and what would fill the vacuum. In response, I say that we welcome the withdrawal of Syrian troops that has already taken place. With the international community, we will work with the Lebanese Government to assist them in the development of their own security forces. That has to be a key factor. One of the key terms of resolution 1559 is the disarming of the militia, particularly of Hezbollah. A number of hon. Members have raised that issue, which is a key element of the process.

The concerns that I have addressed are shared by many of Lebanon's other friends abroad. The strategic aim of the European Union's Mediterranean programme and the new European neighbourhood policy, with Britain's full support, is to bring improvements to the quality of governance in countries such as Lebanon. Only with such improvements, based on a strict respect of the rule of law and for Lebanon's independence, will Lebanon be able to meet its many challenges.

[Mr. Bill Rammell]

Lebanon borders the European Union, and its stability, prosperity and success, like that of all countries in the region, is a major European interest to which we fully subscribe. That is why Europe is offering assistance to Lebanon in the form of the technical co-operation offered under the European Union-Lebanon association agreement, and that is an important, positive step forward. I believe that that mechanism will soon be ratified. We also have a small bilateral assistance programme, and, as my hon. Friend said, the British Council contributes to education and the cultural industries. As important is the consistent political support that we give the principles of democracy and independence that were recently enshrined in the Security Council resolution to which I referred.

As my hon. Friend said in his opening comments, Lebanon has an integral role to play in the search for a just and lasting settlement of the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians, which would include a solution to the conflict between Israel and its neighbours Lebanon and Syria. Since the implementation of UN Security Council resolution 425, Lebanon has had no fundamental quarrel with Israel, and that has been a welcome development. The occupation by the latter of Shebaa farms, which Lebanon claims is its territory and which Israel and the United Nations Security Council considers to be Syrian, is as much a symptom as a cause of the continuing tension in the wider region. That and other territorial issues will ultimately be solved by negotiation between the parties concerned, within the road map framework. That has to be the way forward.

The long-standing division between Israel and Palestine is at the core of the problem in the middle east, but there are associated conflicts that must also be addressed within the road map process.

Mr. Love: I rise to take up the point of the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter). There appears to be no room in the road map process for some of the states that any solution will have an impact on. That is strongly felt in Lebanon. When the road map process begins again, can efforts be made to involve all the states in the region?

Mr. Rammell: That was the point that I was trying to make. The concerns of neighbouring states where there are residual and continuing conflicts that impact on the overall middle east peace process must be taken into account. That is set out in the road map process; those issues must be resolved.

It is a matter of real concern to us that the Hezbollah militia continues to maintain a state of tension along the blue line, with the encouragement of Iran and Syria and the acquiescence of the Lebanese authorities. Israel also bears its share of responsibility for that tension as a result of its frequent illegal and provocative invasions of Lebanese air space. However, we are discussing Lebanon, and the UN Security Council has made clear the requirement on the Lebanese Government to end the operations of the Hezbollah militia and to extend their effective control over all their territory. That obligation extends equally to those states that fund and support Hezbollah. We urge restraint and good sense from all parties.

Mr. Luke: The Minister has referred to Hezbollah, but would he pay tribute to Ayatollah Fadlallah in Lebanon, who is very moderate and preaches co-operation and dialogue between communities—Sunni, Shi'a and Maronite Christian—in order to build a new understanding that bridges the religious divides in the country?

Mr. Rammell: Progressive voices that preach moderation, tolerance and understanding are to be welcomed from wherever they come.

We welcome Lebanon's commitment to fighting terrorism, which it recently demonstrated by arresting al-Qaeda terrorists who were planning to attack the Italian embassy in Beirut in September. We would like to help the Lebanese to build a better counter-terrorism capacity within the rule of law, through more effective policing, better border control, and aviation and maritime security. Earlier this year, the Metropolitan police visited Lebanon to review how we might help its internal security force and we are considering how to take that assistance forward. I think that all parties would welcome that.

I understand that some hon. Members visited the camps housing Palestinian refugees during the IPU visit in September. To echo some of the concerns expressed in the debate, the Government are concerned by the living conditions of Palestinians in camps in Lebanon. We have made that known to the Lebanese Government on a number of occasions. We would welcome action from them to improve the situation of the Palestinian population living in Lebanon by allowing them easier access to education and opportunities for better paid employment.

Ultimately, the answer to the problem is a permanent peace settlement of which a just resolution of the refugee question would be a part. It would be best if that were pursued as part of the road map. The UK fully supports the Quartet's efforts to achieve a political solution that will deliver a better future for all Palestinians.

Mr. Love: I thank the Minister for his generosity in giving way. I wanted to touch briefly on the Palestinian camps. The important point to stress is that the hopelessness in those camps breeds terrorist activity. If we are not careful, that will become a factor not only in the Lebanese situation, but more widely. It is therefore important that the Government make that entirely clear and known to the Lebanese authorities.

Mr. Rammell: I need to be clear: nothing justifies terrorism. Nevertheless, I understand the thrust of my hon. Friend's point. The issue of the injustice felt by refugees in those camps has to be addressed; that was my point. We put our views about the condition of the refugees in those camps to the Lebanese Government.

The hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed), who is leading for the Liberal Democrats, referred to the middle east peace process and the Government's recent initiatives to re-inject some urgency into the process. I can tell him that the issue is genuinely consuming time within Government; it is a real priority for us. Nothing could contribute more towards beginning to rebuild and tackle divisions in the world than finding a solution to conflict in the middle east. However, that is easier said than done, although it is a priority for the Government. The Prime Minister has made it clear that it is a personal priority, and that was a central feature of his discussions with the US President at the end of last week.

The hon. Member for South-West Devon talked about the Syrian presence flowing from the internationally supported Taif accord. It is important to make it clear that that has contributed to the past decade's stability in Lebanon. The Lebanese people recognise that, but they want to move on. Parliamentary elections are due in 2005, and we are certainly of the view that territorial integrity, independence and democracy in Lebanon are paramount in that process. It is fundamentally for the people of Lebanon to determine their country's relationship with Syria.

I finish by again congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East on securing this debate, which has allowed us to discuss a number of issues affecting Lebanon. As highlighted by the recent UN Security Council resolution, it remains a country of great interest to the United Kingdom and the wider international community. My hon. Friend referred to the fact that it has been a long time since there has been an Adjournment debate on the subject, and I hope that it will not be too long before we have another opportunity. I also thank all hon. Members involved in this debate for their co-operation in helping me with my personal commitment to get to a train in time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should explain what is about to happen. In this place, time is relative—well, it is relative anyway, in a mathematical sense, but in this place it is very relative. The next debate is due at 3.30 pm, as we have now caught up the time lost. If there is a Division before then, the sitting will be suspended for 15 minutes from the start of that Division. That Division has to be no later than 3.31 pm precisely. The sitting is suspended.

Guantanamo Bay (UK Detainees)

3.23 pm

Mr. Roger Godsiff (Birmingham, Sparkbrook and Small Heath) (Lab): First, I welcome the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin). I am particularly pleased that he is here. It has been a long time since we crossed swords—in fact, I believe it was in the early 1980s, when my good friend was at the forefront of the Bennite crusade for socialism in the Labour party while I was on the side of sanity. Since then I have watched with interest his progress along the road to ministerial office, moving from Bennite to born-again Blairite. I make those points because I hope that in this debate my hon. Friend will revert to his old self and show some of the campaigning principles that he showed when fighting the case of the Birmingham Six, who were unjustly imprisoned on charges that subsequently proved to be totally false. He played an honourable role in that fight.

Sadly, there are many hundreds of prisoners of different nationalities currently detained at Guantanamo Bay, including four British citizens: Feroz Abbasi, Martin Mubanga, Richard Belmar and my constituent Moazzam Begg. Let me say at the start that I have consistently supported action by the international community against international terrorism, which is a threat to us all; the civilised values that we stand for must be upheld and fought for. The perpetrators of 9/11, the Bali bombings and the Madrid outrages have to be pursued and destroyed, but we stand for bringing people accused of such crimes before courts of law, for democracy, for freedom of speech and for the rule of law. If we not prepared to offer those rights to people who are accused of such serious crimes, we bring ourselves down to the same level as international terrorists.

I first raised the incarceration of my constituent, Moazzam Begg, nearly three years ago. Had anybody told me then that three years later I would still be raising his case, I would not have believed it; nor would I have believed that he would still be imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay. Although the process is currently suspended, Moazzam Begg and Feroz Abbasi still face the possibility of being brought before a US-style military commission, where the military personnel acting as interrogators, prosecutors, defence counsel, judges and—in cases where the death penalty is imposed—executioners are all appointed by the US Defence Secretary.

Three years ago, I would not have believed that Moazzam Begg and other British citizens could remain in the legal, physical and mental black hole of Guantanamo Bay, even though no charges that are recognisable in international law have been laid against any of them, no evidence has been presented of their guilt, and no access to independent legal counsel has been provided for them. I would not have believed that we could have a US Government who make no pretence that Guantanamo Bay is covered by the Geneva conventions—the men are designated enemy combatants, not prisoners of war. Equally, I would not have believed that representatives of the US judiciary have, almost unanimously, had to petition courts in America, including the Supreme Court, to make it clearly known that Guantanamo Bay is unconstitutional.

[Mr. Roger Godsiff]

Each person who is detained in Guantanamo Bay is kept in a wire-mesh cell 6 ft 8 in by 8 ft and allowed out for 20 minutes solitary exercise three times a day. There is growing evidence that torture has been used at the camp. The simplest considerations that any detainee should have—for example, the right to be visited by members of his or her family—have been denied to the four British citizens in Guantanamo Bay, including my constituent.

Originally, I went along with the Foreign Office viewpoint that publicising Moazzam Begg's case could damage his long-term prospects. The Foreign Office suggested that if I raised the profile of the case, it could impede any future visits to Mr. Begg by his family, when such visits were allowed, and the flow of news about their son that the family so desperately needed. However, that was before the true nature of what has been happening in Guantanamo Bay came out—and that was more than three years ago.

Freedom is something we in the House seek to uphold as democrats. A former American Republican presidential candidate, Wendell Wilkie, who stood just after the second world war, once said:

> "Freedom is an indivisible word. If we want to enjoy it, and fight for it, we must be prepared to extend it to everyone, whether they be rich or poor, whether they agree with us or not, no matter what their race or the colour of their skin."

Let me add to that the first paragraph of an editorial from the The Mail on Sunday on 6 July 2003. I do not wish to be disrespectful, but that paper is not noted for its libertarian attitude towards civil rights. None the less, the editorial stated:

> "Let us be blunt here. If the men involved were white and Christian, and if the country behaving like this was anywhere but the USA, the Prime Minister would already have sent the Foreign Secretary on wings of wrath to demand their handover for trial here."

It is certainly the belief of the wider Muslim community in this country that double standards are being applied in respect of the British Government's attempt to get those four British citizens returned to the United Kingdom.

It appears that the Prime Minister—

3.37 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Godsiff: As I was saying, it would seem that the Government's position as enunciated by the Prime Minister, who is a lawyer, as is his good wife, is that the British detainees should be either tried fairly in accordance with international standards or returned to the United Kingdom. I welcome that. The Government have expressed strong reservations to the US Administration about the use of military commissions and legal proceedings against two British detainees have been suspended. I welcome that, too. The Government requested that nine British detainees be returned to the UK, and five were returned in March. All British detainees have now been informed of the combatant status review tribunals and of their right to challenge in United States courts the legality of their detention with regard to their status as enemy combatants and not as prisoners of war. I welcome all those things—I welcome all the work done by the Government and the Foreign Office to try to resolve the situation—but is it enough? Was it ever enough? How much longer will the process run? For months? For years?

Last weekend, the Prime Minister went to the United States to renew our special relationship with the new Administration. I would like to know whether the four British detainees, including Moazzam Begg, were discussed while he was there. The clear perception of the community in Birmingham is that the Government are feeding off crumbs from the American Administration. In the meantime, the family of Moazzam Begg have to survive on welfare reports passed on by the Foreign Office.

My constituent and those other British citizens still live under threat of being tried by a military commission, so I ask the Minister to state for the record what the British Government will do if the Bush Administration decide to continue with the commissions. Will the Government deem that the process has been a failure? Will the Prime Minister refuse to accept his congressional medal of honour? Will the FCO continue to deliver welfare reports to the Begg family when Moazzam faces possible execution, or a life sentence with no prospect of early release? In short, do the Government have a plan B, and if so, would the Minister like to tell us what it is?

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate. Last week, I had the privilege of meeting the families of Richard Belmar and Martin Mubanga. The lives of those men and their families are the small change of international diplomacy, but, as my hon. Friend said, two or three years after these events started, the families remain desperate. They do not understand why a Prime Minister who is supposedly the Bush Administration's best friend in the world cannot secure a charge and a proper trial for the men. It may be that Ministers, as in the Birmingham Six case, have given a nod and a wink and asked, "What were the men doing out there anyway, to get picked up?" but I would argue that, as British citizens, the men are entitled to be charged and subjected to a fair trial.

Mr. Godsiff: I entirely concur with my hon. Friend. Again, I make it plain that we must pursue international terrorists who carry out evil atrocities. As an individual MP, I consistently supported the war against international terrorism and the invasion of Afghanistan in pursuit of the al-Qaeda organisation. I opposed the invasion of Iraq because I believed that it was a distraction in the war against international terrorism. However, what separates us from the international terrorists is the fact that we respect the rule of law that underpins our democratic society. When we catch people who we believe are involved in international terrorism, we undermine our own values unless we try them in accordance with our laws.

I return to the editorial in The Mail on Sunday, to which I referred earlier. It begins:

> "More than 200 years after they were written, the words of America's Bill of Rights still speak clearly and forcibly: 'In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy trial by an impartial jury . . . and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favour; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.'"

The basic rights that were written into the American constitution are being denied to four British citizens who are incarcerated at Guantanamo Bay. I end by quoting the words of Moazzam Begg himself. In a letter written by him and published recently, he states:

> "I am a law-abiding citizen of the UK and attest vehemently to my innocence before God and the law of any crime—though none has ever been alleged. I have neither ever met Osama Bin Laden, nor been a member of al Qaida—or any synonymous paramilitary organisation, party or group. Neither have I engaged in hostile acts against the USA, nor assisted such groups in the same . . . I reiterate my intention to seek justice at every possible level available".

Is not that the least that we can give him?

3.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): Let me say at the outset that I share the frustration of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook and Small Heath (Mr. Godsiff) at the circumstances in which his constituent and others have been detained. I assure him that the Government have been doing everything in their power to resolve the matter—in fact, I would go so far as to say that no Government with citizens detained at Guantanamo Bay have worked harder to try to resolve the situation.

Since the first British national was transferred to Guantanamo Bay in 2002, we have repeatedly and persistently pursued the issue with the United States authorities including, as my hon. Friend acknowledged, at the highest level. The Prime Minister has raised it with President Bush; the Foreign Secretary has raised it with the Secretary of State, Colin Powell; the Attorney-General has led talks with the US Government; and Ministers, senior officials and lawyers have pursued the matter relentlessly and will continue to do so.

We have achieved some success. The release of five of the nine detainees earlier this year was the result of representations by the British Government. We have blocked the trial by military commission of two of the remaining four detainees and, as my hon. Friend acknowledged, we have secured improvements in the conditions in which the detainees have been held. The most recent example of that is the removal of Moazzam Begg and Feroz Abbasi from a form of solitary confinement and into the main detention camp. That was a response to our concerns about their isolation and lack of access to daylight.

The UK's overall position in relation to British nationals at Guantanamo Bay has been made clear from the outset. It is more or less the same as the one enunciated a moment ago by my hon. Friend: British detainees should either be tried fairly, in accordance with international standards, or they should be returned to the UK. With regard to the four remaining detainees, discussions at official level explored whether there was any prospect of providing an alternative trial process to the military commissions, but it has not proved possible to reach an agreement. In June, the Prime Minister personally repeated our request that the four be returned to the UK, and he raised Guantanamo again with President Bush during their talks in Washington last week. The United States Government has expressed its reluctance to return the remaining detainees because of security concerns. Our discussions with the US are continuing and we are seeking to address their concerns in the hope that the four might be returned.

It might be helpful if I explain the various legal proceedings surrounding the detainees. My hon. Friend will be aware of the habeas corpus cases in the US district court, one of which has been brought on behalf of his constituent. The cases follow the Supreme Court's June ruling that detainees have the right to challenge the legality of their detention. US lawyers have now visited those involved in those cases, including Mr. Begg, and we welcome that. The Government have been asked to submit an amicus curii brief in one of the cases, and we are now examining the petition. My hon. Friend will also be aware of the ruling last week in a US district court in the case of Guantanamo detainee Salim Hamdan. The court rejected the US Government's argument that the third Geneva convention did not apply to al-Qaeda detainees captured in Afghanistan. It decided that a detainee must be afforded prisoner of war status until a competent tribunal decides otherwise, and stated that neither a combatant status review tribunal nor the US President is a competent tribunal for those purposes.

Ms Abbott: Is the Minister able to say that the Government are confident that there is no substance to the allegations of physical torture at Guantanamo Bay?

Mr. Mullin: I shall come to those allegations, but at the moment I am dealing with the ruling of the US district court last week, which I think is relevant to the situation of the detainees. The court held that trial by military commission would be unlawful as long as the rules of procedure allowed for the use of secret evidence and the exclusion of the accused from proceedings for reasons unconnected with his conduct. The US Government has indicated that it will appeal the court's ruling, and we are, of course, following the case.

Following the Supreme Court ruling, combatant status review tribunals have been established by the US to determine whether Guantanamo Bay detainees are properly classified as enemy combatants and to permit each detainee the opportunity to contest that classification. The Government are not a party to the tribunals, but we are following their progress and monitoring the case of the British detainees. I understand that Mr. Abbasi's tribunal has been completed with the conclusion that he is an enemy combatant, and his family have been informed of the decision.

From the outset, the welfare of the detainees has been a priority for the Government. We were the first to visit our nationals in Guantanamo Bay, and British officials have made nine welfare visits to the British detainees, the most recent of which was between 2 and 5 October.

[Mr. Mullin]

As on all other occasions, a written statement on the visit was made to Parliament, and it might be helpful if I repeat the key points:

> "The British detainees appeared in sound physical health, are frustrated by their continued detention but heartened by recent access to legal representation, in the case of three of the detainees. Individual medical and detention matters raised during this and previous welfare visits by the detainees were pursued with the Camp authorities. Most have now been addressed. The Government will continue to pursue the outstanding matters. All the detainees say that they welcomed the welfare visits."—[Official Report, 4 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 15WS.]

As well as providing a written statement to Parliament, the Government have given the families of the detainees a detailed report on their condition, and we shall continue to keep them informed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) raised the allegations of mistreatment at Guantanamo Bay. I covered the issue in the previous Adjournment debate on the subject in July, but I want to take this opportunity to update hon. Members.

My hon. Friends will be aware that the British detainees who returned to the UK this year subsequently made a number of allegations of mistreatment. Despite the opportunity to do so during our repeated welfare visits to Guantanamo Bay, none of the men alleged to us while they were detained there that they were systematically abused. Furthermore, none of them has raised the allegations of mistreatment with the Government since their return to the UK. We have, however, taken up a number of their allegations with the US authorities. In response, they have said that the men were treated humanely, but they are continuing to investigate some of the other allegations made by former British detainees.

There is particular concern about the treatment of Moazzam Begg, who is a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook and Small Heath, so perhaps I should address that case specifically. My hon. Friend will be aware of a letter written by Mr. Begg from Guantanamo Bay, which was recently made public. He has never alleged to us that he has been systematically abused at Guantanamo Bay in the way that is now being suggested; on the contrary, he said that he had been treated well, and he confirmed that to a British official who saw him in Guantanamo a few days after the letter was reported in the media. However, Mr. Begg has said that he was mistreated when he was detained at Bagram air base in Afghanistan, and we asked the American authorities to investigate. They have told us that they can find no information to support that claim, and we have asked them to carry out a second, more detailed investigation.

My hon. Friend will be aware of a request by Azmat Begg, Mr. Begg's father, that he, Dr. James MacKeith and Lord Rea visit Moazzam at Guantanamo Bay to carry out an independent psychiatric assessment. Baroness Symons has supported that request. We have written to the US authorities to make the request and we continue to pursue it. We await a US response.

Ms Abbott: What is being done to secure family visits for the other British detainees, particularly Martin Mubanga and Richard Belmar?

Mr. Mullin: As I said, we have repeatedly made representations to the Americans on the subject of visits for families, but so far those requests have been denied.

Throughout the past two or three years, the Government have sought to meet the twin objectives of pursuing the fight against international terrorism and safeguarding the interests of British citizens detained overseas. It is important to remember the context in which the detentions at Guantanamo took place: 11 September was the most appalling terrorist attack ever—more than 3,000 people, including 67 British nationals, died on the US mainland. Following the attack, thousands of individuals who were believed to be al-Qaeda or Taliban fighters or their supporters were detained. The majority were released in Afghanistan, but the US sent those whom it deemed to pose a substantial risk to Guantanamo Bay for detention and questioning about their knowledge of al-Qaeda. As a result, valuable information has been gained, which has helped the international community fight terrorism.

Mr. Godsiff: Does the Minister not agree that any organisation that detains people, even the Birmingham Six—he had experience of that miscarriage of justice—should not keep them incommunicado for three years?

Mr. Mullin: Yes, the British Government and I agree with everything that my hon. Friend said about the need to treat suspects according to the rule of law. There is no difference between us on that.

I hope that I have been able to reassure my hon. Friend about the Government's commitment to work for the release of the remaining detainees and to ensure their well-being while they remain detained at Guantanamo Bay. Our discussions with the US authorities continue in relation to both issues. As I said at the outset, I understand the frustration of my hon. Friend and his constituents' relatives, but the Government are doing all in their power to bring an end to the unhappy situation and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In order to protect the last Adjournment debate and bearing in mind that there will be a Division in the House at one minute past 4 at the latest, I suspend the sitting until a quarter past four.

3.56 pm

Sitting suspended.

4.14 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It appears to me that there is going to be a run of votes in the House—perhaps as many as 12, although that is unlikely. I am therefore going to suspend until five minutes after the last of those votes, when it becomes clear that there are not going to be any more. We shall then all assemble here and see whether we can get the debate in before we get interrupted again.

4.15 pm

Sitting suspended.

Pensioner Poverty (West Edinburgh)

4.25 pm

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): The first report of the Pensions Commission made stark reading for the Government and hon. Members. It set out clearly and fairly the tough choices that lie ahead in respect of pensions, and the even tougher consequences of any failure to act. One of the true measures of a decent, fair and free society is how it treats its older citizens. Surely one of the most important social issues facing any Government is the need to ensure that older people can, after a lifetime of contributing to their country, retire with dignity, free from poverty. That challenge can be broken into two basic parts: how do the Government alleviate the pensioner poverty of today, and how do they prevent the pensioner poverty of tomorrow?

I am pleased to have secured this Adjournment debate, because it will allow me to raise some problems faced by pensioners in my constituency. The Minister for Pensions, whom I am delighted to see in his place, is well known for his considered replies and I look forward to such a response today. In that spirit, I say at the outset that the position in my constituency is far from being all doom and gloom. The fact is that pensioner incomes vary enormously. Many pensioners in my constituency enjoy a high standard of living, often because of the extra savings that they made throughout their working lives. However, too many others in Edinburgh, West do not enjoy the standard of living that they should be able to expect.

Given that 2 million pensioners still live below the poverty line in this country—the fourth richest in the world—there is no room for complacency. However, it would be wrong of me not to acknowledge the measures that the Government have taken to benefit pensioners in my constituency. I do not want to steal the Minister's thunder, but it does not take much foresight to predict that he will refer to such measures as the winter fuel payment, free television licences, the Christmas bonus, the £100 towards council tax bills and pension credit. I recognise that each of those measures has, in its own way, benefited a section of people in my constituency. However, I have to warn the Minister against simply rattling off that list as a defence, because as welcome as many of the measures are, if the Government really have done everything right and delivered a fair deal for pensioners, I must ask why I receive so many letters and telephone calls from older people in Edinburgh, West arguing to the contrary.

The Government hold up the pension credit as their flagship mechanism for tackling pensioner poverty. The latest information from the Department for Work and Pensions shows that more than 2.5 million pensioner households benefit from the pension credit. That figure is not to be sniffed at, but it stands short of the 2.8 million target set by the DWP for October 2004. The Minister will also know that the rate of increase in claims is falling off sharply. The September 2004 increase of just 15,000 new claims was the lowest monthly increase since the take-up campaign started. If the number of claimants is plateauing, as it appears to be, that raises the question of when, or indeed if, the Government will reach their target.

from the pension credit. However, a written parliamentary answer that I received last year from the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), said that more than 1,400 people in Edinburgh, West were already benefiting from the minimum income guarantee. They would simply be transferred over to the guarantee element of the pension credit, so the figure for new pensioners in my constituency to benefit stands at about 1,300.
